Every single day should be to you a day of royal discontent. You never thought as well as you ought to think. You never meant as highly as you ought to mean. You never planned as nobly as you ought to plan. You never executed as well as you ought to execute. Over the production of the scholar, over the canvas of the artist, over the task of the landscape gardener, over the pruner's knife, there ought to hover perpetually his blessed ideal, telling him, "Your work is poor—it should be better," so that every day he should lift higher and higher, with an everlasting pursuit of hope which shall end only in perfection when he reaches the land beyond.—H. W. Beecher.

The Nameless Saints

What was his name? I do not know his name.
I only know he heard God's voice and came,
  Brought all he had across the sea
  To live and work for God and me;
    Felled the ungracious oak;
      Dragged from the soil
      With horrid toil
  The thrice gnarled roots and stubborn rock;
With plenty piled the haggard mountain-side;
And at the end, without memorial, died.
No blaring trumpets sounded out his fame,
He lived,—he died,—I do not know his name.

No form of bronze and no memorial stones
Show me the place where lie his mouldering bones,
  Only a cheerful city stands
  Builded by his hardened hands.
    Only ten thousand homes
      Where every day
      The cheerful play
    Of love and hope and courage comes.
These are his monument, and these alone.
There is no form of bronze and no memorial stone.

And I?
Is there some desert or some pathless sea
Where Thou, good God of angels, wilt send me?
  Some oak for me to rend; some sod,
    Some rock for me to break;
    Some handful of His corn to take
    And scatter far afield,
    Till it, in turn, shall yield
      Its hundred fold
      Of grains of gold
  To feed the waiting children of my God?
Show me the desert, Father, or the sea.
Is it Thine enterprise? Great God, send me.
And though this body lie where ocean rolls,
Count me among all Faithful Souls.—Edward Everett Hale.

The Social Evil and the American Home

By Richard W. Gentry

Acquired characteristics are not transmitted by physiological heredity. Man as a species has been practically finished. In him Nature seems to have reached the limit of the materials that lay at her hand. The superiority of the present over the past individual seems to be due largely to the social inheritance of the race rather than to a superiority in the character of the brain or pattern of mind.

The negative side of this fixation of the species is found in the fact that acquired characteristics, so far as germ communication is concerned, tend to die out with their possessor. Culture and civilization depend largely upon the social mediums of imitation, emulation, and the unconscious influence of personality upon personality. Thus is seen the vital importance of scientific education in the home.

Thus is seen also the fallacy of the popular belief that certain diseases and illnesses are transmitted from father to son. Science now tells us that the tendency of these diseases to appear in the same family is due to the transmission of germs in social contact.

An Awful Exception.

However, there seems to be an exception to every rule. The highest medical dictum is summed up in the following words: "Social disease is the only disease transmitted to the offspring in full virulence, producing either death, or else the stigmata of degeneration and disease. Moreover, it is capable of transmitting the same class of organic defects to the third generation. It thus represents the most potent factor in the degeneration of the race." From seventy to eighty per cent of the opthalmia that blinds babies is due to this cause. It is responsible for ninety per cent of locomotor ataxia, a large per cent of insanity, premature death, apoplexy, paralysis, and sudden death.

This great black plague dwarfs the great white plague. It strikes at that in which God is most clearly seen to be present. To our own mind the fact of life is the greatest miracle of all times. The human germ is a holy thing. It is the body, the life, the person, in embryo. Why don't our preachers teach young men these things? The nearest I have come to it is Bishop Brent's little book, "The Splendor of the Human Body." God has with divine wisdom safe-guarded the germ. Notice: Poverty does not affect the germ; ignorance does not; misery does not; acquired disease does not; crime does not.

The deadly uniqueness of social disease now becomes apparent to the mind, and when the sad facts are all in it is astonishing that so little of a remedial nature has been done in this enlightened age of ours.

"The Great White Plague."

We are well aware of what has been accomplished in the warfare against tuberculosis. Says one writer, "We have recently witnessed the assemblage in Washington of a Congress of Tuberculosis, in which every country of the civilized globe was represented. Eminent scientists, distinguished specialists, prominent laymen, brought the results of their studies, their experience, and their wisdom, for the discussion of the most effective ways and means of exterminating this scourge. I need not remind you that less than two decades ago, this "great white plague" existed in our midst, claiming its victims by tens and hundreds of thousands, ignored by the sanitary officials, disregarded by the public, or stoically accepted as an evil against which it was vain to contend.

What has wrought this wonderful change in the attitude of the profession and the public—transforming apathy into interest, converting inaction into earnest effort, substituting the energy of hope for the impotence of despair? Certainly advances in medical science and the more aggressive policy adopted by the sanitary authorities have contributed to this change. But it is undeniable that the brilliant results thus far achieved in the campaign against tuberculosis, would have been impossible without the enlightened aid and helpful co-operation of the public."

"The Great Black Plague."

Contrast with this the attitude that now largely exists toward the venereal diseases. Owing to false philosophy the own father and mother will not even teach the child. There are only two schools in the country where anything relating to the sexual life and the dangers of its abuse are taught. In Leland Stanford University the pathology of venereal disease is taught and in Vassar College instruction is given in social hygiene.

Any sort of civic movement is yet in the embryo. In 1901 a Committee of Seven was appointed by the Medical Society of the City of New York to report on venereal diseases. Notwithstanding the terrible import of the statistics gotten, they appeared to hold little if any meaning to the New York board of health. In an article contributed to the Journal American Medical Association, Chicago, Ill., March 4, 1905, Dr. Morrow says that he approached two successive administrations of the health department of New York City and urged the adoption of a method of sending out circulars of warning to the general public somewhat after the manner of diffusing popular knowledge as to tuberculosis. Dr. Morrow says that his request was refused on the ground that such circulars would offend the moral susceptibilities of the community.

Need of Popular Education.

There is urgent need then of a popular educational movement in this direction as there has already been one in other directions. The same thing must be done for the great black plague that has been done for the great white plague. And we are glad to say that this popular educational movement is already on its way. Part of the material and statistics which we have quoted herein were taken from popular pamphlets that are being spread abroad to do their educational work.

Double Standard of Morality.

The death blow must be dealt to the double standard of morality. One of the most pernicious customs in our present civilization is that which permits a young man to do certain things without loss of social prestige which same things, committed by a young woman, would make her an outcast from society. It is a common thing to look upon this as a great injustice to the feminine sex. But very few have probably stopped to think that this is also a great injustice to the male sex. Why forbid a young man to marry when physically unfit and then make no attempt to give him a standard of morality that will keep him from disease. Most young men are not so thoughtless and hasty and heedless as we are often wont to consider them, and if they knew that they were in danger of losing their social standing you may be sure they would think long before they leaped.

Teaching the Child.

We have considered the question of the double standard before the question of childhood instruction because this later evil will largely undo any early home influence. We pass hurriedly over the matter of childhood instruction.

Various publications, including the Ladies' Home Journal, have made an intelligent war upon the prevailing method of ignoring the problem. It seems to us it is up to the minister to help teach the parent that he must teach the child the laws of sex. The small boy already longs to be a Hercules. Physical strength is his greatest ideal. What a handle by means of which to get hold of him!! The boy should be taught from a biologic standpoint that from the ages of 12 to 21 the body of the boy is being made over into that of a man. Nature has no large amount of vital energy which may safely be wasted in excesses of any kind during that important period, for all the forces of the body are needing for rebuilding. Teach the boy that the men in the circus, even, remain pure because they want to be their strongest to swing on the trapeze.

Is the Man the Center?

Another thing that must receive its death blow is the androcentric theory of society. How keenly do those satires known as the stories of Mr. Bowser reveal this fundamental weakness of our family life. The old idea of woman as a chattel still hangs a tawdry rag upon our social life. The inferiorities which women possess are acquired characteristics, for example her physical inferiority. Among many savage tribes it does not exist. Among the natives of New Guinea the women are more strongly built than the men. Modern biology and psychology are slowly knocking out the androcentric theory. A recent book by Emmett Densmore, M. D., gathers proofs. The book teaches that women are more intuitive, refined, unselfish and spiritual, but at the present time are distinctively inferior to men in initiative, resource, power, and breadth of view. The author shows that these mental differences between men and women are not fundamental nor the result of sex, but are caused by environment and heredity, that when each sex is fully developed there will not be as now masculine traits and feminine traits, but simply human traits, that women will be as mathematical, logical, phliosophical, and inventive as men, and men will be as intuitive, refined, and spiritual as women.

Must Know Effects.

Again, there must be education as to the awful effects of venereal disease. The fact that it breaks down the body and morals of one individual is but the beginning of the story. It strikes at our most fundamental institution, the family, and through this sacred organization ramifies through society. As the Black Death moved on its strange crescent-shaped journey through the countries of Europe, so this evil circles through society, profaning the holiest human bonds and leaving in its wake a trail of sadness, pain, disease.

The moral degradation resulting is as bad as the physical. Not the least moral evil resulting is divorce. It so happens by a coincidence that at this point the copy of the Century for June 3 comes into our hands. From the article headed, "The Scandal of Easy Divorce" we quote the words, "The impossibility of absolute divorce would work unquestioned hardship to great numbers of innocent and well-meaning people. But is there not a higher law involved—the law of the integrity of the family?" On the other hand investigation reveals that the most prevalent cause of divorce is incontinence, with its consequences.

Thus does it become apparent that only with the aid of moral continence can we hope to breed a noble race of men, to create a social community in any sense similar to the Kingdom of God. An interesting critic of Bernard Shaw says, ". . .let me suggest what I think is the right cue for understanding Shaw. Underlying everything else is the fact that he is one of those fools or wise men (according to your point of view) who look for a new heaven and a new earth. In his introduction to Man and Superman he says, "The vitality which places nourishment first . . . heaven and hell a somewhat remote second, and the health of society as an organic whole nowhere, may muddle successfully through the comparatively tribal stages of gregariousness. But in 19th century nations and twentieth century empires it produces a ruinous development of poverty, celibacy, prostitution, infant mortality, adult degeneration, and everything that men most dread." He says, "The majority of men at present in Europe have no business to be alive and no serious progress will be made until we address ourselves earnestly and scientifically to the task of producing trustworthy material for society.

What of the Future?

"Has the man no outlook then, we ask? Is he simply one more despairing undone mortal crying, 'Vanity of vanities, all is vanity!' and only finding it merrier to laugh than to cry? Nay, ultimately Shaw is not at all a pessimist, but rather an audacious optimist."

"O tempora! O mores!" The true optimist must be a futurist. He must look upon the present as a time for the laying of foundations. Only can he be thinking of an ideal, which he hopes, yea is confident, is to come, and not of that which is, when he repeats the words of the poet,

"What a creature is man! how noble in reason, how infinite in faculty! in form and moving how express and admirable! inaction how like an angel, in amprehension how like a God! the beauty of the world, the paragon of animals!"

Christian Endeavor Convention

By S. G. Inman

"Thy Kingdom come" is the central theme of the great International Christian Endeavor Convention which is nearing its close at St. Paul, where since Wednesday, July 7, thousnds of Endeavorers have assembled to enjoy the great gatherings.

The first of the meetings was held in the great Auditorium, seating ten thousand, and the most perfect hall an International Convention has ever been furnished. Wednesday night, Gov. Johnson gave the first word of greeting—a most hearty welcome, because of what Christian Endeavor stands for, "because you have dedicated yourselves to a work that is making a great contribution to the progress of the age." The reports of the United Society officers were full of encouraging things, and showed the C. E. can by no means be said to have come to a stand still.

Reports Growth.

Secretary Shaw reported a total of 71,493 societies with a membership of 3,551,100 members, a gain since the last convention of 2,355 societies and 94,200 members. The Presbyterians still hold first place with 10,198 societies. But we have taken second from the Congregationalists, there now being 7,148 societies among the Disciples of Christ. The Congregationalists come third with 6,454 societies and the Baptists fourth with 3,497.

President Clark Speaks.

A million new members for the Christian Endeavor in the next two years was the keynote of the address of President Francis E. Clark. The tone of his address was "Looking Forward: Christian Endeavor—1911."

Two years from now the society will be thirty years old, he said in his address. "We may well fix our eyes on that date and make our thirtieth year a landmark in our history. In two years dynasties have risen and fallen and nations have been born or born again."

So he proposed that they take for their motto "Christian Endeavor—1911," which means a bigger, busier and better Christian Endeavor movement in 1911. "We mean better prayer meetings, better committees, better unions and more of them, that we shall all be busier about the Master's business.

"Think what that may mean! Its full significance is glorious indeed. Its results stretch into and through eternity.

"A million souls born into the Kingdom!

"A million pairs of busy hands set at work for the Master!

"A million hearts welded to the church in more loving loyalty!

"A million mouths opened in confession!

"A million lives brought into closer fellowship with other millions!

"These, in brief, are some of the meanings of 'Christian Endeavor—1911.'"

The sessions Thursday were held in the auditorium, the armory, the churches, and on the steps of the new State Capitol building, said to be the most beautiful in the United States.

W. J. Bryan Heard.

William Jennings Bryan was easily the greatest speaker of the Convention.. He made an address at the noon-day evangelistic meeting, which is a part of the daily program at the Metropolitan Opera House, and the local papers declared it to be the greatest appeal that an evangelist had ever made in St. Paul. He spoke at the Auditorium for three-quarters of an hour on "Religion and Life," piling one epigram on top of another, till he carried the great audience to the heights of determination, where they pledged themselves to fight for right in civic affairs and in our national life. At the conclusion of this address, the whole audience joined in a march headed by Mr. Bryan and Dr. Clark for the State Capitol, where the great out-door demonstration for Christian citizenship was made.

This meeting was beyond description, and will linger in the memory of those present for a life time. "A great throng that no man could number" heard Mr. Bryan again on the significance of the great ethical awakening which is being felt all over the country at the present time.

Disciples Rally.

The denominational rallies held Friday morning were among the best things of the convention. Of course ours was the best of all—so said everybody. The Disciples had indeed a love feast at the First Christian Church. In the absence of Claude E. Hill, Guy S. Withers presided, and we received greetings from the Twin Cities by A. D. Harmon, heard of "Christian Endeavor and Our Country" by W. F. Richardson, "Christian Endeavor and Our Missions" by S. G. Inman, "Christian Endeavor and Our World Wide Fellowship" by R. P. Anderson, "Christian Endeavor and Our Plea" by F. D. Power, and a short word of exhortation by our saintly J. H. Garrison. The church was filled with enthusiastic Disciple Endeavorers and the fellowship so delightful that it was voted to continue it by all going on the same excursion Saturday afternoon up the river to Minnehaha Falls, which proved to be another something to strengthen the blessed tie that binds.

Baptists for Union.

One of the things that has brought most joy to the convention is the following resolution adopted by the Baptists in their rally, and hailed by many as the beginning of the end of the split from Christian Endeavor made by the Baptists and Methodists several years ago:

"Resolved, That it is the sense of the Baptist Young People, assembled in conference at the International Christian Endeavor convention in St. Paul, Minn., July, 1909, that it would be to the advantage of our denominational life to take such steps as are necessary to bring about a close organic union among Baptist young people who are now organized as the Baptist Young People's unions and Christian Endeavor societies.

"We believe that this end could be naturally and speedily secured if the Baptist Christian Endeavor societies would add the words Baptist Young People's union to their name; and all Baptist Young People's societies add Christian Endeavor to their name, giving the common name 'Baptist Young People's Union of Christian Endeavor,' thereby opening the way for a united Baptist movement that will fully safeguard our denominational interests, and at the same time give us the added impetus of the world-wide movement that brings together the Christian forces of all denominations."

These notes are written in the midst of a great feast of things that are still going on, and tomorrow, Monday, will probably be the greatest day of the convention. The Disciples are well represented both in delegates and on the program, and are being treated in every way as the "finest of the fine." Kansas City and Dallas made brave fights for the convention, but it was decided best to take it East in 1911, after an absence of twelve years, so Atlantic City is the lucky place.

An Old World Trip

By W. G. Ballantine

Paris is like Berlin in being able to show "all the kingdoms of the world and the glory of them in a moment of time." But it is utterly unlike Berlin in all details. France, a little more than a century ago, got nauseated with royalty and swept out of existence king, queen, princes, nobles and almost everything associated with them. France is the land of defiant disobedience. She has made all sorts of experiments, some sadly disastrous, in government and social life. But today she is a free and democratic country a century ahead of Germany in experience. She has all of America's hateful traits that come from mistaking license for liberty and permitting the general public to suffer from the unregulated wantonness of individuals. But she realizes this.

The Hohenzollerns.

In Berlin one senses in the very air the unbroken and ever growing royal splendor of the Hohenzollern family for the last 500 years.

Prussia is the creation of the Hohenzollerns as no other country in Europe is the creation of a family. Prussia is no natural unit. She has no natural boundaries. This family, the Hohenzollerns, beginning in little Bradenburg 500 years ago, and reaching out first far eastward and then far westward for scattered fragments of unrelated territory, by their own persistence and personal force and wisdom in choice of advisers and in maintaining an army, have created first Prussia and then the united German empire. People smile at the thirty-two statues with which the kaiser has at his own expense lined the Avenue of Victory. But those statues represent probably the most remarkable line of rulers in all European history.

William Looks His Part.

Emperor William looks the part he plays. His eagle eye, his upturned mustaches, his aquiline nose and square jaws make up a face to stamp upon the coin of the empire—the image and superscription of Caesar. Although he still looks very young, he is the father of five sons and a daughter and has two grandsons. The Patriarchal character is his. He is the ideal German house-father. The family life of the imperial household, every smallest incident of which is reported in the court columns of the newspapers, is a model for every family in the land. At Christmas, the greatest of German festivals, the imperial family gathers in the resplendent shell-hall of the new palace in Potsdam and there are eleven Christmas trees,—one for each member down to the youngest grandchild.

In the army, in the navy, in science, in art, in music, in biblical criticism, in every part of religious, social, industrial and recreative life, the kaiser makes his patriarchal personality effective. The wonder is that in general he shows such capacity for work, such practicaal wisdom, such moral wholesomeness, such marvelous versatility. He is the first citizen in a sense beyond anything that even Mr. Roosevelt has contemplated. He takes with religious seriousness the great task that Providence has developed upon him and has consecrated himself to it.

A Difficult Role.

The kaiser has had for twenty years a difficult role to play, but until lately he has played it successfully. He saw from the first that Germany could not afford to fight another great war but must maintain her army. The question was how to keep the soldiers with their blood up and ready for action and how to keep the people quiet under the taxes. His way has been to say something imprudent about once every six months and so fill Europe with a war scare. Thus he put himself into the center of the stage, excited and pleased the army and silenced the taxpayers. But his last periodical indiscretion went wrong and like a boomerang came back and struck the imperial prestige such a blow as it never before received. It was really the Harden scandals more than the London Dispatch interview that caused the profound revulsion of German feeling. The whole nauseous horror was aired in the courts. Bitter and deep was the mortificaation of the proud kaiser thus provided to have been unable to judge rightly the characters of his closest intimates. But he instantly required their retirement.

France Not Decadent.

There is in France today a large percentage of very thoughtful and sober people who have reflected long upon the lessons of French history and who have profited by the bitterness of Waterloo, Sedan and the rest. These people have been completely disillusionized as to military glory. They see the hollowness of "les idees Napoleoniennes." They never will go back to monarchy or imperialism, and yet they suffer keen shame from the inefficiency of the republic. National vanity has given place to a chastened spirit, but not to a cowardly nor a reactionary one. They realize that a long and painful way lies before them which must be trodden patiently until France has solved her problems. Fearful has been the agony of breaking away from the union of church and state, for France is Catholic. She never will be Protestant. But at last the separation has been effected. No one can call France a decadent nation. Compared with her rightful place she is now at a low ebb. But during her weakness she has been clearing the way for a grand advance in the near future.

Paris.

We stayed this time in Paris in the "Latin Quarter." You have been there and know what that is—the student quarter, the artist quarter. The university is there and the college of France and the Institute and the School of Fine Arts and the Cluny and Luxembourg museums. The Pantheon stands on the highest ground in it.

The popluation here includes many thousands of students of science, literature and art, gathered out of every nation under heaven. Here for centuries has been the principal center in Europe of intellectual and esthetic life. Here is bohemia. One may dress and eat and live as he pleases. Eating is mostly at little tables near or on the sidewalk in front of any restaurant one chances to be passing at mealtime. Liberty, equality, and fraternity are here at home. Elsewhere fashion may reign, and etiquet and at least the outward forms of conventionality. Here nothing of the kind. The streets of the Latin quarter abound in "types," that is, men and women who dress according to their own sweet will. Artists go in velveteen, (the trousers very baggy), often with hair and beard long, and very broad brimmed soft hats. There is a sort of free and general companionship and everywhere the captivating French politeness. In buying a penny newspaper from a woman one gets a smile and a "Merci, monsieur," that makes him feel like a knight-errant meeting a princess.

Greatest Place in the World for Pictured Art.

Here is the greatest place in all the world for the study of pictorial and plastic art. In the Salon—the annual exhibition—there were last summer perhaps 5000 new works selected out of many times that number. The Ecole des Beaux Arts teaches four arts: Architecture, sculpture, painting and engraving. Of course there is much sculpture and painting from the nude. These young men and women spend many hours daily in study of other men and women unclothed. In the evenings the artists and their models go together to balls and social amusements. Here is a world of young people of the peculiarly emotional type, absolutely free from the ordinary rules of propriety. There is also a large population of other people who are not artists nor artist-models nor models of any sort who are also free from all rules of propriety. Artistic genius and youthful audacity and moral recklessness here blend to make the most faascinating scenes of folly on earth.

Good and Bad.

Of all the cities Paris stands next to Rome in the number of its costly and beautiful churches. Yet the purity of the Christian religion has made little impression upon public sentiment. There is an unblushing frankness and an esthetic seductiveness of vice in Paris unequaled elsewhere in Christendom. But baseness is no less debasing on that account.

But the Latin quarter is not all bad by any means. There are hundreds of serious young men and women there who live frugally, work hard, cherish high aspirations and accomplish great things. Art is an essential of human progress and true art is cultivated in Paris. The architectural art that made the Columbian Exposition of 1893 an epoch in the history of beauty in America came from Parisian education. It was in this strange environment of artistic excellence and bacchanalian frivolity that our own Saint Gaudens acquired his preparation to make such a series of statues of our nation's heroes as will be forever one of our chief glories.

Proposing Another Union

Connecticut Congregationalists in Conference with Episcopalians

Much interest and significance attaches to a conference between a committee of Connecticut Congregationalists and a corresponding committee from the Protestant Episcopal church, regarding a closer union of the two denominations.

The Congregational Committee was appointed by the state conference last year, and was composed of the following persons: Dr. Newman Smyth, Judge Simeon Baldwin and Rev. Frederick W. Greene. This committee met with the following representatives of the Protestant Episcopal church: Bishop Chauncey B. Brewster of Connecticut, Doctors Francis Goodwin of Hartford, William R. Huntington and W. W. Grosvenor of New York, the conference on their part being unofficial and expressive of their individual views.

The joint body considered the following questions: What changes on either side would be necessary in order to realize Christian unity between those who do not, and those who do belong to the Episcopal Church? 1. With regard to forms of worship? 2. With regard to church membership? 3. With regard to administrative unity? 4. With regard to autonomy of local churches? 5. With regard to ordination?

As a result of this interchange of views, certain methods of approach were suggested as possible, viz.:

1. Forms of Worship—Might not agreement be reached in conformity with the constitution of the Episcopal Church, and with due regard to the diversities of the churches of the Episcopal recognition in other congregations of such freedom as might be congenial and habitual among them?

2. Church Membership—Might not an orderly unity be attained by further mutual consideration of these facts: (1) That confirmation is not included among matters essential to church unity in the Lambeth overture; (2) that while in the Episcopal Church confirmation is cherished as the layman's ordination to his share in the priesthood of the whole church, yet (3) confirmation does not constitute church membership; and (4) the rubric requiring confirmation according to a general intterpretation of it among Episcopalians relates only to their own children and catechumens?

3. Administrative Unity—Might not the office and functions of the Episcopate be adapted to other Christian churches as an organ of their fellowship and a means of executing unity in their common Christian interests?

4. Autonomy or Self-Government of Individual Churches—Might not a working agreement be practical by the recognition on the one hand of the self-governing power of individual churches as local units in their immediate interests and proper jurisdiction, while on the other hand general advisory functions and some degree of Episcopal direction should be secured in matters pertaining to the common work and welfare of the churches?

5. Ordination—The question concerning valid ordination of the ministry was resolved into the three following inquiries: (1) What further would be deemed necessary to render the existing ministry of other churches regular acording to the Episcopal order, and possessed of full authorization t administer the sacraments in Episcopal churches? (2) Might not such additional authorization be conferred by the bishops and received by the ministers of other churches with mutual regard and without essential sacrifices? (3) To secure such regularity and unity in the Christian ministry might not the alternative form of giving authority in the ordinal of the Episcopal Church be rendered acceptable to all without essential changes by the use of a few prefatory and adaptive words? (4) If this could be done and additional or enlarged authority could thus be conferred upon the ministry of different Christian bodies, might not this be a convincing manifestation of the real spiritual unity of Christ's Church, and a long step be taken toward the attainment of outward visible unity?

The Weakness of Professor Foster

By E. B. Barnes.

Professor Foster is a disturber because he refuses to be classified. Classification is the end of heresy. The strangeness of his views are no less strange than the pulpits from which he proclaims them. An agnostic in the professor's chair in a professedly christian institution; a Baptist in a Unitarian pulpit; a Unitarian professiong to be an old-fashioned Baptist are anomalous situations. He persists in holding the most contradictory views as strongly as he does in holding irreconcileable pulpits. He makes a virtue of inconsistency. Most men use language for the purpose of clearness; he uses it with such freedom that chaos and bewilderment are the result. It is not uncharitable to say that his views are determined largely by the leanings of his audience. There is no uncertainty as to his positions if we read the "Function of Religion" and nothing else. There he is an agnostic. He delivered the lectures in the first place to those who were in sympathy with scientific agnosticism. In those lectures he declared that as the savage made his gods with his hands, the civilized man makes his with his head. "Need is the mother of gods," and "man made god in his (man's) own image," are sufficiently advanced views to please the agnostic; and yet the Professor in other parts of his book writes of this man-made god with a capital "G." There is no personal god in the universe for him. "Man made the gods to do for him what he could not do for himself," p. 50. "A man creates whatever concepts and principles he needs in order to make himself master of his phenomena and of his environment. To the same end were the gods created," p. 84. Imagine what the Professor's views of prayer must be! Still he writes to a conservative Baptist that he believes in prayer. Prayer, to whom? He regards Jesus as "the ignorant and illiterate child of his age," and affirms his belief in the divinity of Jesus. He declares himself to be a Baptist in principle, and over his own signature has said: "I deny every Baptist dogma." "Regard for the sacred Scriptures is the duty of the Christian; but to require assent to its thoughts and commandments is to lead into sin; and such requirement is itself sinful," p. 77. He has said elsewhere that "only the simple minded believe in the inspiration of the Bible." "In this modern world, if one should hearken to biblical commandments and ideas as such, and hold that such subjection was faith, was religion, then the word faith would receive its most dangerous meaning," p. 76. I give these quotations to show what kind of "an old-fashioned Baptist" the Professor is.

These are a few of the incomprehensible enigmas which he has left on record. It would take more than his affirmations of loyalty to Baptist principles as contained in his correspondence with Dr. MacLaurin, in a recent issue of the Standard (Chicago) to set himself right with the great majority of persons whose faith is bound up with the fortunes of the Christian religion. But I shall be lenient in my criticisms of a man whose sense of right is so obtuse that he can see nothing improper in attempting to be an agnostic, a Baptist, and a Unitarian at the same time. It is the duty of christian charity to look kindly on a teacher who uses language for the purpose of deception.

I wish that you had spoken more clearly in this week's editorial. You were "feeling" in the right direction, but that was all. I think you should do more. You know as well as I that if Professor Foster's views prevail the Baptist church is at an end as an institution. You also know that the religion of the Professor gives us in his book, and then Jesus is at an end. Think of the god that think of this from the Standard of July 3: "I am a typical, loyal, old-fashioned Baptist; believing and trusting in the grace of God—that God whom Jesus reveals and in the necessity of the inner renewal of the heart of us sinners by the Divine Spirit, if we are to be saved from sin at all." It is not difficult to believe that Jesus revealed God the Father, but how could Jesus reveal the god of Professor Foster's book, a god created by the superstitious fear of the savage, and by the ignorance of civilization, plus the refinement of our times? You know that the Bible and the church have gone, according to the Professor. It is his mission to give to the world a religion "up to date." I do not say that it will be worthless, but I do say that it will not be the religion of Jesus. But why waste words about the conclusions of a man whose agnosticism is as pronounced as that of Colonel Ingersoll? If he intended to be an old-fashioned Baptist, why write or publish the "Function of Religion"?

Next Sunday this bewildering teacher preaches in our city. The liberal element, rationalists, agnostics, atheists will all be out to hear him. They hail him as their leader. But what good will come to the religion of Christ because of his visit? Will any one be converted, or led to think of such a thing? Then will the thistle bring forth figs. The unbeliever will be confirmed in his unbelief, the scoffer will have more material for his scoffing, and every adherent of the religion of Jesus will be humiliated at the presence of a man in what was once a Baptist pulpit, now a non-descript, whose message means death to the faith once delivered to the saints, if that message be believed.

People of Importance

—Fred Warren, the business manager of the "appeal to reason," the country's largest socialist newspaper, has just been fined $1,500 and sentenced to six months in jail. Several weeks ago Warren was arrested for alleged violation of the postal regulations in sending through the mails a printed offer of a reward of $1,000 to any one who would kidnap ex-Governor William S. Taylor of Kentucky and return him to that state.

—No man—not even the new sultan—is of greater importance in Turkey today than Chevket Pasha, the generalissimo of the Young Turks forces, the governor of Macedonia, who, banished twice by the former sultan from the capital, entered it at the head of the best army Turkey has seen in this day, to punish those who dared plot for the renewal of the old regime. It was he who sent the ultimatum to Abdul Hamid. It was Chevket Pasha who took him prisoner and sent him to Salonica.

—General Theodore A Bingham, who was removed from police commissioner of New York by Mayor McClellan, had made a splendid record as a police official. He will spend two months resting in Nova Scotia and will return to New York in the fall.

—Champ Clark, who has been elected to Congress eight times from the Montgomery, Mo., district, will have some opposition the next time he runs. Claude Ball, an attorney of Montgomery, has announced his candidacy against Clark.

—Louis Prang, a pioneer in the development of educational color scheme which has held sway for more than a quarter of a century, has just died. Mr. Prang devoted more than forty years to the study of creating a standard of color.

—Congressman Francis W. Cushman of Washington state, known as the wit of the House, died in New York of pneumonia last week. The Washington congressman held the title of being the homliest man in the House and of looking more like Lincoln than any other public man of recent years. In describing his career once he said he had been a water boy, section hand, cowboy, school teacher, lawyer, and congressman. He was in Congress more than ten years.

—General Theodore A. Bingham will accept a nomination for mayor from the anti-Tammany forces. In a statement to a reporter, he said: "If my police administration has met the approval of New York City and the people would like to see that same kind of administration in all of the departments carried on from the city hall in the person of the mayor I am willing to undertake it."

—Samuel Gompers, president of the American Federation of Labor was the guest in London last week at a dinner given by the labor party at the house of commons. Arthur Henderson, the labor member from Durham, Barnard Castle division, presided.

—Renaud Hyppolite, a member of the Haitian cabinet, prominent in the politics of Haiti, and one of the principal figures in the movement which brought about the deposition of President Nord Alexis last winter, has just died in Port-au-Prince.

—James Yadkin Joyner, who has been elected president of the National Education Association, has been superintendent of public instruction in North Carolina since 1902. He was born in Davidson County, North Carolina, in 1862, educated at LaGrange Academy and the University of North Carolina, and began his teaching career as principal of LaGrange Academy in 1881. His home is in Raleigh.

—General the marquis de Galliet, former French minister of war, is dead from apoplexy. Gaston Alexandre Augusta, marquis de Gallifet, was born in Paris, January 23, 1831. He became minister of war when the Waldeck-Rousseau ministry was formed June 22, 1899. He resigned the following May. He was one of the first of the recognized royalists to rally to the support of the republic and became the personal friend of Gambetta. In 1875 the marquis was raised to the rank of general of division, retaining it until he retired in 1894.

—John D. Rockefeller celebrated his seventieth birthday by a trip from his summer home at Cleveland to Pocantine Hill, N. Y., to inspect some improvements. Coincident with the trip of Mr. Rockefeller comes the report from Cleveland that the Standard Oil Company has announced an increase of one cent a gallon on gasoline. The increase means a birthday gift by the public to Mr. Rockefeller of $500,000.

—Rev. James M. Buckley, editor of one of the official advocates of the Methodist Episcopal church, has just closed the fiftieth year of his ministry.

—It is reported that Prince Ito has contributed $2,500 for building a Christian church at Ping Yang.

Campbell Park, Pentwater

The Campbell Park Association is not a money-making real estate firm. This is not an "ad." The association seeks not to get, but to give. Realizing that to find a place suitable for the annual vacation was an increasing, perplexing and difficult problem for the average family a group of ten Disciples, after looking around for two or three years, bought thirty acres just north of Pentwater, Michigan. These ten all have, or will have in the near future, cottages built on this ground; already four have erected summer homes. This should be the "Epworth Heights," for Chicago Disciples. Campbell Park, named after the illustrious Thomas and Alexander, seems to be ideal in that it meets most if not all the requirements of a summer colony.

1. It is convenient. Just a night's ride from Chicago. The Park is within walking distance of the landing place of the boats.

2. The ground is inspiring. There is the continual murmur of the restless, unsalted sea; there is a forest of trees; there are the high hills for far views, the deep ravines for quiet walks and meditation, and "The Common" for the ordinary moods.

3. It is health-creating. The sands, the pines, and the North climate are curative of hay fever. The fresh breezes of the lake keep away the disease producing fly and mosquito. The ozone is most strengthening.

4. Fishing, bathing and boating are good. The beach of Campbell Park is unsurpassed. The children are safe in their play in its waters as the danger line is far out. The sand is in no way stony. Good fishing may be had in Pentwater Lake, Bass Lake, and numerous other near by lakes. "The Common" is dedicated to dry land sports, such as tennis, baseball, etc.

5. The Park is a place for rest and comfort. All the surroundings are conducive to the restoration of the vital forces. A complete water system is in process of installation. It will be completed in the course of three weeks. Thus there will be no inconveniences in securing good water or in caring for the sewage.

6. The associations are good. Pentwater is far enough from Chicago to avoid the carousing element. It is a prohibition town. The Campbell Park Association is composed of Disciples who though not puritans will so control Campbell Park as to make it morally and religiously helpful.

7. The coöperative plan reduces expense. All are to share in the coöperation. Lots, therefore, can be had much cheaper than from companies in which the speculative element enters. Any information desired will be furnished by

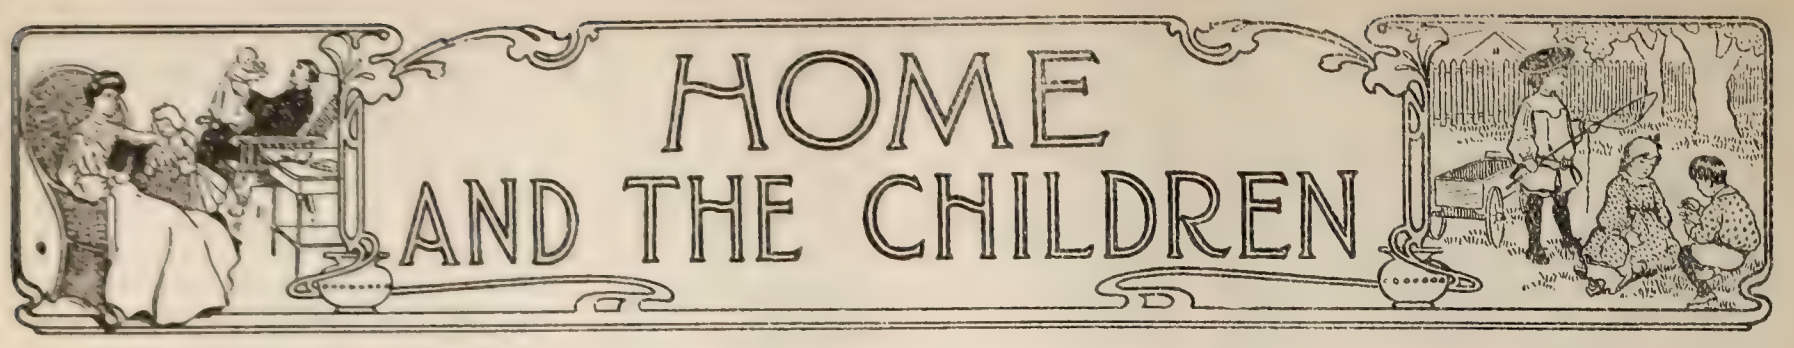
From Bolengi, Africa



I'm pleased to tell you we are prospering in the work. Dr. Widdowson has just returned from Bonycka where he baptized seventeen people. A short time before Dr. Jaggard baptized six there. In last March there were ten baptized at Longa and eighteen here, making a total of (51) fifty-one this term and one hundred and fifty-two (152) since I came last October.

Dr. Dye will be with us in two months. Bro. Eldred will return home in July. He's been building up the new station at Longa, and needs a change of climate now. This will leave Dr. and Mrs. Jaggard alone there. We must have more men out here or we can't do anything pretty soon. The work is expanding too fast for us. Yours in his righteous cause. Chas. P. Hedges.

Allen T. Shaw

Having no power over the condition that has led our Allen T. Shaw to resign his pastorate with us and believing him to be wholly conscientious and sincere in accepting the call to the first Christian Church of Spencer, Ind., We therefore regretfully accept his resignation and hereby show our appreciation of his work by saying: That as a man his conduct has been wholly in keeping with his profession, his rugged honesty, upright life, and blameless character commend him to all clean citizens. As a minister he is a true prophet of righteousness, he has the courage to speak out on the things he deems essential, yet does it in a spirit of love and humility. His wife is also an able and earnest worker and we commend them heartily to the Disciples who may be privileged to enjoy their labors.

Signed,
Jno. Ong, Chairman.

Making B'lieve

I've maked b'lieve I was a mamma,
  And been to the bargain store,
But the bargain (the baby) wiggled so
  That I couldn't play that any more.

I've maked b'lieve I was Columbus,
  And discovered the world all over;
The rug was the 'Lantic Ocean,
  And I sailed on the nursery sofa.

I've maked b'lieve I was an Indian,
  And scalped Polyphemia twice.
And I played be a big polar bear,
  With the looking-glass for ice.

I've maked b'lieve I was a doctor,
  With pearl tapioca pills,
But I was 'bliged to give up practice
  'Cause I couldn't c'llect my bills.

Two times I've b'lieve be a circus,
  And two times the coalman, too,
And once I was Robinson Crusoe,
  And once I was Little Boy Blue.

Oh. I've maked b'lieve and I've maked b'lieve
  Till there's nothing else to be,
And now—I'm so hungry, mamma—
  Let's make b'lieve I was me.

The Legend of the Pine

By Mary H. Philbrick.

It had been a long, happy day, but now the children were tired and while they waited for the wagons which were to take them home from the picnic grounds they begged Aunt Eunice for a story.

"What shall it be?" Aunt Eunice asked.

"About a pine tree," answered Harold, looking up into the gently swaying tops.

"Yes, about a pine tree," chorused the other children, who were resting comfortably on the pine needles.

So Aunt Eunice began:

In the garden of the Fairy Queen stood a beautiful pine tree, a small tree with long, slender leaves always dancing and rustling in the sunshine. The little tree never attracted much attention, but she did not care, and only tried to help and protect the frail, tender flowers which grew at her feet.

One day the Queen saw what a lovely pine it was, and then she came often and talked to it, but instead of being very happy at this, and trying to pass on to others some of the kindness which the Queen gave to her, the little tree became so proud that she drew her branches away from the other trees, and held herself haughtily. Soon, while talking with the tree, the Queen told her a secret and of this the little pine boasted, the oak said he, for one, did not believe it, the maple rustled her dainty leaves, while the chestnut shook with derisive laughter, even the birds pretended not to believe it. The blue-jay teased and teased the tree, so that to prove that she had the secret, she told it to the chattering bird, and it was a secret no longer.

The Queen lost her temper when she learned that the pine had told her secret, and in a passion she struck the tree with her wand and said sternly: "May you grow so tall that your head will be too high for any one to tell you a secret, no one shall be able to climb into your branches and talk to you as they do to the other trees." The leaves of the pine curled up like needles with grief and remorse as she grew rapidly taller and taller, but the Queen did not relent, and to this day, up in the top of the pine tree one may hear her sighing for the happy times that are gone.

Woman's Sphere

—Miss Ruth E. Clark, daughter of Rev. A. W, Clark, missionary at Prague, Austria, has taken her degree at the University of Edinburgh with first honors and by competitive examination she has won a bursary to travel and study in France. She is now at the University of Paris.

—Prof. Mary Whiton Calkins received the degree of doctor of letters at the recent commencement of Columbia University. Miss Calkins is professor of philosophy and psychology at Wellesley College. She is the first woman to receive an honorary degree from Columbia since 1887, when Maria Mitchell, professor of astronomy at Vassar, received the LL. D.

—Hugh Cains, the Boston sculptor, declares that women's figures have been ruined in devotion to fashion.

—Miss Gina Krog, to whose efforts Norwegian women now have full suffrage, has just arrived in this country from Christiania.

—Mrs. Radford of New Orleans, "eighty-seven years young," has been superintendent of the Chinese mission in that city for twenty-three years. The mission carries on a Sunday-school and Monday evening classes.

—A married woman in Louisiana does not own her own clothes. Judge W. W. Ferguson pointed out this among other legal inequalities in an address given the other day before the Era club of New Orleans.

—When a young girl entered a pawnbroker's shop in Leipzig with fourteen rings she was suspected and detained. Inquiries proved that she was the rightful owner and that the rings were souvenirs of fourteen fiances.

—At her afternoon teas Mrs. Taft serves sandwiches instead of cake, and the table is in the red room. About twenty-five guests are asked each day to take tea with Mrs. Taft, the invitations being over the telephone. While the guests are arriving a friend pours the tea, but is afterward relieved by Mrs. Taft, who pours and passes sandwiches and makes the occasion a delightfully informal one.

—Mrs. J. R. Harris and Mrs. Uarcissa Owen, Indian women, are active in getting signatures for the national suffrage petition in eastern Oklahoma. Mrs. Harris is a Cherokee and the chairman of the petition department for her league. Mrs. Owen is the mother of Senator Owen and is the vice chairman. Mrs. Mamie Porter-Farnsworth of Muskogee, a daughter of the late Chief Pleasant Porter, also takes an active interest in the work.

—President Taft, through the Secretary of State, has appointed a Chicago woman, Miss Marie C. Brehm, 5464 Jefferson avenue, an official United States commissioner to the world's anti-alcohol congress, which will be held in London, England, beginning July 17. Miss Brehm was former president of the Illinois W. C. T. U., and besides representing the United States at this congress she will be the official representative of the interchurch council of America and of the Presbyterian General Assembly committee on temperance.

—Mrs. Velma Swanston Howard, who is the official translator for this country of the works of Selma Lagerlof, says that Miss Lagerlof seems to be the favorite for the Nobel prize. She saw "The Servant in the House" played in Swedish at Stockholm, but says that the Swedes think it reminiscent of Ibsen's brand and do not care for it.

—Mrs. James Bryce, wife of the British ambassador, is a vegetarian, and this summer is instituting a vigorous campaign against the use of meats of any kind, in which she is assisted by Mrs. Sherman, wife of the vice president of the United States, both ladies passing the season at Manchester, Mass.

—Mrs. Elinor Glynn has been saying some very unkind things about Americans in her latest book, also one or two things that are decidedly true. She has not exaggerated one bit or unburdened herself of an untruth in what she has to say about American husbands, especially those of the "much money" class. Of course Mrs. Tiddle de Winks Potter Van Potter, one of our social queens, doesn't like Mrs. Glynn one bit. Mrs. Glynn is rank but she has brains while Mrs. Van Potter is positively brainless and is often rank.

Rockefeller's Gifts

On his seventieth birthday John D. Rockefeller added $10,000,000 to the $42,000,000 which he had given to the General Education Fund, making the total $52,000,000. The grand whole of all Mr. Rochefeller's gifts is nearly $120,000,000. The list follows:

The Tree of the Good God

By Aimee Tourgee

"You have never heard the story of the Tree of the Good God?" The princess asked in surprise.

"No, your royal highness," I said. For she was a real princess. Her father was a king and her surroundings spoke of courts and thrones. But for a trick of fate she might have sat on a throne herself instead of the stone seat in a French villa garden. Below us beyond the garden wall, the hill fell away to a little sandy lake surrounded by the second-growth pines; beyond that again the mountain rose topped by snow-clad peaks. The princess looked at them dreamily for a moment before she spoke:

"The peasants call this place the Domain of the Good God. That is not the real name and we try in vain to put a stop to it. But you know how such things are passed on from father to son.

"They say that hundreds of years ago when all of the country south of the Pyrenees was infidel and the power of the heathen was growing greater and greater day by day until it threatened to sweep the cross from the face of the earth, a battle was fought in the north between a Christian king and a great heathen army. It raged three days and three nights. The rivers ran red with blood to the sea and the dead were like trees in a forest. "But it was not the Lord's will that the heathen should prevail. At last what was left of them were beaten back in terrible dismay. Snatching up what plunder they could they fled in terror as long as pursuit lasted. But when the Christians turned back, they halted in the No Man's land of the frontier, where the highroad runs between the mountain and the sea and built a sort of village. Here they lived by robbery and murder. Words fail to depict the depths of their wickedness. Respectable people began to shun the highroad, preferring the lesser danger of the sea and the mountain passes.

"But one wild winter night a lonely wayfarer struggled along against the storm. He welcomed the sight of village fires, which promised shelter, food and rest. He needed these things sorely and to-night they would be all the more freely given. For it was Christmas Eve, when in memory of the Holy Babe all hearts are tender to the wants and sufferings of others. Faintly the traveler tapped at the first dwelling, for he was spent with fatigue and exposure. The appeal was unheeded; tempest raged outside and there was a wilder revelry within.

"He struggled on. When he humbly asked for shelter at another door it was slammed in his face with curses. At the third house, people were feasting and drinking. Begging a scrap that fell from the great abundance on the table, the wayfarer was driven from the threshhold with a hail of garbage and ribald laughter. He still staggered on. Imploring at the last door for only a rag to wrap around him against the bitter cold, men, fiercely reviling, stoned him and set on him their dogs.

"He fled blindly, the wolfish pack at his heels then he fell beside the highway. On the crest of the hill beyond the village a poor old woman lived in a wretched hut. She was too miserably poor to tempt even the wicked men about her. This Christmas Eve she only of all the villagers remembered Him who came to give His life for us. As she crouched by the smouldering fire, telling her beads with a prayer on her lips for any who might be abroad this terrible night, she heard the snarl of dogs and a cry at her door.

"She went out and beating off the dogs, helped the wayfarer to his feet and led him into the hut. She took off his sodden rags and wrapping him in the cloak warm from her own shoulders, bound up his bleeding wounds and fed him with the crust which was her own supper. "When he was warmed and dried and refreshed, the traveler thanked her and rose to go, though she begged him to stay, at least until the tempest passed.

"'No,' he said. 'I may not tarry. I go afar on my Father's business.' That night as the old woman cowered famishing on the straw which was the only bed she had, the storm became terriffic. A flood of rain swept down on the hut; with the crashing thunder, the lightning which seemed to split the very earth, and the shrieking uproar of the wind, it was as if all the fiends were let loose! "She lay half dead with fright. Then awakened with a start. A fair ray of sunshine cut across the gloom of the hut and struck something on the floor which burned and glowed red like live coals. She rose and opened the door to see more clearly, and behold, where the wicked village had been the night before, she saw a stretch of dark water." The princess paused. A shuddering ripple seemed to pass over the surface of the lake. "While she gazed at it in terrified wonder, a voice came to her saying: 'I was a stranger and you took me in; I was an hungured, and empty, you gave me meat. I was naked and bare, you clothed me. Take of these, drops of my blood, eat and drink of them and of them be clothed.' "And the drops of red light on the floor glowed and burned!

"The old woman fell on her face like one dead. While she lay thus a band of travelers appeared in the distance, the sun glittering on their armour. They advanced until they reached the crest of the hill where they paused astounded. In the valley below a lake cut off the highway. They consulted awhile, then the mightiest man among them spurred to the hut and bade his squire ask concerning the road. But the woman kneeling and shading her face with her hand, could only falter her own wonderful story. When she finished and all saw for themselves the red drops glowing like coals in the sunlight, the knight dismounted and kneeling with bent head before her in the mud, said: 'Mother, one who never bowed the head or bent the knee to aught on earth humbly craves your blessing. For to him indeed is this a blessed day, which brings a knowledge of the one true faith'. With trembling fingers she made the sign of the cross on the narrow band of gold encircling his helment,—a band of gold, which thereafter studded by three glowing rubies, was ever found leading the van when the powers of Christendom fought against the heathen, whose greatness from that day waned forthwith. For this Saracen king and all his people joyfully confessed Christianity, and the old woman dwelt revered among them until she died." The princess ceased speaking. It seemed as if the pagantry of this mystic old world tale was passing again before her eyes. Then she turned to me. "Where we sit, the hut stood," she said. "And this tree," putting her hand against the mighty oak, centuries old, which rose vast and spreading behind the stone bench,—"this tree was a sapling then. It bent writhing before the tempest of that terrible night when the wicked village was swallowed up. The peasants call it 'The Tree of the Good God' and say it is blessed among trees. For of all that lives, it alone saw our Lord on earth, in the flesh, —'one despised and rejected of men.'"

Common Sense Out of Doors

The first thing for you to do is to look upon the outdoors as a new country. The next thing is to step outside the house onto the porch. Another step takes you to the garden or to the walk. The latter leads perhaps to a city park, or to the river bank, to the beach, or to the mountain, or to the wooded fields. And only to go out on your porch or over into the woods and quietly rest, outdoors is in itself a real outing. It is the simplest form of outdoor living. Do that if you can do nothing more, and do it as regularly as possible. If you have a horse or an automobile or a boat your possibilities widen. Your inclination, controlled by common sense, will dictate to you what sports to take up. I strongly advocate the neighborhood club for outdoor life. A general club, not a tennis or a golf or a boat club. A club that can be the headquarters for all the outdoor doings of your crowd by land or water. You do not need to be chained to it, but you will find such a club of great help. For one thing, the club can obtain equipment sufficent for all to use by turns at considerable saving of cost, though the wise man will provide himself with what outdoor appurtenances he can afford. It is money well invested. The club can arrange regattas and field days and various tournaments. It can arrange for camps, permanent summer camps where members go for their respective vacations, and in many ways be a factor not to be ignored.

They're a callin'—don't ye hear 'em?
They're a callin' loud an' clear;
They're a callin' low and softlike,
Still a callin'—can't ye hear?
An' they're sayin' in the swayin'
Of the trees, "Oh, come out here
Where the sun is softly kissin'
Of the brooks, an' nohow missin',
Daffodils and modest violets—
Oh, won't you come an' look?"
——Do ye hear?

NOT FAR WRONG

A girl was required to write a brief sketch of Queen Elizabeth. Her paper contained this sentence: "Elizabeth was so dishonest that she stole her soldiers' food."

The teacher was puzzled, and called the girl.

"Where did you get that notion?"

"Why, that's what it says in the history."

The book was sent for, and the passage was found. It read: "Elizabeth was so parsimonius that she even pinched her soldiers' rations."—The Bookman.

EGGS AND SCIENCE

"My dear," said the wife of the eminent professor, "the hens have scratched up all that eggplant seed you sowed."

"Ah, jealousy!" mused the professor. And he sat down and wrote a twenty-page article on the "Development of Envy in the Minds of the Lower Grade of Bipeds."—Baltimore American.

WINSTON OF THE PRAIRIE

By Harold Bindloss, Author of "The Cattle Baron's Daughter," "Lorimer of the Northwest," etc.

CHAPTER XXV.

Reinstatement.

A year of tireless effort and some anxiety had passed since Winston had seen the first load of flour sent to the east, when he and Graham sat talking in their Winnipeg office. The products of the St. Louis mills were already in growing demand and Graham appeared quietly contented as he turned over the letters before him. When he laid down the last one, however, he glanced at his companion somewhat anxiously.

"We have got to fix up something soon," he said. "I have booked all the St. Louis can turn out for six months ahead, and the syndicate is ready to take the business over, though I don't quite know whether it would be wise to let them. It seems to me that milling is going to pay tolerably well for another year, and if I knew what you were wanting, it would suit me better."

"I told you I wanted thirty thousand dollars," said Winston quietly.

"You've got them," said Graham. "When the next balance comes out you'll have a good many more. The question is, what you're going to do with them now they're yours?"

Winston took out a letter from Dane and passed it across to Graham.

"I'm sorry to tell you the Colonel is getting no better," it ran. "The specialist we brought in seems to think he will never be quite himself again, and, now he has let the reins go, things are falling to pieces at Silverdale. Somebody left Atterly a pile of money, and he is going back to the old country. Carshalton is going too, and, as they can't sell out to any one we don't approve of, the rest insisted on me seeing you. I purpose starting tomorrow."

"What happened to Colonel Barrington?" asked Graham.

"His sleigh turned over," said Winston. "Horse trampled on him, and it was an hour or two before his hired man could get him under shelter!"

"You would be content to turn farmer again?"

"I think I would," said Winston. "At least, at Silverdale."

Graham made a little grimace. "Well," he said resignedly, "I guess it's human nature, but I'm thankful now and then there's nothing about me but my money that would take the eye of any young woman. I figure they're kind of useful to wake up a man so he'll stir round looking for something to offer one of them, but he's apt to find his business must go second when she has got it and him, and he has to waste on house fixings what would give a man a fair start in life. Still, it's no use talking. What have you told him?"

Winston laughed a little. "Nothing," he said. "I will let him come and you shall have my decision when I've been to Silverdale."

It was next day when Dane arrived at Winnipeg, and Winston listened gravely to all he had to tell him.

"I have two questions to ask," he said. "Would the others be unanimous in receiving me, and does Colonel Barrington know of your mission?"

"Yes to both" said Dane. "We haven't a man there who would not hold out his hand to you, and Barrington has been worrying and talking a good deal about you lately. He seems to fancy nothing has gone right at Silverdale since you left it, and others share his opinion. The fact is, the old man is losing his grip tolerably rapidly."

"Then," said Winston quietly, "I'll go down with you, but I can make no promise until I have heard the others."

Dane smiled a little. "That is all I want. I don't know whether I told you that Maud Barrington is there. Would tomorrow suit you?"

"No," said Winston. "I will come today."

It was early next morning when they stepped out of the stove-warmed car into the stinging cold of the prairie. Fur-clad figures, showing shapeless in the creeping light, clustered about them, and Winston felt himself thumped on the shoulders by mittened hands, while Alfreton's young voice broke through the murmurs of welcome.

"Let him alone while he's hungry," he said. "It's the first time in its history they've had breakfast ready at this hour in the hotel. Come along, Winston. It—is—ready."

The greetings might, of course, have been expressed differently, but Winston also was not addicted to displaying all he felt, and the little ring in the lads' voices was enough for him. As they moved towards the hotel he saw that Dane was looking at him.

"Well?" said the latter, "you see they want you."

That was probably the most hilarious breakfast that had ever been held in the wooden hotel, and before it was over, three of his campanions had said to Winston, "Of course you'll drive in with me!"

"Boys," he said, as they put their furs on, and his voice shook a trifle, "I can't ride in with everybody who has asked me unless you dismember me."

Finally Afreton, who was a trifle too quick for the others, got him into his sleigh, and they swept out behind a splendid team into the frozen stillness of the prairie. The white leagues rolled behind them, the cold grew intense, but while Winston was for the most part silent, and apparently preoccupied, Alfreton talked almost incessantly, and only once looked grave. That happened when Winston asked about Colonel Barrington.

The lad shook his head. "I scarcely think he will ever take hold again," he said. "You will understand me better when you see him."

They stopped a while at mid-day at an outlying farm, but Winston glanced inquiringly at Alfreton when one of the sleighs went on. The lad smiled at him.

"Yes," he said. "He is going on to tell them we have got you."

"They would have found it out in a few more hours," said Winston.

Alfreton's eyes twinkled. "No doubt they would," he said dryly. "Still, you see, somebody was offering two to one that Dane couldn't bring you, and you know we're generally keen about any kind of wager!"

The explanation, which was not quite out of keeping with the customs of the younger men at Silverdale, did not content Winston, but he said nothing. So far his return had resembled a triumph, and while the sincerity of the welcome had its effect on him, he shrank a little from what he fancied might be waiting him.

The creeping darkness found them still upon the waste, and the cold grew keener when the stars peeped out. Even sound seemed frozen, and the faint muffled beat of hoofs unreal and out of place in the icy stillness of the wilderness. Still, the horses knew they were nearing home, and swung into faster pace, while the men drew fur caps down, and the robes closer round them as the draught their passage made stung them with a cold that seemed to sear the skin where there was an inch left uncovered. Now and then a clump of willows or a birch bluff flitted out of the dimness, grew a trifle blacker, and was left behind, but there was still no sign of habitation, and Alfreton, too chilled at last to speak, passed the reins to Winston, and beat his mittened hands. Winston could scarcely grasp them, for he had lived of late in the cities, and the cold he had been sheltered from was numbing.

For another hour they slid onwards, and then a dim blur crept out of the white waste. It rose higher, cutting more blackly against the sky, and Winston recognized with a curious little quiver the birch bluff that sheltered Silverdale Grange. Then as they swept through the gloom of it, a row of ruddy lights blinked across the snow, and Winston felt his heart beat as he watched the homestead grow into form. He had first come there as an impostor, and had left it an outcast, while now it was amid the acclamations of those who had once looked on him with suspicion he was coming back again.

Still, he was almost too cold for any definite feeling but the sting of the frost, and it was very stiffly he stood up, shaken by vague emotions, when at last the horses stopped. A great door swung open, somebody grasped his hand, there was a murmur of voices, and partly dazed by the change of temperature he blundered into the warmth of the hall. The blaze of light bewildered him, and he was but dimly sensible that the men who greeted him were helping him to shake off his furs, while the next thing he was sure of was that a little white-haired lady was holding out her hand.

"We are very glad to see you back," she said, with a simplicity that yet suggested stateliness. "Your friends insisted on coming over to welcome you, and Dane will not let you keep them waiting too long. Dinner is almost ready."

Winston could not remember what he answered, but Miss Barrington smiled at him as she moved away, for the flush in his face was very eloquent. The man was very grateful for that greeting, and what it implied. It was a few minutes later when he found himself alone with Dane, who laughed softly as he nodded to him.

"You are convinced at last?" he said. "Still, there is a little more of the same thing to be faced, and, if it would relieve you, I will send for Alfreton, who has some taste in that direction, to fix that tie for you. You have been five minutes over it, and it evidently does not please you. It's the first time I've ever seen you worry about your dress."

Winston turned, and a curious smile crept into his face as he laid a lean hand that shook a little on the toilet table.

"I also think it's the first time these fingers wouldn't do what I wanted them. You can deduce what you please from that," he said.

(Copyright, 1907, F. A. Stokes Co.)

Dane only nodded, and when they went down together laid a kindly grasp upon his comrade's arm as he led him into the great dining-room. Every man at Silverdale was apparently there, as were most of the women, and Winston stood still a moment, very erect with shoulders square, because the posture enabled him to conceal the tremor that ran through him when he saw the smiling faces turned upon him. Then he moved slowly down the room towards Maud Barrington, and felt her hand rest for a second between his fingers, which he feared were to responsive. After that, everybody seemed to speak to him, and he was glad when he found himself sitting next to Miss Barrington at the head of the long table, with her niece opposite him.

He could not remember what he or the others talked about during the meal, but he had a vague notion that there was now and then a islence of attention when he answered a question, and that the little lady's face grew momentarily grave when, as the voices sank a trifle, he turned to her.

"I would have paid my respects to Colonel Barrington, but Dane did not consider it advisable," he said.

"No," said Miss Barrington. "He has talked a good deal about you during the last two days, but he is sleeping now, and we did not care to disturb him. I am afraid you will find a great change in him when you see him."

Winston asked no more questions on that topic until later in the evening, when he found a place apart from the rest by Miss Barrington's side. He fancied this would not have happened without her connivance, and she seemed graver than usual when he stood by her chair.

"I don't wish to pain you, but I surmise that Colonel Barrington is scarcely well enough to be consulted about anything of importance just now," he said.

Miss Barrington made a little gesture of assent. "We usually pay him the compliment, but I am almost afraid he will never make a decision of moment again."

"Then," said Winston slowly, "you stand in his place, and I fancy you know why I have come back to Silverdale. Will you listen for a very few minutes while I tell you about my parents and what my upbringing has been? I must return to Winnipeg, for a time at least, tomorrow."

Miss Barrington singed her willingness, and the man spoke rapidly with a faint trace of hoarseness. Then he looked down on her.

"Madam," he said, "I have told you everything partly from respect for those who only by a grim sacrifice did what they could for me, and that you may realize the difference between myself and the rest at Silverdale. I want to be honest now at least, and I discovered, not without bitterness at the time, that the barriers between our castes are strong in the old country.

Miss Barrington smiled a little. "Have I ever made you feel it here?"

"No," said Winston gravely. "Still, I am going to put your forbearance to a strenuous test. I want your approval. I have a question to ask your niece tonight."

"If I withheld it?"

"It would hurt me," said Winston. "Still, I would not be astonished, and I could not blame you."

"But it would make no difference?"

"Yes," said Winston gravely. "It would, but it would not cause me to desist. Nothing would do that, if Miss Barrington can overlook the past."

The little white-haired lady smiled at him. "Then," she said, "if it is any comfort to you, you have my good wishes. I do not know what Maud's decision will be, but that is the spirit which would have induced me to listen in times long gone by!"

She rose and left him, and it may have been by her arranging that shortly afterwards Winston found Maud Barrington passing through the dimly-lighted hall. He opened the door she moved towards it a trifle, and then stood facing her, with it in his hand.

"Will you wait a moment, and then you may pass if you wish," he said. "I had one great inducement for coming here tonight. I wonder if you know what it is?"

The girl stood still and met his gaze, though, dim as the light was, the man could see the crimson in her cheeks.

"Yes," she said, very quietly.

"Then," said Winston, with a little smile, though the fingers on the door quivered visibly, "I think the audacity you once mentioned must have returned to me, for I am going to make a very great venture."

For a moment Maud Barrington turned her eyes away. "It is the daring venture that most frequently succeeds."

Then she felt the man's hand on her shoulder, and that he was compelling her to look up at him.

"It is you I came for," he said quietly. "Still, for you know the wrong I have done, I dare not urge you, and have little to offer. It is you who must give everything, if you can come down from your station and be content with mine."

"One thing," said Maud Barrington, very softly, "is, however, necessary."

"That," said Winston, "was yours ever since we spent the night in the snow."

The girl felt his grip upon her shoulder grow almost painful, but her eyes shone softly when she lifted her head again.

"Then," she said, "what I can give is yours —and it seems you have already taken possession."

Winston drew her towards him, and it may have been by Miss Barrington's arranging that nobody entered the hall, but at last the girl glanced up at the man half-shyly as she said, "Why did you wait so long?"

"It was well worth while," said Winston. "Still, I think you know."

"Yes," said Maud Barrington softly. "Now, at least, I can tell you I am glad you went away—but if you had asked me I would have gone with you."

It was some little time later when Miss Barrington came in and, after a glance at Winston, kissed her niece. Then she turned to the man. "My brother is asking for you," she said. "Will you come up with me?"

Winston followed her, and hid his astonishment when he found Colonel Barrington lying in a big chair. His face was haggard and pale, his form seemed to have grown limp and fragile, and the hand he held out trembled.

"Lance," he said, "I am very pleased to have you come home again. I hear you have done wonders in the city, but you are, I think, the first of your family who could ever make money. I have, as you will see, not been well lately."

"I am relieved to find you better than I expected, sir," said Winston quietly. "Still, I fancy you are forgetting what I told you the night I went away."

Barrington nodded, and then made a little impatient gesture. "There was something unpleasant, but my memory seems to be going, and my sister has forgiven you. I know you did a good deal for us at Silverdale, and showed yourself a match for the best of them in the city. That pleases me. By and by, you will take hold here after me."

Winston glanced at Miss Barrington, who smiled somewhat sadly.

"I am glad you mentioned that, sir, because I purpose staying at Silverdale now," he said. "It leads up to what I have to ask you."

Barrington's perceptions seemed to grow clearer, and he asked a few pertinent questions before he nodded approbation.

"Yes," he said, "she is a good girl—a very good girl, and it would be a suitable match. I should like somebody to send for her."

Maud Barrington came in softly, with a little glow in her eyes and a flush on she face, and Barrington smiled at her.

"My dear, I am very pleased, and I wish you every happiness," he said. "Once I would scarcely have trusted you to Lance, but he will forgive me, and has shown me that I was wrong. You and he will make Silverdale famous, and it is comforting to know, now my rest is very near, that you have chosen a man of your own station to follow me. With all our faults and blunders, blood is bound to tell."

Winston saw that Miss Barrington's eyes were a trifle misty, and he felt his face grow hot, but the girl's fingers touched his arm, and he followed, when, while her aunt signed approbation, she led him away. Then when they stood outside she laid her hands upon his face and drew it down to her.

"You will forget it, dear, and he is still wrong. If you had been Lance Courthorne I should never have done this," she said.

"No," said the man gravely. "I think there are many ways in which he is right, but you can be content with Winston the prairie farmer?"

Maud Barrington drew closer to him with a little smile in her eyes. "Yes," she said. "There never was a Courthorne who could stand beside him."

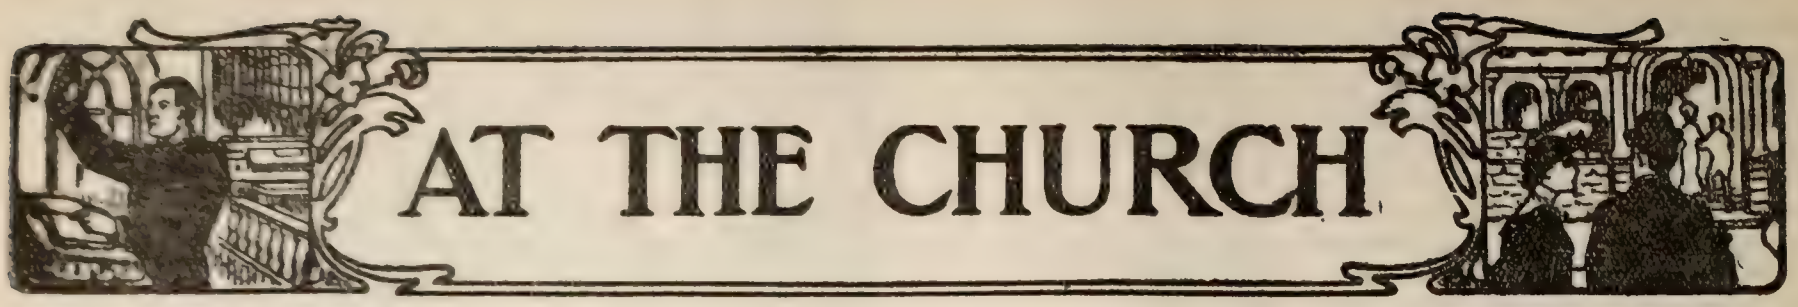
Will commence a New Serial entitled

"The Finding of Camilla"

BY LUCIE E. JACKSON

Author of "Feadora's Failure," "For Muriel's Sake," etc.



A Splendid Story of English Life

The reader's interest will be aroused at the start by a most thrilling description of a wreck at sea, and will be kept up clear through the story until the last chapter is closed. There is a dear little girl in this serial who will interest the smaller folks greatly. The story is not one entirely for children but will attract the older folks as well.

Sunday School Lesson

By Herbert L. Willett

Corinth and the East*

When Paul left Athens, after his disappointing experience there, and without tarrying for the arrival of his friends, Silas and Timothy, he went direct to Corinth across the Saronic Gulf. Corinth was the "Vanity Fair" of the world in the first Christian century. It was London and Paris combined in its pursuit of wealth and pleasure. From the top of its tall Acrocorinthus, the mountain that towered upward behind the city, the statue of Venus the goddess of pleasure looked across the leagues of land and sea into the face of the beautiful, calm-eyed Athena, whose statue of marble and gold was the crowning masterpiece of the Acropolis at Athens.

Modern Corinth.

The city that was once so busy and so full of restless ambition and frivolity is now a thing of the past. A few pillars of the Temple remain, and modern excavators from America have uncovered remains of baths, a market place, a synagogue (is it the one in which Paul spoke?) and other public buildings. Over its site the Greek shepherds lead their flocks, and the tourists, hurrying from Athens to the harbor of Patras, stop for a few hours to wander over the place, or climb the Acrocorinthus, or sometimes, perhaps, read Paul's epistles to the Corinthians.

Aquila and Priscilla.

In this city, which must have contained a considerable Jewish population, Paul made the acquaintance of a man and woman who were destined to play a most interesting part in his subsequent career. Aquila and Priscilla were Jews who had recently come from Rome, following the edict which the Emperor Claudius had promulgated, expelling the Jews as a hated race from that city. This edict was never fully enforced, but large numbers of Jews, objectionable from the standpoint of Roman prejudice, were driven out of Italy. Aquila and Priscilla were people of personal worth, already Christians, perhaps through the preaching of the gospel in the capitol. If there is any reason for the frequent mention of Priscilla's name before that of her husband, it may lie in her superior social station or her greater native ability. Recent commentators upon the New Testament, notably Professor Harnack of Berlin, have inclined to the belief that this woman was the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews.

Tent Weavers.

Paul was drawn to them both by community of race and of craft, for the trade which he had learned as a youth in the city of Tarsus—the weaving of goats' hair into tent cloth or sail cloth, used by the Roman troops and ships—was their occupation as well.

News from the North.

According to his custom, Paul soon found the Corinthian synagogue where he could meet the people of his own race. And here, using his opportunities, he spoke to them often of the new faith. He presented his familiar arguments for the Messiahship of Jesus and secured the adherence of a number of Jews and proselytes. In the midst of this career of evangelism he was greatly encouraged by the arrival of Silas and Timothy from Thessalonica and Berea. They had probably gone first to Athens, and then followed him to Corinth. The news they brought regarding those churches was so encouraging that Paul immediately passed from a feeling of deep depression, owing to his uncertainty of the affairs in the north, to one of the greatest satisfaction and joy. His words to the church in Thessalonica in the two letters which were written at this time assure us of the delight he felt in the faithfulness of his new converts in Macedonia. These two epistles, apparently written very near together, should be read in connection with this lesson. Encouraged by these events, Paul redoubled his campaign of preaching in Corinth, proclaiming the gospel of Christ with fresh urgency.

In the Synagogue.

He found ready listeners. But there were many who opposed his teachings and attempted to thwart his success. These were chiefly of his own race, whose prejudices had been aroused by the preaching of a faith broader than their own. In disgust with their provincialism, Paul turned from them with the familiar Jewish gesture of shaking out his robe, as if to free himself from any clinging dust of such an assembly. Henceforth, he said, his way was clear. He had always gone first to his own people, but now he would go boldly to the Gentiles with the gospel which he loved.

His New Quarters.

He took up new quarters very close to the synagogue in a hired house, belonging to a worthy proselyte named Titus Justus, and a fresh period of success was the result. Even the chief man of the synagogue, Crispus, accepted the gospel with his household, and many others in that volatile and pleasure-loving city believed and were baptized. Paul was greatly encouraged by these events and by the divine assurance that the Lord was with him in his great campaign, which continued for eighteen months in that city.

Jewish Opposition.

It was during this time that an episode occurred which brought Paul into direct contact with one of the most brilliant men of the age, although that contact is one of the surprising and discreditable incidents in the career of Galleo. He was a Roman proconsul of the province of Greece. He was a brother of the Roman poet and philosopher, Seneca, who said of him that Galleo was more courteous to the merest stranger than any other man was to his best friend. The Jews, deeply stirred by Paul's success, attempted a movement to have his work interrupted by his arrest and punishment for disturbing the peace. Prepared to make a bold showing before the officials, they presented themselves, with Sosthenes, the ruler of the synagogue who had succeeded Crispus, as their leader, and Paul as the accused. When they reached Galleo's judgment hall, they made clamorous demand for the apostle's condemnation, alleging that he was forsaking the traditions and was overturning the customs of the community.

"Careless Galleo."

Galleo was in no pleasant mood that day. Probably he little suspected that his portrait was being drawn for all future time in that odd moment of his proconsulate. Perhaps, if he had known that the story would be told in the most widely circulated book in the world, he would have been more attentive to that accused Jew who stood before him, ready to defend himself with one of those masterful utterances for which Paul was noted. But Galleo disliked exceedingly to be disturbed by such matters. He told the Jews point plank that if it was a question of sedition or of outrage, he was willing to listen to them; but with technical considerations concerning their religion, which he considered a mere superstition, he had no wish to spend his time. And ordering his lictors to clear the court, he dismissed the matter with contempt. Thus the world lost the opportunity to see a Roman governor and a Christian teacher face to face in the serious consideration of the claims of our common faith. "And Galleo cared for none of these things."

Back to Syria.

Soon after this Paul left Corinth with his two friends, Aquila and Priscilla, who were going across the Aegean Sea to Ephesus. But he was bound for Jerusalem where he wished to absolve himself from a vow taken in the process of his work, and also to make his report to the elders of the Jerusalem church, placing the offering he had gathered for the mother church in their hands. But he seems not to have stayed long in Jerusalem. There is almost a pathetic note of haste in the statement that when he had spoken to them, he went down to Antioch. Perhaps his welcome in Jerusalem was not very cordial. He was, in the thought of many of the conservatives there, a dangerous and disturbing innovator. But he knew that at Antioch, at last, he would find a warm welcome of genuine Christian confidence, and it was to that city on the Orotes that he now returned at the close of his second missionary journey.

What the Secretary Liked.

A well-known Washington editor was walking in front of a leading hotel recently when Secretary Luke Wright hailed him for a chat.

"By the way, Blank," said the Secretary, "I saw several mighty good things in your paper yesterday."

"I'm glad you liked them," said the editor, beaming with satisfaction. "It always helps an editor to find out what his readers like. What were the articles you liked?"

"The articles," said the Secretary earnestly, "were three fat mince-pies wrapped up in your yesterday's issue."—Lippincott's.

Prayer Meeting

By Silas Jones

JESUS THE SON OF MAN.

Topic, July 28. Matt. 16:13; Heb. 2:5-18.

What men say of the Son of man is of less importance for me than my own convictions concerning him. Common opinion is a rough guess and never gets to the inner side of a fact or personality. It takes account of the gross structure and changes of society but is worthless as a criticism of motives. That Christianity has abolished certain crude forms of wickedness or at least put them under the ban of public sentiment can be seen by all. But how many are quick to see the inconsistencies that hide themselves under the conventionalities and customs to which they do honor? Jesus seems to have made little of what men said of him but much of what his disciples thought and felt. The multitude measured him by what had been and with no deep insight into the meaning of prophetic lives and teachings; the disciples were beginning to see him as he was and to become attached to him in a way that meant their rejection of the popular program for the kingdom of God. For us it is highly important that we seek the stimulation that comes from contact with souls enriched by close fellowship with the Son of man. It is still more important that we become his personal disciples and learn his message and receive of his spirit with as little mediation as possible.

The Promise of Dominion.

"Subdue it" is the word to man in the first chapter of the Bible respecting the earth and its forces, animate and inanimate. Naturally the first attempts of man to bring all things into subjection to himself were directed toward the things without him. He learned the need of self discipline through his attempts to control the world about him. Too often, if he thought of himself as like God, it was only God's power he had in mind. He delighted that he could compel not only nature but men to serve him. The dominion which is promised in the Son of man has other objects than those which ambitious captains and kings have sought. The way of Jesus is that a man begin with his own heart and make himself fit to exercise dominion. The chief desire of one who follows the Son of man is to be fit to rule, not to rule without regard to fitness. This is the difference between the statesman and the demagogue, the minister of Christ and the religious brigand who parades as a minister, the devout scholar and teacher and the pedagogical charlatan.

The Discipline of Suffering.

The pagan notion that suffering is always a punishment for sin lingers with us. We worship the successful man and despise the one who fails and trouble ourselves not about the characters of the two. If we do not learn it from the prophets, we ought to learn it from the Son of man that suffering has power to purify the spirit and give it the humility that is becoming in the children of God. It has been said that there is no spiritual originality without the discipline of doubt and suffering. The one whose every wish is gratified becomes impoverished in soul. The perfection of Jesus was gained through suffering. Back of the calmness with which he met the brutal attacks of his stupid countrymen and back of the keen discrimination which separated wisdom from folly in the opinions of men was a life of steadfast devotion to the right in spite of bitter hardships. This is what we forget when we seek wisdom and spiritual power. We would have the gifts without paying the price.

The Faithful High Priest.

The Christ of metaphysical speculation has no hold on our affections. It is no wonder that devout Catholics turn to Mary when the Master was removed from participation in true human experiences. We are brought to God by one who is like us. The exhortations of angels would not stir our hearts. Christ is the merciful and faithful high priest because he endured temptation as we must endure it. How the sinless one could be tempted we may not be able to explain but this is no reason why we should think of his temptations as something unreal, as only a form. We love our Master because he lived the life of perfect fidelity to God in the midst of fierce assaults upon his integrity and loyalty. This is our consolation in every hour of weakness. He knows the hard, bitter way, and he assures us that we can succeed. He does not promise an easy victory but one that is worth while after it has been won. If he believes in us we ought to believe in ourselves.

Democracy

Come, I will make the continent indissoluble,
I will make the most splendid race the sun ever shone upon,
I will make divine magnetic lands,
With the love of comrades,
With the life-long love of comrades.

I will plant companionship thick as trees along all the rivers of America, and along the shores of the great lakes, and all over the prairies,

I will make inseparable cities with their arms about each other's necks,
By the love of comrades,
By the manly love of comrades.

—Walt Whitman.

Christian Endeavor Lesson

TOPIC FOR AUGUST 1.

Life Lessons for Me from the Book of Acts. Acts 27:18-44. (Consecration Meeting.)

The book of Acts is a record of beginnings. It tells how the Christian religion spread and how the church came into existence. The address of Stephen, Ch. 7, the longest in the book, is a defense for the wider preaching of the gospel. The whole book is saturated with the missionary spirit, with the heroic, and with the picturesque progress of Paul. Aside from Ch. 9, the first twelve chapters relate chiefly to Peter, and the remaining chapters to Paul.

The book has a remarkable summary of great sermons and addresses: by Peter, at Pentecost, 2:14-42; in the temple, 3:11-26; to the high priest, 5:27-32; at Jerusalem, 11:1-18, 15:7-12; by James, 15:13-21; by Stephen: Ch. 7; by Paul: at Antioch, 13:16-42; at Lystra, 14:11-18; at Athens, 17:16-34; at Miletus, 20:17-35; at Jerusalem, 22 and 23; before Feliz, 24; before Agrippa, 26. It will be a profitable thing to study these speeches and thus to get at the great convictions which moved the early church. They were intensely loyal to Jesus, risen from the dead, accepted as Lord, and devoutly loved as friend. Acts 24 is said by many to be one of the finest chapters in the Bible to read.

These early Christians carried the gospel to everybody. Thus the Gentiles were reached, and the church approved—Ch. 15. Christianity began as a religion for everybody. It has always been missionary in spirit. It loses power when that spirit is omitted. To be a Christian one must have the missionary spirit. No life has an adequate purpose when it treats the gospel as a message merely for America, or for white men. That question was forever settled by the command of Christ, Mark 16:15, and by the success of Paul in teaching Greeks and barbarians. Is your conception of Christianity as broad as the beginnings of it were?

The first preachers struck for the cities as strategic centers. Look at the list: Jerusalem, Ch. 6:7; Samaria, 8:5; Damascus, 9:19-20; Antioch, 13:1, 44; Iconium, Lystra, Derbe, 14; Philippi, 16:12; Athens, 17; Corinth, 18; Ephesus, 19:17; Rome, 25:12; 28:16-31. We must conquer the cities today or they will conquer us. More and more our population centers there. All races are there. All the forces for good and for evil are at their height there. It is tremendously important that you support your church, and her missions in your city. You, young man, young woman, have most time and strength. Have you vision that will make you see the need? Read "The Challenge of the City," by Dr. Josiah Strong.

Progress and persecution go hand in hand. That is only another way of saying that it costs to be a real Christian. In America we Are not killed for being Christians, but we may be laughed at, or ostracized, or our daily work be made difficult. Read how the early church accepted persecution: 2:13, 4:3, 17:21, 5:17-18, 33, 41-42, 6:10-15, 7:54-60, 8:1-4, 9:1-2, 23-25, 11:19-20, 12:2-3, 13:45, 50, 14:5, 6, 19-22, 16:19-24, 17:5-9, 20:3, 21:33, 23:11, 24:2, 25:11, II. Cor. 11:23-33. If your religion cost you as much as it cost the early Christians————?

It was specially remembered of Jesus that "He went about doing good," 10:38. For what do you plan to be remembered? I have heard of a western man who died and a sympathetic stranger inquired, "What complaint?" To which the native unconcernedly replied, "Oh, no complaint. Everybody was perfectly satisfied."

"To live in hearts we leave behind us,
Is not to die."

The follower of Jesus ought to leave some mark upon his community which both blesses and uplifts it.

SENTENCE SERMONS.

Conceit deceives only its owner.

No man ascends above his ideals.

Every man's life depends on the size of his god.

No man has any rights that lead others wrong.

The man who has no piety to spare has none to save.

It is easy to mistake self-approbation for reformation.

All the stiffness in a man's neck is taken out of his back.

Piety adopted because it pays costs more than it is worth.

It is always safe to idealize the real if you realize the ideal.

The pessimist always puts his best corns forward in a crowd.

HIS JUST DESERTS.

Smith slapped Jones on the back.

"Hello, old chap!" he gurgled familiarly. "I'll wager fifty dollars you don't recall me!"

Jones gave him an icy stare.

"You win!" he said, passing on.—Lippincott's.

Chicago—Pittsburg

The Pittsburg Churches and the Foreign Peoples

By O. F. Jordan

Whenever we are in a strange city, we want to see the Christian church and its preacher among the first of our experiences. At Pittsburg, we were fortunate enought to arrive on a morning when the ministers were to meet. We immediately arranged to be with them. As the Pittsburg preachers filed in, we were surprised at their number. There are twenty churches and missions in Pittsburgh in a population of a million people. We had not known there were so many. We were surprised and delighted with the gathering. The traveler knows there is no hospitality like that of the Christian church. There is an orthodox way of shaking hands in that church. These Pittsburg preachers greeted us in orthodox fashion and in the warmth of their hospitality made us feel entirely at home in their midst. They are a loyal, hard-working and capable group. They have homogeneity and esprit de corps.

The Pittsburg Preachers.

We are always interested in any group of ministers. There is the man who has read that the walls of Jericho fell at the blowing of horns and he tries to take all modern Jerichos by the same method. There is the self appointed defender of the faith who draws his sword in defense of "mother's Bible" at the rustling of a leaf and proceeds to hew some heretical Agag to pieces before the Lord. There are the daring innovators who either offend in using the strange speech of the moderns in a camp of the patriarchs or who even venture to think new thoughts. There is pessimist and optimist. There is rationalist and mystic.

We did not find all of these types in Pittsburg. We did find a young man who read an alleged heretical paper last winter and who has since been compelled to wear the nom de plume of "Willett" because of a supposed advanced position. The Pittsburg preachers, however, are for the most part like their city. They are all business. Confronted with the problems of a heterogeneous population, they are bravely trying to solve the problems in their community. They are succeeding. The last fifteen years in Pittsburg has marked an epoch there as in Chicago.

In one problem, they have taken advanced ground, and we were glad to be learners at their feet. They have attacked the problem of foreign evangelization vigorously. In three different churches attempts have been made and in two of the churches we now have the work actually going on and meeting with success.

An Amusing Incident.

Our brethren have had to devise their own methods. Sometimes they have been misunderstood. An interesting story will illustrate this. One of our preachers was trying to teach a group of Italian children the truths of modern sanitation which were sadly needed in their ill-smelling quarters. In his boyhood days the multiplication table had been taught in a song and he conceived the idea of teaching sanitation by the same method. His class of young Italians was taught to sing, "Boila water! Boila water! Killa Germ! Killa Germ!" On the following morning after this song was taught, an irate Italian appeared at the preacher's door and said excitedly, "I t'ink I ought to kill you!" Our preacher stammered out a frightened inquiry as to the reason of this conviction. "You teach my children criminal and seditious language!" declared the Italian. The preacher denied this charge and asked for specifications. Then the Italian said, "Did you not teach my children to sing, 'Boila water! Boila water! Killa Germans! Killa Germans!' Is that not criminal?" The Italian colony is surrounded by Germans and there is much bad blood between them, hence the children the more readily improved upon the song taught them.

Serious Work.

If this work has its amusing side, it has its serious side as well. We spent an evening in the Homestead church watching a class of thirty eager and alert young Russians getting their elementary lessons in English. With what triumph did they finally achieve to say in passible English, "This man is my dear father. This woman is my dear mother." There was pathos in their desire to acquire the language that would make them freer men.

The Homestead Church.

The Homestead church also works among Bulgarians, Servians, Croatians and Roumanians. This is made possible through the linguistic ability of Basil Keusseff, the missionary helper of the Homestead church, of which D. R. Moss is pastor. Mr. Keusseff speaks six Slavonic languages. This gives him entrance to a large part of the factory population of Homestead. Mr. Keusseff was a Baptist minister in Bulgaria for seven years, where he organized a church and built a brick house of worship. On coming to America he was employed among the Baptists of Pennsylvania. Seven years ago he became acquainted with the Disciples and believed that he found here "the more perfect way of the Lord." He resigned his position as a Baptist missionary and for a time worked as an employe of the Westinghouse company. He was later employed by the western Pennsylvania missionary society for work among the factory populations of Pittsburg.

Attitude Toward Church.

Brother Keusseff finds his foreign populations predominantly socialistic with some anarchists among them. They have a profound distrust of the church. He proceeds cautiously, not attempting to present the gospel at first. He teaches them, acts as their interpreter, writes their letters, settles their disputes and makes himself essential to them through social service. His position once secure, he dares to present the gospel. Taking a portable organ and a musician, he visits weddings and other social functions and sings gospel songs with short gospel talks interspersed. At times beer bottles have been tossed at his head and water jugs emptied on him, but for the most part he is welcome and the dance and the feast of the wedding hour are interrupted for the message of the gospel in song and story.

So far a sufficient number of converts has been made to assure him that the enterprise is success even from the point of view of propaganda. Twenty-four people have been converted, four being Croatians, four Servians, and the remainder Bulgarians. Two of these converts have been appointed for work among their fellow-countrymen. In addition, a young lady convert is training for a missionary and a young man is studying for the ministry in Bethany college. This is a splendid showing for three years' work. The Homestead church now has a hall for the Bulgarians in a back room, but conducts the Russian class in the church. As many as sixty Russians have attended at a single session of the class.

Other efforts at reaching the alien population have been carried on. The old Central church had a class among Italians but it has been discontinued. An interesting work has just been begun at the MacKees Rocks church by the pastor, C. A. MacDonald. He has a group of Italians to whom he is teaching the English language and preparing the way for later gospel work. His work is well spoken of in Pittsburg.

Preparing for Centennial.

Our ministers have the additional burden just now of the Centennial. The committee has to raise twenty thousand dollars in and out of the churches for expenses, though a considerable part of this burden will be borne by the business men. An even more stupendous undertaking is to secure rooms in dwelling houses for forty thousand people. The preachers are making the canvass in person in most cases. They satisfy themselves that the home is Christian and a proper place. They secure them in all of the denominations. Even Roman priests have been kind enough to help forward this campaign to get homes. The price of lodging in homes will be fifty to seventy-five cents a night. Hotel rates are $1.50 one in a room and $2.50 two in a room on the European plan. We cannot too forcibly remind our brethren that if they want in a hotel, they must engage rooms at once. Those wishing to stop at the Hotel Henry, Christian Century headquarters, should write this office at once.

One of our preachers serves every day as a guide to pilot advance agents over the city. This latter service is a most thoughtful one which every visitor appreciates. Mr. Knepper was assigned to us. We would have given him a good race down State street, but on his native hills he made us feel hurried. He prepared us that afternoon for our trip to the Alps. But thanks to his intelligent guidance and his kindly solicitude to further our plans, we did what would have taken a stranger several days, in a single afternoon.

When we get to Pittsburg, not the least of our privileges will be to meet our brethren in the churches. Our preachers are manly fellows with social sympathies. They sense the task of the church in this age. They toil in common with the pastors of other cities of America for the realization of Christianity's great dream of a regenerated earth. To shake the hands of those who make foreign missionary sacrifices at home will be no small privilege.

Chicago Church Notes.

Dr. Willett and family are spending a few weeks at Pentwater.

The Monroe St. Sunday-school held a picnic at Lincoln Park last Saturday.

A. W. Taylor has returned from Eureka and is again at work in the University.

E. A. Henry is back from the Holy Land and is available for work in the churches.

Six have been added to the membership of the West End Church the last few weeks.

Dr. Willett preached the baccalaureate sermon at the commencement exercises of the University of Kansas this year.

No pastor has been secured yet at the Jackson Boulevard church, though a number of names are under consideration.

Rev. Austin Hunter spent a few hours in Chicago on his return from the west last week.

W. D. Endres, pastor at Harvey, is studying in the University of Chicago again this summer.

A. W. Taylor was out of the city the first two weeks in July, presiding over a Chautauqua at Eureka, Illinois.

Dr. Dye cabled A. W. Taylor from England. He is now on his road to Belgium, where he will interview the government authorities before going on to the Congo region.

H. F. Burns has resigned his charge at Douglas Park and will divide his time between the Christian Century and the University.

The Sheffield church has been having a fine ingathering the past three months at the regular services. Twenty have been added to the membership of the church.

Another Disciple has been added to the faculty of the University of Chicago. Prof. W. L. Carr of Indianapolis has been added to the Latin department. He will work in the Hyde Park church.

C. M. Kreidler, pastor of the West End Church, will spend four weeks of August in Baltimore. He will arrange for supply while he is gone. He has property interests there which he will look after.

The series of lectures on "The Psychology of Religion," given at the University of Chicago by Professor Ames, are attracting large audiences. So great is the interest that the meetings have been taken to Mandel Hall.

W. D. Endres has completed a year's service at Harvey. There has been a net gain in the membership during the year of forty-six people. This is one of the best gains that has been made by any Chicago church during the year.

J. C. Wayman, an elder in the Memorial church and a brother of State's Attorney Wayman, is now in the East visiting relatives at Bethany. The State's Attorney is a graduate of Bethany and an enthusiastic son of his alma mater.

Mrs. E. W. Darst is spending the summer at the University of Chicago working in the School of Education. She is available for supply work and is a most acceptable speaker. Mr. Darst will visit the city during August. He will be remembered as one of our most efficient Superintendents of Missions.

A most pleasant evening was spent by the Disciples of the University of Chicago at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Errett Gates last Wednesday. About forty guests were present. Mr. and Miss Brelos, son and daughter of C. G. Brelos, Galveston, Texas, delighted the guests with instrumental and vocal music. Miss Schooler gave an interesting reading from a story of negro religious life by Miss Stuart. Mr. and Mrs. Gates are excellent hosts.

M. E. Chatley, formerly of Ravenna, Ohio, is beginning his work with the church at Bowling Green. Mr. Chatley made an enviable record at Ravenna.

"Christian Men" for July has on its front page an excellent likeness of Alexander Campbell. An appropriate place for so virile a face.

"What Makes the Minister a Soft-Hearted Chick?" is the heading of a very humorous and yet pointed article in Christian Men for July.

John R. Golden with five members of his church, the West Side, of Springfield, Ill., attended the Christian Endeavor convention in St. Paul.

M. M. Mass, of Bellingham, Washington, was ordained to the ministry, July 11. The service was conducted by J. T. Eshelman; sermons by R. E. Dunlap and T. J. Shuey.

Leslie Wolfe of Manilla, Philippine Islands, reports that baptisms are coming to be of almost daily occurrence in and about that city.

A good friend of the Foreign Society sends $1,000 on the Annuity Plan. Another from New York writes that she will send $2,500 in a few days.

A Centennial Club has been organized at Bloomfield, Ia., where F. D. Ferrall is pastor. They expect to send a large delegation to Pittsburg.

F. B. Sapp, Fargo, N. D., recently organized a church at Minot, where E. F. Boggess is now preaching one-fourth time. The city has a population of 10,000.

The church at Fargo, N. D., will construct a basement this autumn in which they will worship until complete building can be erected.

The officers of the Sixth District for the coming year are: President, J. I. Gunn, Arcola; Vice President, E. M. Smith, Decatur; Secretary, J. W. Walters, Sullivan.

After a six months' trip abroad, George H. Coombs, pastor of the Independence Boul. Church, has returned and will take up regular work again the first Sunday in August.

Claude E. Hill, pastor at Birmingham, Ala., has not been in good health during recent months and is compelled to discontinue a part of his work for a time.

The report that J. O. Rose had resigned as secretary of the Indiana State Board is a mistake. Mr. Rose wishes everyone to forget the announcement at once and send in their offering for state missions.

The death of Mrs. Knox P. Taylor of Bloomington, Ill., has just been announced. Mr. and Mrs. Taylor have for a long time been known as among the most valuable workers of the brotherhood.

The Alumni Association of Eureka College has adopted resolutions, urging each member to give heartiest support to the effort now being made to raise an endowment of $125,000 by September 1, 1910.

Texas appointed a committee on organization of Men's Brotherhoods during the recent convention at Corsicana. J. O. Shelburne of Dallas, is chairman, and F. F. Sanderson, Houston, is secretary.

A. R. Moore of Birmingham, Ala., recently gave an address before a union teacher training class, in the Parker Memorial Baptist Church, Anniston, Ala. His subject was "An Up-to-date Book."

Lathrop Cooley, the veteran minister of Ohio, is ill and the physicians give no hope of his recovery. He has been in the ministry sixty-five years. His present home is at Medina.

During August the First Church, Warren, Ohio, will be supplied by J. M. Van Horn, Toronto, Can.; F. A. Bright, Waynesburg, Pa.; L. H. Bush, Warren, Ohio, and the pastor, J. E. Lynn.

W. W. Burks has decided not to accept the call to the secretaryship of the Missouri Bible School Work. He will remain with his church at Nevada, Mo., at an increase in salary. J. H. Bryan has been made acting superintendent of the Bible school work.

H. H. Peters, Eureka, sends out a special announcement of lectures and addresses which he is prepared to make. Some of his subjects are: "Educational Ideals," "The Land of Tomorrow," "The Reign of the Mugwump."

Thomas Wallace, Columbus, Ind., has been called to the pastorate of the church at Rockland Center, Wis. This church which will entertain the state convention in September, has an up-to-date building and are ready for aggressive work.

The Sunday-school at Georgetown, Ill., which has an enrollment of 200, is conducting a contest for attendance. The special plan is to offer to those who are present twelve Sundays in the quarter a group photograph. Ninety of the 200 have enrolled in the contest.

The churches of Illinois should remember that the state missionary year closes July 31, and to be on the list of contributing churches this centennial year, their offerings must be sent to W. H. Land, Bloomington, Ill., without further delay. To procrastinate is to fail.

Speaking of the work in East Washington, a man who is well acquainted with the conditions says, "It is an exception if the Christian Church is not in the lead in those communities where it is represented." Chicago men might enjoy a vacation spent in Washington.

Mr. Settlemyer, teacher in the Nankin Christian College, China, writes, that there have been thirty-six baptisms among the young men and girls in our two schools there. He writes that seventy-five per cent of the students are now Christians. Revivals seem to be going on in all the stations in China.

The Board of Managers of the Colorado Christian Home are prepared to erect a beautiful $10,000 cottage. This is to be the first of a series of buildings to be erected and dedicated in the capital of the great Centennial State to the ministry of the Gospel of the Helping Hand.

Arkansas has a state Brotherhood. At state convention the following committee on organization was named and given power to

Chicago Headquarters at Pittsburg

The Hotel Henry has been chosen as Headquarters for Chicago people at the Centennial Convention. This is one of the best hotels in the city. Rates for the convention are $1.50 per day European plan, and $2.50 with two in a room. Prices range higher for rooms with bath. The hotel has a beautiful lobby where convention fellowship will be in full sway. It is new and modern and the manager is determined that nothing shall be left undone to make us quite at home during our stay in Pittsburg.

Chicago will be glad to be host to friends from all parts of the country who wish to stop at this hotel.

It is not one day too soon to make your reservation. We predict that hotel accommodations will soon be exhausted.

Most of the money for the Bible Colleges at Bolenge, Africa, and Vigan, Philippine Islands, has been raised. About $6,000 of the $50,000 remains to be secured to guarantee the $10,000 gift from R. A. Long of Kansas City. This needed amount should be speedily forthcoming. No finer investment could be made than money put into these evangelistic training schools.

Writing of the work of the North Dakota Agricultural College, F. B. Sapp, pastor of the church at Fargo, N. D., says: "With its 1,200 students the past year and with several hundred graduating from the Traction Engineering Course, means increased efficiency in farming and engineers to develop the state. Prof. F. E. Ladd, of this institution is author of our State Pure Food Laws which are the basis of our National Laws."

From the annual report of the church at Liberty, Mo., where R. G. Frank is minister, we note: total amount raised in all departments, $4,183.76; given for missions, $1,025.32; additions to the church, twenty-seven; net gain in membership, fourteen; the C. W. B. M. has a membership of seventy-seven; Bible school enrollment, 211; total resident membership, 433. Mr. Frank is president of the Missouri Convention for next year.

June 8, the Brotherhood of the Independence Avenue Church, Kansas City, gave a testimonial dinner to the National President, R. A. Long, who is a member of this church. Fifty-seven members were present. A fine address was given by Hon. H. M. Beardsley, former mayor of Kansas City. His subject was, "A Present Day Force in Church Work." President Long spoke on "Why are We Organized—What Purposes Will We Work Out in Our Organization?"

A. J. Bush has resigned his pastorate at Wichita Falls, Texas, to become the representative of the National Benevolent Association in the Southwest. Mr. Bush led the work of establishing Juliette Fowler Home for orphan and other unfortunate children in Texas. He proposes now to devote himself to the general needs of this Home, and to securing the remainder of the funds necessary to secure the new building for the old people.

The Laymen's Missionary Movement will conduct this fall and winter the greatest missionary campaign the world has ever seen. It is their purpose to hold sixty great men's missionary conventions in as many cities in the United States. All the missionary boards of America will co-operate in this work. The purpose is to enlist the Christian men of America in the greatest task given to man—the evangelization of the world.

C. B. Richards, for six years pastor at Petersburg, Va., has resigned and has become pastor of the three churches in Mathews county. Mr. Richards did a good work at Petersburg. He began with a small group of people, paying only $240 per year on the preacher's salary. He leaves them with a good building, seating 500 people, a membership of 200, a self-supporting church. The work which Mr. Richards started has great possibilities. We are not realizing the possibilities of the country church.

Alfred W. Place has recently held a meeting near the Imeprial University in Tokyo, with thirty-eight enquirers. Muryama, pastor of one of our Tokyo churches has also held a recent meeting with ten enquirers. There has recently been twenty-three baptisms in the Sendai district, Japan, where M. B. Madden ministers. In that section our missionaries have more than 1,000 pupils in the Sunday-school. There is an increase of thirty pupils over last year in the Drake Bible College, Tokyo.

It is somewhat interesting to note that a number of our strong churches have done nothing this year for the Gospel of the Helping Hand. The columns of our papers have re-echoed with the recital of the magnificent achievements of some of these churches in missions, evangelism, and Bible-school work; but we have heard not a word about the relief that they have given to "the widow and the orphan in their affliction." It is not too late yet for these great churches to remove this note of discord from their centennial anthem of thanksgiving.

Mrs F. O. McDougall-Morris, wife of the Rev. F. O. Morris, pastor at Marshalltown, Iowa, has been elected Dean of Women at Drake University to succeed Miss Mary Carpenter, who became Mrs. W. B. Craig a year ago. With over 600 women regularly enrolled in the university the position is a most important one. Mrs. Craig's splendid adaptability for the delicate duties of the office has made it a difficult place to fill since her resignation. The trustees believe that in Mrs. Morris a competent successor to Mrs. Craig has been found.

There are great openings for the church in the great Northwest. Frank E. Herttum, pastor of the little group at Georgetown, Washington, says there is no other church in the place. The young people have no other place to go than to saloons, wine rooms and places of vice. The people are anxious for a Union Church there. The owner of the pool rooms has given free of charge the use of a hall for church services. A member of the Presbyterian Church has donated three good lots for the church, and others are ready to help. Appeal is made to the Endeavorers for funds to help on this good work.

Mrs. Rowena Mason, who for fourteen years has served most efficiently as president of the Christian Orphan's Home in St. Louis, has resigned. Mrs. Mason devoted time, talent and money without stint to the beautiful ministry committed to her care. She had the satisfaction of seeing the Home grow from a comparatively insignificant beginning to its present splendid proportions and usefulness. She resigns because of needed rest. Mrs. Oreon E. Scott, a young woman of talent and consecration, has succeeded Mrs. Mason. The splendid work will not lag under her efficient leadership. She brings to this work a trained mind supplemented by a rich experience and a warm heart.

The contract for the new Congo missionary steamer has been let. James Rees & Sons of Pittsburg, will build the boat. It is planned to have it near completion at the time of the Pittsburg Convention. This boat will be one of the rare missionary exhibits of the Foreign Society at the Centennial Convention. A dedication service for this missionary steamer will be held during the convention. It will be called "The Oregon." Our loyal brethren of that western state have made possible the building of this new herald of the Cross. It will ply the rivers of the great Bosira district, and carry the gospel to the dark-skinned Lokondu tribes. In the future thousands will rise up to call the "Oregon" blessed, and to thank our brethren for its coming.

M. H. Garrard has resigned at La Porte, Indiana, after a successful pastorate of three years. Mr. Garrard is a graduate of Hiram College, with two years post graduate work, in Syracuse University, done while pastor of the church at Syracuse, N. Y. During Mr. Garrard's pastorate in La Porte, 127 members have been added to the church, a large indebtedness paid and the church strengthened in every way. In reporting the resignation, the La Porte Daily Herald says:—"Mr. Garrard's work has not rested with the church; he has rendered valuable service to the city. He has championed every forward movement for La Porte, and in all moral issues his voice and activities have proven large factors for good. In Mr. Garrard's departure both the Christian church and the city will lose a strong, useful man."

The churches of Northern California hold their annual convention at Santa Cruz, July 27 to August 8. They announce a fine program, from which one could make a long list of interesting addresses. Some of the striking ones are: "The Challenge of the City," H. J. Loken; "Sources and Beginnings of the Restoration Movement," Prof. Stairs; "Thomas Campbell and the Declaration and Address," Frank S. Ford, San Francisco; "Restoration of the Lord's Table," (Communion service), C. A. Young; "The Christianity of Christ," B. B. Tyler; "Isaac Errett and his contribution to the Restoration Movement," I. N. McCash; "What have We Learned from the Century's Experience in Christian Unity," H. O. Breeden; "Preachers and Preaching for Our Times," B. B. Tyler, and many other addresses which go to make this convention one of rare interest.

The National Benevolent Association has for immediate sale a beautiful property in the city of St. Louis. It is suitable for both home and investment. It is a well-built, brick flat, six rooms upstairs and six down, built six years ago. It is unusually large and well lighted. Has all modern conveniences. It is situated on the corner, directly in front of one of the entrances to beautiful Carondelet Park. This property was given to the Association to be used for the advancement of our Lord's kingdom. It is easily worth $4,700. It offers a fine opportunity for some one to make a good investment, and to enable the Benevolent Association to realize a goodly sum for the care of "the widow and the orphan in their affliction." Inquiry should be addressed to The National Benevolent Association, 2955 Euclid Ave., St. Louis.

The Sunday-school of the Seventh Street Church, Richmond, Va., made June 13 "Examination Day," and June 20, commencement exercises were held. These exercises took place of morning church service. The following description of the order of exercises is suggestive: "Singing a processional hymn, the members of the school, carrying banners and flower-poles marched up two by two, headed by the church choir from the Sunday-school to the auditorium and around the auditorium to the seats allotted to each class. The Lord's Prayer was repeated in concert, Psalm xxvii. was read responsively, another hymn was sung, the superintendent made a few remarks, and then the kindergarten children sang, and the primary department responded to some missionary and other drills conducted by the pastor. After the singing of "Yield Not to Temptation," the Junior Department, as a whole, and the Intermediate Department, class by class, went through various drills—some on the regular lesson course, some on Bible geography, and some on missions, some on manual work. "Stand Up, Stand Up for Jesus" was sung, an offering was taken, and then there were reports from the Cradle Roll Department, the Home Department, the Teacher Training Department, the Adult Classes, and the manual director. The last part of the program was taken up with the

WINS HER HEART

Food that Helps Baby and the Family Pleases Mother.

Show a mother how to feed her baby so that it will be healthy, rosy and plump and grow up strong and sturdy and the mother's gratitude is everlasting.

A mother says "Five weeks ago I weaned baby but could not get her to take any kind of food until I tried Grape-Nuts, which she relished from the first, and on it she has plumped up and blossomed into a fat, chubby little girl.

"I feed Grape-Nuts to her regularly—use three packages a week for baby and my three-year-old boy alone, and I find that it regulates and keeps them nourished, strong and in good health all the time.

"Since feeding my children on Grape-Nuts I have used absolutely no medicine for either of them. Such food as this that does such wonders wins its way to a mother's heart. Please accept our thanks for the good your food has done in our family where we all eat it."

Children will grow up strong and healthy, or weak and puny, according to the food they get.

Grape-Nuts is a complete and perfect food for adults and children, is made on scientific lines, and this is easily proved by trial.

presentation of three gold medals—one for the best written examination, one for the best class standing, and one for the best church attendance record—three second medals (given because of the number of high grades), two silver medals, and diplomas and certificates given to those whose grades were above seventy-five per cent. on both class standing and written examination. The communion service was held, and the benediction pronounced. Then the classes marched out in order, singing as a recessional, "Sound the Battle Cry!"

Illinois Centennial Building

The Christian Century wishes to present to the Disciples of Illinois a complete list of the churches of the state that have been dedicated since the last national convention. To this end we are asking our readers to cooperate with us. Will you not send name and cost of church, and name of pastor of any churches dedicated in this centennial year and not included in the following list:

Colchester, $8,000. Rev. N. E. Cory.
Bowen, $7,500. Rev. W. L. Taylor.
Saybrook, $10,000. Rev. H. L. Maltman.
Villa Grove, $8,000. Rev. R. L. Cartwright.
Belknap, $3,500. Rev. I. L. Jenkins.
Petersburg, $20,000. Rev. B. H. Sealock.
St. Joseph, $20,000. Rev. Joel T. Davis.

We want to add every new church, large or small.

H. E. Sala has resigned at Wellsville, Ohio, to accept a call to Grand Rapids, Mich.

H. N. Glover, minister at Delta, Col., preached the Memorial Day services to a large audience.

Robt. O. Noah and wife are available as leaders of song and helpers in meetings during August. They are at Drake University, Des Moines, Iowa.

Mrs. Susannah (Kendall) Davis, mother of Mrs. Claris Yuell died at Port Payne, Alabama, July 14, 1909. Mrs. Davis has been a member of the Christian Church since 1881, when she united with the church at Atwood, Ill. She has been in the South since 1897.

Our friends can do the Christian Century an important favor by sending us copies of the issue of March 6. We do not have a copy of that date left for our own files. Please see that it is carefully wrapped.

Austin Hunter Comes to Chicago

An event of unusual moment in the work of the Chicago churches is announced to us just as we are ready for the press. The Jackson Boulevard Church has extended a call to Austin Hunter, of Indianapolis, and he has accepted. This church has been without a pastor since the death of Parker Stockdale, last January. They have shown unusual wisdom in the methods pursued in securing a successor to Mr. Stockdale. We believe their choice proves their wisdom. Mr. Hunter did a very successful work at the North Park Church, Indianapolis, greatly increasing the strength of the church. Since closing his work there the first of the year, he has been engaged in evangelistic work, with gratifying success. He turns from this because he feels the importance of such a work as that at Jackson Boulevard. He will find a hearty welcome to the tasks and joys of Chicago work.

Kentucky Bible School Chair Fund

A Centennial Enterprise.

It will be of interest to the friends of the College of the Bible to know what progress is being made in the raising of the $25,000 for the endowment of the new Bible School Dpartment. It will be remembered that this has been undertaken by the Bible Schools of Kentucky and their friends as a Centennial Enterprise to be completed by October 1. It is a matter of pleasure to announce that this fund can be completed by the time set and no doubt will be if all the schools continue to do their duty as nobly as they have done in the past. There is in cash $15,000. The schools have in unredeemed pledges that are sure to be paid $6,000 and in unpaid individual pledges there are $1,600. This makes a total of $22,600 definitely in sight.

The remaining $2,400 is to be provided for in three ways. Quite a number of the schools, though but very few of them are large schools, have not committed themselves and yet unquestionably they will fall into line before the campaign is over. Again many schools are exceeding their pledges and apportionments and but few are falling short. When a Kentucky Bible school promises to give a hundred dollars, it never gives less, and very frequently runs beyond its promise. Some have been known to tripple and even quadruple their pledges. A third source of additional income is voluntary gifts from individuals. These include many earnest Bible school workers, county and district officers, preachers, former students and graduates of the College of the Bible, and a host of well wishers in this cause.

Every mail from now until the close of the campaign should bring many such personal contributions from every state in the union. From far Australia with a personal gift comes this word, "I am glad that the endowment of the Bible school chair is being raised so successfully, and that you have already selected a man for the work. It should give a great impetus to Bible School work to have college students specially trained for it. The small remainder will surely be forthcoming."

Robert M. Hopkins.

ABSENT ALL AROUND.

The absent-minded professor returned home one evening, and, after ringing his front door-bell for some time to no effect, heard the maid's voice from the second-story window: "The professor is not in."

"All right," quietly answered the professor; "I'll call again." And he hobbled down the stone steps.—Lippincott's.

New York State Convention

In point of interest and attendance the New York convention which was held in Syracuse, June 29-July 1, was one of the very best in the history of the organization. Everything possible was done to make the delegates at ease during their stay, thanks to the untiring efforts of C. R. Stauffer and his excellent committee on entertainment. Rest rooms with couches and rockers were provided and in many ways the comfort of delegates looked after. The enlarged delegations from out of town were due largely to the excellent advertising done by the Chamber of Commerce and the State Men's League. As a result the largest number of delegates, from a distance, in years were present.

The program was one of great strength. The first session of the Ministerial Association presented President George B. Stewart, of Auburn Theological Seminary, who spoke on the theme, "The Minister's Manifold Activities," and from that moment till the closing address by R. H. Miller, of Buffalo, whose "Message of the Convention," was a masterpiece, not an address was presented which was unworthy of the great cause represented. Especially fine were the series of devotional addresses by Peter Aainslee of Baltimore. His presence throughout the convention was an inspiration. Two sessions were devoted to the problems of the church. On Tuesday afternoon "The Country Church" was considered. The closing session was devoted to "The City Church and Its Problems," opened by an address by Pres. Arthur Braden of Keuka College. Such questions as the location of the house of worship, problem of services, problem of evangelism, problem of enlargement, were discussed by some of the representative ministers of the state.

Home Missions was presented by W. J. Wright, and Bible-school Work, by Marion Stevenson. The work of Christian Education, especially in Keuka College, was ably presented by Lowell C. McPherson, field secretary of Keuka College. Mrs. Harlan and G. D. Purdy were the speakers from abroad for the C. W. B. M.

The Bible-school had a series of morning conferences of half an hour each, conducted by Miss Eva Lemert and Marion Stevenson, and though the time was half an hour before the morning session the attendance was fine at each of these excellent meetings. The Bible-school period on Thursday morning was very interesting. Dr. Herbert Martin of New York read another of his illuminating papers along the line of religious pedagogy.

The sessions of the C. W. B. M. were full of interest. This excellent organization was able to report a great year's work, progress being manifested along all lines. With Mrs. Harlan and Mr. Purdy of Jamica present both of the women's sessions were very good.

One of the treats of the convention was the address of Dr. W. W. Dawley, pastor of the Central Baptist Church of Syracuse, who spoke on "The Relation of the Baptists and the Disciples." It was a fine address delivered in a spirit of fraternal appreciation. He advocated the exchange of pulpits, and here in Syracuse, where the best of feeling exists, that early in the fall an exchange be arranged in which it was understood by all concerned that each was to preach in the

HOME TESTING

A Sure and Easy Test on Coffee.

To decide the all important question of coffee, whether or not it is really the hidden cause of physical ails and approaching fixed disease, one should make a test of 10 days by leaving off coffee entirely and using well-made Postum.

If relief follows you may know to a certainty that coffee has been your vicious enemy. Of course you can take it back to your heart again, if you like to keep sick.

A lady says: "I had suffered with stomach trouble, nervousness and terrible sick headaches every since I was a little child, for my people were always great coffee drinkers and let us children have all we wanted. I got so I thought I could not live without coffee but I would not acknowledge that it caused my suffering.

"Then I read so many articles about Postum that I decided to give it a fair trial. I had not used it two weeks in place of coffee until I began to feel like a different person. The headaches and nervousness disappeared and whereas I used to be sick two or three days out of a week while drinking coffee I am now well and strong and sturdy seven days a week, thanks to Postum.

"I had been using Postum three months and had never been sick a day when I thought I would experiment and see if it really was coffee that caused the trouble, so I began to drink coffee again and inside of a week I had a sick spell. I was so ill I was soon convinced that coffee was the cause of all my misery and I went back to Postum with the result that I was soon well and strong again and determined to stick to Postum and leave coffee alone in the future."

other's church on the distinctive plea of each church. This exchange to be preceded by a presentation in each church by the minister on the history and contribution of the other brotherhood. His address was more than the reiteration of sentimental platitudes on unity, it was a plea for union sincere enough to be willing to give in order to get.

The following officers were elected by the Ministerial Association for the ensuing year: President, Robert Stewart, Rochester; vice president, C. R. Stauffer, Syrcause; secretary-treasurer, C. C. Crawford, Rochester.

The Christian Women's Board of Missions of the state chose the following officers: President, Mrs. Laura G. Craig, Buffalo; vice president, Mrs. O. M. Wiley, Syracuse; recording secretary, Mrs. G. H. Dunston, Buffalo; corresponding secretary, Mrs. C. E. Bartlett, Buffalo; treasurer, Mrs. H. B. Long, Williamsville.

The Men's League elected E. A. Olley, Syracuse, president; J. C. Skinner, Auburn, vice president; J. A. Helfer, Tonawanda, secretary-treasurer.

The officers who will guide the affairs of the State Society through another year, the forty-ninth of its history, are Dr. Elias H. Long, Buffalo, president; Dr. Duncan Sinclair, Tonawanda, first vice president; Dr. O. M. Wiley, Syracuse, second vice president; Joseph A. Serena, Syracuse, recording secretary; C. R. Stauffer, Syracuse corresponding secretary; D. Krebiel, Williamsville, treasurer; C. E. Van Zandt, Troy, superintendent Bible-schools; C. C. Crawford, Rochester, superintendent Christian Endeavor; W. C. Feathers, Troy, treasurer of Permanent Fund. Members of advisory board, C. G. Van Wormer, Dr. A. G. Doust, A. B. Kellog, B. S. Ferral, D. C. Tremaine, J. W. Milliman, Dr. R. E. Belding, C. E. Van Zandt, Robert Christie, R. J. Austin, and A. J. Applebee.

The ladies of the Rowland Street Church fitted up the lecture room with couches and arm chairs as a rest room for the ladies. Lemonade and tea were served and it was a place of great popularity.

The annual dinner of the Men's Leagues of the church was held in the new Y. M. C. A. on Wednesday evening just after the business meeting of that excellent organization. Seventy-seven men were seated at the table. C. G. Van Wormer, than whom there could be no better, served as toastmaster. J. C. Skinner, Peter Ainslee and an original poem by Vice President Space of Keuka College, were the good things offered to the mind.

A pleasant surprise was the presence of President A. McLean of the Foreign Society, who though not on the program, stopped off one day on his way west from the eastern Pennsylvania convention.

W. C. Prewitt said a good thing in his address on the City Church and Evangelism when he advocated special seasons in the regular preaching services when a concerted effort is to be placed upon accessions to the church. Many have felt that the regular invitations is in danger of growing stereotyped unless backed up by personal effort on the part of some one. A large number of churches depend upon the evangelistic meeting for their additions. The Niagara Falls Church set May aside as a time in which all were to attempt to reach outsiders through the regular services.

The plan to bring one man to the convention for a series of devotional addresses should be continued. Many said that Peter Ainslie's addresses were worth the time and cost of every delegate, had nothing more been secured in the meeting.

There were 197 registered delegates from outside the city. Jos. A. Serena.

Centennial Bulletin

W. R. Warren, Centennial Secretary

A Full and Fair Count of the 50,000.

None of our conventions have been able to show a complete registration. The railroads give us credit for only half our actual attendance at the Jubilee in Cincinnati, 1899.

The Pittsburg committee is determined to have the name and address of every individual of the 50,000—"not for publication but as a guarantee of good faith." We want to show the people of Pittsburg, the railroad companies and the world at large. Every unit of attendance adds a unit of projectile force to the plea we are trying to make the whole world hear. But you do not count, unless you are counted.

The plan is simple and practical. Every seat and every session is absolutely free, but no one will be admitted at any door of the hall without evidence that he has registered. There will be not only door-keepers but policemen to see that this rule is enforced. Everyone who wears the Centennial badge will be passed without question. Every one else can secure an admission ticket—good for this session only—at a nearby booth. There will be no charge for this.

The Centennial badge may be secured in either of two ways: First, everyone who pays the regular registration fee of one dollar will receive both the Centennial Memorial program and the Centennial badge. Second, to provide for wives and children of regular delegates, and mere visitors, the badges will be on sale at fifteen cents each

The Memorial Centennial Program.

It is only once in a hundred years; and this hundred, excepting only two, the most remarkable in history. The best thing of the century has been the plea for Liberty, Unity, and Loyalty. The Centennial is the epitome of the century and the program is the epitome of the Centennial. A glorious century is being crowned with a magnificent Centennial and every feature of this will be mirrored in a splendid memorial program book.

This book will contain two hundred pages, five by seven inches. It will be found in full leather with round corners, gold edges and gold side stamp. It will comprise four parts: First, a history of the Restoration Movement and description of its present status. Second, a history and description of the city of Pittsburg and its many places of interest; historical, practical and æsthetic. Third, the program in detail of all the conventions and the entire celebration in its manifold aspects. Fourth, the songs for all the sessions, words and music, from Monday night, October 11, to Tuesday night, October 19.

The whole book will be profusely and exquisitely illustrated and will contain a fine map of the city of Pittsburg.

A hand-book of the Centennial, a guide to Better Pittsburg and a memorial of an illustrious cause and its heroes will be this superb publication.

The Centennial Dollar.

The Centennial dollar stands in the estimation of those having the work in charge as being worth something more than 100 cents. Dollars cannot always be reckoned in worth according to the amount of copper, nickel, silver or gold they contain. Some dollars are worth more than other dollars. A dollar given in a time of absolute need to the worthy poor is worth more than a dollar flung as a tip from a rich man to a Broadway waiter who himself may be a man of wealth.

The Centennial dollar coming from delegates to the convention for registration fees, program and souvenir badge gives to the giver three great things.

First: It gives him self respect. He is defraying his own expenses. He is under obligation to no one for enrolling him as an integral part of the convention. When a student enters college he expects to pay a fee for his matriculation. This Centennial dollar is the delegates' matriculation fee to the convention and all of its sessions. It gives him that which says to all who see him, "I have paid my own way." The Centennial dollar is a step up and away from old methods of enrollment. In days, not so very long ago, churches entertaining conventions paid all the bills of the delegates' entertainment. When the burden became so excessive that but few churches could entertain even a small convention, a plan was devised whereby lodging and breakfast was provided the delegate free of charge. Then came another logical step whereby the delegate provided his own entertainment, thereby preserving his self respect for he was paying his own bills and placing a burden on none. The Centennial dollar provides for a perfect, complete and adequate registration of all who come to the convention. It registers each and every one. It provides a means of definite information as to who's who. In the silver anniversary at Cincinnati, when it is known that there were 23,000 delegates present, the railroads gave credit for there being but 8,000. The Centennial dollar places all on an equal footing and maintains the respect of all without insult or injury to any.

Second: The Centennial dollar gives value received for every cent of it. It gives to the giver of the dollar a souvenir program of 200 pages full of interesting points relative to the plea of the Disciples, tells of the many points of interest in and around the Centennial city, and is a book worthy of a place in any man's library. The program itself is not a book made for a day, to be used carelessly and then thrown aside as having served its purpose. It is made for a century. It is made to be kept as a sacred heirloom to be handed to children's children. It will be bound in the finest of Morocco, will have heavy gilt edges and printed on superb and highly calendared paper. It will have many pictures of our eminent men, many pictures of places of interest in the convention city, and is a book that could not be purchased at any book store under $1. In addition to the program, as described above there will be given to each one registering and paying the Centennial dollar, a badge of oxidized metal that will be symbolic of the Centennial itself, the Centennial city and the plea for which we stand. No words can describe its beauty. It must be seen to be appreciated. Already some have signified their intention of using it as a permanent watch fob, while some of the ladies have suggested that it will make up into a beautiful brooch. Thus those who give the Centennial dollar will receive for their dollar full value.

Third: The Centennial dollar enables the giver to co-operate in a great world-wide effort of the dissemination of our plea. It helps scatter information relative to the Disciples of Christ far and wide. Wherever the program goes, wherever the badge goes, wherever any literature relative to the Centennial goes, there also goes a great fund of general information relative to the plea of the fathers. So the giver unites with a great host of Disciples from all parts of the world in the sending forth the tidings of great joy and helps usher in the day when the Master's prayer will be answered "that they all may be one."

The New Centennial Publicity Man.

Part of the above was written by Brother John A. Jayne, chairman of the Centennial Publicity committee, who will devote most of his time during the next three months to telling the readers of our church papers what they want to know about the Centennial, and the readers of the secular papers what they ought to know about the movement which the Centennial celebrates.

In addition to his splendid congregation in the Belmar district of Pittsburg, Brother Jayne preaches weekly to a hundred thousand people through a Pittsburg paper which gives a half page to the sermon and the other half to a cartoon illustrating the text. He knows the Master and the people who wear his name. He knows the press and the way of the pew. He has the energy and zeal that his task requires, and his church has the grace to allow him time for such larger service.

The Mule and Ike

An Atlanta merchant has frequent occasion to rebuke Ike, his darky porter, for his tardiness in reporting for duty in the morning. Ike is always ready with a more or less ingenious excuse.

"You're two hours late, Ike!" exclaimed the employer one morning. "This sort of thing must stop! Otherwise, I'm going to fire you, understand!"

"Deed, Mistah Edward," replied Ike, "it wa'n't mah fault, dis time! Honest! I was kicked by a mule!"

"Kicked by a mule? Well, even if that were so, it wouldn't delay you for more than an hour. You'll have to think of a better excuse than that."

Ike looked aggrieved. "Mistah Edward," he continued solemnly, "it might have been all right ef dat mule kicked me in dis direction; but he didn't—he kicked me de odder way!"—Lippincott's.

Do The Colleges Undermine Faith?

Modern Education and the Old-Time Religion

Much passion and alarm have been stirred up by certain writers in recent months who have endeavored to set colleges on one side and the churches on the other side of a wide chasm.

The colleges are working in a direction and with a method hostile to the churches, these writers say. What the churches build up, the colleges tear down. Professors and preachers are at cross purposes. Modern education and the old-time religion are at loggerheads.

It is no marvel that many parents, habituated no more to piety than to ideals of culture for themselves and for their children, are painfully confused just now in their purposes regarding their children's education. They read in the orthodox paper of the pathetic case of a young man coming back to his pious home from college, possessing his degree, but having lost his religion.

A prominent preacher in Chicago in a deliberate article written for a weekly paper states that "a careful study of the catalogue" of a certain university "shows that Jews and atheists predominate in the faculty and students."

We heard one of the best known evangelists in the country say recently that he would "as soon expect a revival in hell as in the university of Chicago."

A leading religious paper declared in a late issue that the fight now on between the universities and the churches was "a fight between atheism and Christianity."

From the popular magazine writer who describes most college professors as vandals "blasting at the Rock of Ages," to the Catholic bishop who declares that college instruction is "atheistic poison," we find a line of preachers and editors who are working themselves and their following into hysterical concern for the future of faith and of the church.

We would like to raise the question of the relations of the really progressive college to faith. What may parents expect will be the influence of the college upon the religious life of their children?

There are two sources of moral influence in a college: the spirit of the place, and the teachings that are directly imparted. It is a question which of these is the more potent influence affecting character. The testimony of Dr. Lyman Abbott based upon twenty-five years' experience in preaching to college audiences reveals a profound religious spirit in college life. Two characteristic questions, he says, are asked him by college students: "What may I believe concerning the invisible world? and, What service can I best render to my fellowmen? The spirit of human service is in the college air."

Dr. Abbott's interpretation of college temper makes a strong presumption that the direct teachings of the class room do not undermine faith. For if the typical thinking fostered by the colleges were prejudicial to faith it would register itself by a markedly different temper.

Nevertheless, college teachings do bear upon faith, and influence it. It would be disingenuous to contend that there would be no change; to soothe and conciliate the perturbed parent by the promise that his son or daughter would return home still possessing the parent's beliefs. This would end in pathetic disillusionment by and by, or else would betray the college to be no college at all.

There are two ways in which faith may be undermined:
First, by destroying its object,
Secondly, by destroying its method of demonstration.

Do college teachings destroy the great objects of faith—God, the spiritual nature of man, the imperativeness of duty, the authority of Christ, the uniqueness of the Bible, the divine function of the church?

Every person acquainted interiorly with the teachings of colleges would answer categorically, No! The teachings of the colleges tend to establish the spiritual view of the world and of life.

The old infidelity of a half century ago has no standing in academic circles. Materialism as a philosophy is obsolete among the scholars of today. The agnosticism of Spencer and Huxley may be utilized as a device for limiting the field of the positive sciences, but as a last word on the great questions of the soul it is an intolerable answer to those teachers who treat of these questions.

The great verities of spiritual religion never had so good a chance to establish themselves as has been made by the college teachers of the last quarter century.

What change, then, in the religious faiths of their sons and daughters may parents expect from the teachings of a modern college?

Clearly, college teachings tend to alter the arguments by which religious verities may be commended or demonstrated.

The scientific method with which the student works in almost any department of the college is bound to loosen the hold upon his soul of the old time arguments for religion.

But it is the mistake of many parents and ministers to assume that because the student just home from college does not respond to a particular set of arguments for religion, therefore his religion has itself been undermined.

The argument that the vast and nice contrivances in the objective universe point to a Creator as a watch points to the watch-maker, may not be convincing to him. Yet he may be made to believe in God if he is shown how greatly God's presence helps in daily living. To him a higher proof of God's reality than that He has worked in past ages would be the fact of experience that He does work today.

He may not accept the authority of Jesus Christ simply because Christ fulfilled certain prophecies or wrought miracles or occupied a metaphysical office as Son of God. He may seem impatient with these rather complicated arguments involving so many presuppositions that he does not understand. But if he is led into the presence of Jesus of Nazareth and is shown the moral splendor of his character there will come to his mind no line of college teaching to restrain him from falling at the Master's feet, crying, with Thomas, "My Lord and my God!"

Parents and pastor will have difficulty and, perhaps, heartache, in persuading him to accept the doctrine of the inspiration of the Bible. He will ask strange questions as to what is meant by the doctrine and will bring forward certain facts that seem to make such a doctrine meaningless. He may even have gone so far in his non-conformity as to allege that Browning and Darwin are inspired, too. But it will be a fatal mistake for parents or pastor to assume that belief in the Bible is identical with belief in a theory of its inspiration. There are other helps to the college student's faith in the Bible besides the doctrine of its supernatural origin. Its intrinsic beauty and truth and power and richness are, after all, the best argument for its unique importance. Only get the college student to see this and the Word will become a lamp to his feet, a light to his pathway.

And for the church, too, and its work, a fresh statement must needs be made if the college student is to be interested. For the dogma that the church was supernaturally established, he has little concern. He does not want to know how it came to be, but what it is here for. He has studied other institutions—the state, the home, the school—from the point of view of their function in the social order and in personal life. What, he asks, is the function of the church? The simple task of parent or pastor is to make clear to the morally earnest college graduate the necessity of the church as a social support of personal faith and a mechanism for capitalizing individual services invested therein. Show him this and all the habits and teachings of college life will reinforce your appeal to him to take his place and render his service in the common ministries of the church.

In a word, the question whether or not colleges undermine faith is to be answered not simply by looking to the college but by looking also to the church.

And the really important question becomes this: Will the church adjust its arguments for religion to meet the practical needs of college-bred men, thousands of whom are being lost to the church because the old time arguments for religion seem now irrelevant?

The Trend of Events

By Alva W. Taylor

A CONCRETE COTTAGE FOR $1,000.

There is being built today a concrete cottage for the sum of $1,000 which holds out large hope for the working man and the small householder. It also is hopeless for the germ. Plans are laid by Standard Oil and other large employers to erect them in large numbers for their employees.

They are built of solid concrete after the Edison model. Floors, walls and ceilings will be dust and fire proof. There will be no paper and all corners will be rounded. The furniture can be moved out and the whole interior flushed and cleaned with a hose. Cabinets, ice chests, picture moldings, etc., will be builded in and likewise made dust proof and easily cleansed. Fireplaces will ventilate and hot and cold water will be convenient. Coal will be stored in a receptacle opening on the roof into which it will be emptied by a simple chain device and fed easily therefrom to each fireplace and the furnace and cook stove.

DEED, NOT CREED, BASIS OF UNION.

John R. Mott has been called to the secretaryship of the Federal Council of Churches of Christ. If he accepts it will be an event quite as important as the making of a tariff and more far reaching. Mott has been the moving spirit of the World's Student Federation and the great Volunteer Missionary Movement for the past decade and a half. He is a missionary statesman. He has been ambassador to every nation where students are taught. His itinerary has been the lands of the earth. His organization has sent 3,861 missionaries to the lands beyond. He is a type of the newer Christian leader—a man of force and eloquence and of great practical sagacity and his message has been one of Christly service. On this basis he has had no difficulty in bringing to triumphant success a great interdenominational movement.

Thus if Mott becomes the active force in the Federation of Churches he will embody for it a practical working spirit. It will be that of service versus dogma. It is the only working plan for church unity. The creeds must be tabooed, the deeds must be the cement of the new order. Here are twenty-nine denominations of Christians with only opinions to keep them apart. They cannot disagree upon their knees nor in the work of fellow help. They have been classified on matters of opinion, never on matters of service to men. Men will find it difficult to defend any aloofness from the work of the united church with a man like John Mott at the helm.

THE FERMENT IN ISLAM.

All Islam is in a ferment. The leaven of western and Christian ideas has been placed in the Mohammedan measure of meal. The light of education, to no small degree let in by Christian missions, has been a beacon to Persia. Turkey is in the very crucible of nations at Constantinople. But for the restraining hand of European diplomacy she would long ago have thrown off the mediaeval yoke of Islam. Morocco is a queer contradiction. She borders ancient civilization on the coast and is wild and primitive a few miles in the interior.

Persia's Shah follows Turkey's Sultan into the limbo of retired sovereigns. Morocco's new monarch will soon go the same way it seems. He was enthroned as a protest against the whimsical modernity of the late sovereign. He gave too much countenance to things new, likewise think the Sheerefs of the interior. Spain and France may enforce the modern there. Persia's Shah attempted to be reactionary and retire the new constitution. Now he is retired and his twelve-year-old son will be nominal ruler while a safe constitutionalist will be regent and tutor to the future Shah.

Russia is hanging on the flanks of Persia. She has large commercial interests there. Modern conquest advances by acquiring commercial interests and following them up with the protecting arm of the military. England watches Russia and will counter any move she makes while Turkey has pushed up to Urumiah to claim her share of the spoils should there be more than "spheres of influence" marked out. The statesmanship of the Young Turks is little less than remarkable. It must be genuinely patriotic or it could not be so successful. They are steering the ship of state through reefy seas. They have suppressed an uprising in Albania, are dealing with the Armenian atrocities, meeting the Persian exigencies, solving perplexing home problems daily, and, confronted with dangers of a crisis in Crete, which is largely Greek and desires to be wholly so, are maintaining the peace.

The Mohammedan religious authorities have officially given signature to the new regimes in both Turkey and Persia. Thus constitutionalism, with the stamp of ecclesiastical approval fixed, would seem secure among a people where the religious is the deepest motive that moves in the hearts of men. All this means a freer cosmopolitanism, greater religious tolerance, more education, a larger commercial and industrial prosperity, and constantly widening doors for Christian missionary effort.

MILLIONS IN SMOKE.

Senator Beveridge told a story during the tariff debate that, were it deprived of its sordid details, would read like a tale of Alladin's lamp. And the lamp proves to be a tariff tax, levied for war purposes. Its magic powers brought to a small group of rich men fabulous wealth when it was rubbed with a magic cloth of the trust maker.

The tax was laid to pay for the war with Spain. While it was on Tom Ryan and a company of fellow buccaneers fought their way into the business by forcing sales of large firms. In all they gathered in some 250, large and small, and got controll of the output. They paid large prices for some, and forced others to the wall, but whatever they did they got control. They "euchered" the small stockholders by offering them $200 in 4 per cent bonds for each $100 of stock. The proposition looked good to the small holders and they bit. Thus the buccaneers secured controlling interests and multiplied the capitalization by ten. By the roll of the printing presses $25,000,000 capital stock was advanced to $250,000,000. Then other additions brought it up to $317,000,000.

Having obtained controll, the war tax is now removed but the price of tobacco remains where it was substantially. The war tax becomes profit and pays dividends on all these millions of watered stock. Profits leap from $7,204,000 in 1899, to $36,719,000 in 1906.

We receive about $50,000,000 annually from internal revenue on tobacco. At the rate laid by France and England we would receive $333,000,000. In those countries the rate of consumption decreased 56 per cent and 24 per cent respectively during the past forty-five years while in this country it increased 240 per cent.

TEMPERANCE NOTES.

South Dakota's Anti-Treating Law went into effect July 1st. Every man must pay for his own drink. It hits at a vital evil when it strikes the social treat. But it still leaves the saloon.

In Texas, since July 11, all saloon licenses are issued by the State Comptroller, with headquarters in Austin. It is designed to remove local influences and take the saloon somewhat out of local affairs. The saloon keeper must make affadavit that he has kept the law strictly. If he has not, perjury may be charged. This will scarcely stay the southern prohibition sentiment.

W. J. Bryan says:—"For eighteen years I have been discussing other questions, but I shall do my part to keep our party from being controlled by the liquor interests." It is understood that Mr. Bryan will ask Nebraska democrats to put local option in their next platform.

Milwaukee sold enough less beer last year to reduce internal revenue receipts by $322,000. The U. S. Internal Revenue Department reports a falling off of receipts for the Springfield, Ill., district. The Illinois Anti-Saloon League likewise reports a "falling off" of 512 saloons.

The Security Life Insurance Company, of Binghampton reports that the first nine years of their trial of total abstainance policies shows that the loss through surrender, lapsing, and death is less than that of general policies by 21 per cent.

New Zealand has set apart a "Drunkards' Island." Habitual drinkers are sentenced to this island and sobered up effectually. But there is no means of keeping them there, nor preventing them beginning all over again as soon as on main-land.

SOLVING THE PROBLEM OF THE NON-CHURCH GOER.

Rochester has tried one means of reaching the non-church goer. Under the leadership of ministers who have a serious and vital interest in the working man a series of twenty Sunday evening services were arranged for a down town theater. An editor,physician, labor leader, and an employer of labor were invited to join the committee. The meetings were frankly religious from the first, but were given a popular turn. The audience was asked to participate in music, responsive readings, the Lord's Prayer, etc. Fully one-half the themes were on social service of one kind or another. Such things as the fight on tuberculosis, the saloon question, the problem of employment, were considered religious. Nor were more convential religious themes tabooed. Prayer, the religious nature of man, individual morality, etc., made up one-half the themes.

It was thought at first that the audience would demand much of the entertaining feature. But this was quickly disproven. It was frank and serious discussion of vital themes that they wanted. The large employer on the committee frankly says that he gained a new conception of the labor union folks. The editor says religion has been put in a new light. The labor leader says it has demonstrated that the ministry can be leaders in all walks of life. Raymond Robins says he never saw religion brought into such close touch with the daily walk of men and women.

The attendance was so great that many could not obtain admittance much of the time. It is estimated that 10,000 different people were reached. The churches are reaping benefits in new members and in increased respect from those who were prejudiced against them. The ministerial association, as usual of least faith, now heartily approves.

PENSIONS FOR THE WORKERS.

An investigation made for the American Association for Labor Legislation showed that from 60 to 80 per cent of the men injured in industrial accidents received no remuneration. Of men killed the families of 59 per cent received no compensation. The total compensation for accidents ending in both injury and death for the homogeneous group investigated amounted to less than one-fourth the first year's loss in wages, to say nothing of the after years in the case of the totally incapicated and the killed. Where suit is brought more than half of what is won is spent, on the average, for the prosecution of the suit.

The courts cling pretty stubbornly to the precedents, and "contributory negligence" and "fellow servant" considerations leave the injured workman to bear the burden. European countries are more advanced in the matter. They have largely given up the fellow servant idea and act on the theory that a certain numder of accidents are inevitable and that they should be assessed up to industry as a whole. The favorite plan is to create an insurance fund to which the employer and employee contribute in varying ratios, usually equally or two to one respectively.

Germany's system is generally considered the best developed. Accident insurance is assessed up to the employers wholly. Sick benefits are cared for by the workingmen themselves. Old age and invalid insurance is assessed up equally to employer and employee and governed by the State. It is compulsory on all persons with salaries or wages of less than $500 per year. The State adds a subsidy.

In case of the sick the premium paid amounts to about 3 per cent of the weekly wage and the benefit amounts to half pay and free medical attendance. In case of accident not less than 300 times the daily wage must be paid and the scale runs up to two-thirds the wage for complete incapacity. The old age annuity costs from 7 to 18c per week, employer and employee dividing the payment equally, and the benefits, with the governmental addition, run from 50c to $2 per week. Every tenth person in the empire is today a beneficiary in some form or another of these insurance benefits. Practically every person in the empire needing insurance is provided with it and that with the very minimum of expense for administration. Wisconsin liability companies were found to be expending only 38 per cent of the premiums paid for the benefits, while commissions and dividends consumed within 10 per cent of as much.

We kill a greater number in peaceful industry every year than were killed in like time in either the Civil or the Russian-Japanese war. More than half a million are injured annually and one-tenth of them killed. We little realize the awfulness of this holocaust. We injure twice as large a percentage as does Germany and they find more than half of their accidents avoidable. What then must be the number of ours that might be avoided? We are of all nations the most prodigal of life and the least careful in providing for the helpless left by our carelesness.

JOHN R. MOTT, General Secretary of the World's Student Christian Federation, is spending some months abroad. He has recently been elected to the responsible position of Secretary of the Federal Council of Churches in America. But advices received from him make it doubtful whether he can accept this important work consistently with the duties already resting upon him. He will be able to give a definite answer some time in August.

THE Federal Council of Churches at its last meeting invited the Religious Education Association and the National Education Association to appoint Commissions to meet jointly with its own Commission to study plans for week-day religious instruction. The first meeting was held at Chautauqua, N. Y., July 16-17, during the week of the Religious Education Association there and an informal organization was effected for further study and conference on this important subject. The committee having the matter in hand consists of the Chairmen of the committees of the three bodies represented.

PROF. ERNEST DE WITT BURTON, Head of the Department of New Testament Literature and Interpretation in the Divinity School of the University of Chicago, who has spent several months in India and China investigating the conditions and needs of education in those countries, is expected to return to Chicago on August 22. His report, which will be of interest to all who are concerned with the spread of education and the needs of the Orient in its present intellectual awakening, will be published as soon after his return as the assembling of the mass of material gathered will permit.

MR. LORADO TAFT, the Chicago sculptor, has recently been appointed Professorial Lecturer on the History of Art at the University of Chicago. Mr. Taft has just concluded a series of six lectures at the university on the general subject: "The Sculptor's Art: Ideals and Technique," and, among other things, is known for his bronze relief of Stephen A. Douglas and portrait busts of Professor Thomas C. Chamberlain and Professor George W. Northrop. He is perhaps best known in connection with architectural and sculptural plans for the beautification of the Midway Plaisance, the beautiful highway of World's Fair fame and reputation, on which the University of Chicago now in great part faces.

THE Methodists are proposing to establish a church in Zion City, Ill., the former home and headquarters of John Alexander Dowie. No Protestant organization exists within a radius of four miles from the center of the town, and there is a population of at least one thousand souls not attached to any of the numerous sects into which Dowie's wonderfully compact organization has since his death been divided. The occasion of the Methodists' attempt to establish themselves there was the burning of a little country church on the outskirts of the town, compelling the congregation to seek shelter in the dining room of a hotel placed at their disposal in Zion City. The congregation now averages about one hundred, ministered to by a student of Garrett Institute. Money is being raised to build a house to cost about $10,000.

THE Christian Century has some interest in antiquarian researches, and wishes to share with its readers any discovery of moment that is made in any ancient field. Much water has flowed under the bridges since January, 1907, so the following clipping from the Octographic Review of that date, signed by the initials of Daniel Sommers himself, possesses an almost archeological character:

"I wish to warn the readers of this paper against agents for a series of pictures titled 'The Sacred Scroll,' or some such name. The agents may all be innocent of any intention to circulate that which is erroneous, but the fact that 'Dr. Willets' of Chicago is one of the men at the head of this 'Scroll' business casts suspicion over it. He is a prince among those infidels who pose as 'higher critics,' and I strongly suspect that his colleagues are of the same order. Through pictures of sacred scenes they may be endeavoring to prepare victims for false doctrines."

THE uprising of the Spanish people in a number of their cities, particularly Barcelona, against the conscription measures which have been put into operation in furtherance of the war with Morocco, is an interesting and important sign of the times. Probably the basis of these revolts is the suffering caused by the drafting of men from the poorer classes to go to the front. It is the general impression that the war is a needless expense both in money and life. Men who can afford to buy immunity from service easily escape, but the burden falls very heavily upon the poorer classes whose families are left unprovided for. While the immediate cause of this contention is industrial and social, at the same time there is a deeper spirit of protest against war as obsolete and useless. There is no enthusiasm for war as such. In this regard Spain and all the rest of the nations have changed rapidly during recent generations. The war cry has ever been the means of arousing patriotic enthusiasm, but today there must be a deep and serious purpose to justify any such enterprise. The nations are beginning to realize that if war were eliminated, two-thirds of the expenses of government would be wiped out and the taxes would show a very different face

MRS. ELLA FLAGG YOUNG'S election as superintendent of Chicago's public schools is no doubt the most important event in this municipality in some time. In the choice of a woman for the grave responsibilities of this office Chicago's school board acted absolutely without precedent. The approving sentiment with which her selection has been received by the press of the city indicates that the innovation is by no means regarded as simply another of those erratic acts for which this city's school board is more or less notorious. More significant than the fact of her sex or the salary of $10,000 she is to receive, is the type of education of which the new superintendent is a distinguished exponent. Of those whose fundamental criticism of our prevailing school system is its sacrifice of personality to the smooth-running mechanism of the institution, Mrs. Young is in the forefront. What reforms her administration will bring forth she does not say as yet, but her communications through the press indicate that her ideal will be to make the schools more naturally social, breaking down certain of the arbitrary restraints imposed upon pupils in the school room from time immemorial. Manual and industrial training will be fostered under her administration.

"Manual training," she says, "as it is carried on now, is too stiff and cut and dried, to awaken the full interest of the pupils. There is a certain hour and certain set days of the week on which the students march to the manual training rooms and begin to use the equipment. If the equipment were simpler and placed in all of the school rooms so that the children could walk from their seats to a small bench and go to work on some task in which he or she has become interested, the training would be of much greater value.

"I do not believe that children should do everything by rule, with certain tasks for certain hours. It is a mistake that they should never be allowed to speak to one another and, if they wish to discuss the lesson, be compelled to discuss it with only one person in the room—the teacher. It is the nature of children to be active. Their minds are naturally active and inquiring. They can learn one from the other if allowed to talk when school is in session."

The office to which Mrs. Young ascends has been for years an apple of discord in the city. What with the politicians and the Teachers' Federation and the conflict of pedagogical opinion the new leader will have troubles enough, just as her predecessors have had. But it may fall out that these troubles were all the time waiting for a woman's touch to make them disappear.

MORE good sense seems to have precipitated itself in the Northern Baptist Convention, whose session of 1909 was held in Portland, Ore., than in any gathering of a congregationally governed denomination in a long time. The Christian Century has already told the story of the formation of this Convention in Oklahoma City a little more than a year ago. The Portland convention was, therefore, only its second meeting. The purpose of the new organization is to unify the machinery of Baptist Missions and Benevolences and to provide a really representative body which could register Baptist sentiment and mobilize Baptist forces for practical progress in righteousness in the land. As a tentative arrangement of coöperation among the missionary societies a common budget had been submitted to the churches for the past year, resulting in the breaking of all records in raising missionary money. At the Portland Convention it was hoped to bring the three missionary societies—foreign, home and publication—into a legal unity. It was found, however, that legal considerations compelled each society to retain its independent charter. In lieu of this it was recommended that the societies amend their by-laws so as to bind themselves to elect their board of managers—twenty-seven in each case—on the nomination of the Convention. The societies had previously agreed to this recommendation so that its unanimous adoption by the Convention made it operative. Thus the societies will be effectually coördinated despite the technicality of legal distinctness. It is purposed to continue the last year's plan of combining the schedules of each society's needs into one budget and by apportionment divide it among the states in turn, among the churches. It should be added that the Woman's Missionary Society was admitted as an integral part of the joint plan. The committee on denominational journals made the significant statement that in a constituency of 1,200,000 Baptists the total circulation of Baptist papers does not exceed the pitiful figure of 60,000. It recommended such combination of publishing houses as would leave four in the field—one in New England, one in the Middle States, one in the Mississippi Valley, and one on the Pacific Coast, and that when those consolidations are accomplished the convention should bend its efforts to get subscribers for the different papers according to territory.

Two Methodist Tempers

During our Centennial year we Disciples of Christ are peculiarly sensitive to the comments passed upon us. Two Methodist papers have recently made significant mentions. We quote a clipping from the Central Christian Advocate (Kansas City.):

The "Campbellites" and a Creed.

"To the Editor.—I want you to tell me the truth about this: Has the Christian—Campbellite—Church got any disciple?"

"[The letter betrays some agitation on the part of the writer. Peace, brethren. The denomination to which you refer does profess to have no creed and no discipline. But let our brothers try to join this church and yet cling to either his form of baptism, if he was not dipped, or his theology, if he is a Methodist, and see how far he would get. This sect has two wings or factions. In our thinking the Pharisaical sect is about the most hide-bound sect in Christendom, albeit the sect has many of the most liberal and lovable men among its ministers and people we have anywhere met. But it has a plenty of the other sort. And from that other sort nothing is to be expected but snippy, quarrelsome controversy—and what for, pray, if they have no creed and no discipline? Does not a fixed form of baptism imply discipline, and does not a theology imply a creed? We are sorry for our friend at Nation, Ill., if one of this latter kind of creatures with a chip on his shoulder is strutting about in their midst.—Editor.]"

The lapse of editorial good temper and good taste in the above quotation is a surprising and discouraging disclosure. In these days of good fellowship and co-operation among the churches, the editor of the Central Advocate has lapsed back a half century. The first principles of plain courtesy, not to mention the spirit of Christ, should have inhibited the use of the name "Campbellite" in the title of the article. The editor knows right well that he wounds the feelings and awakens the resentment of a great body of Christian people in applying this epithet to them.

The completion of this hundredth year of history for the Disciples should, we would say, see the last appearance of this offensive title in any reputable religious paper. The correspondent's query gave the editor a real question to discuss which he might have handled critically, but without casting such aspersions upon his brethren as to call them a "Pharisaical sect," "about the most hide-bound sect in Christendom." Of quite another spirit is the following editorial in the Northwestern Christian Advocate (Chicago,) entitled:

Signs of the New Tolerance.

"We print elsewhere the announcement of the Disciples of Christ who are preparing to celebrate in appropriate fashion the centennial of their organization. No more characteristic or encouraging sign of the times is to be discerned than the temper of this body with reference to interdenominational co-operation and organic union. Since October, 1905, a number of local congregations of Baptists and Disciples have united. In Western Canada their provincial missionary organizations have been combined. In Southern California a college is held jointly with the Congregationalists. In Chicago the Memorial Baptist and First Christian Church have been amalgamated. The high tide of enthusiasm in every convention or congress of the Disciples is reached, we are told, when some representative Baptist or Free Baptist pleads for the reunion of these two bodies as a step toward the answer to the Saviour's intercessory prayer.

"A communication from official headquarters claims that the sincerity of their plea for Christian union is attested by a general readiness to co-operate in evangelism, missions and reform. It is further demonstrated just now by the character of their centennial campaign. 'That they may all be one that the world may believe' is their chief watchword, and 'where the Scriptures speak, we speak; where the Scriptures are silent, we are silent,' defines the method upon which they will continue to work. No denominational monument is being erected and sectarian feeling is energetically discouraged. 'The endeavor is not to do something spectacular and extraordinary, but to make a fuller approximation to the Christianity of Christ, in its fruits especially.'

"We welcome every evidence of this kind. In such a temper is promise of a reunited Christendom, the assurance of a day when all the forces of the Church of Christ will come together for a common warfare against unrighteousness of every sort and a common campaign for the coming of the kingdom."

Yet it piques us just a bit to be patted on the back for showing certain specific signs of tolerance and union. As we conceive ourselves we are one big sign of the union which Christ's people are approaching. Our hope in this centennial year is to so exhibit our inner purpose and temper as that our brethren of the denominations may see that, despite our many failures to effectuate it even among ourselves, this union goal is the one thing we have consciously striven to attain during our hundred years of history.

The Visitor

The summer season brings to some of us the opportunity of a somewhat wider wandering than other seasons of the year. It is the period of conventions and assemblies of different sorts to which the faithful go from the ends of the land. I have had some duties in connection with such events which have taken me to two or three important gatherings of late.

One of these was the International Convention of Christian Endeavor at St. Paul, Minnesota. Perhaps enough has been said in other columns of the Christian Century, regarding this great gathering, indicating something of its significance. But there were two or three experiences which I am inclined to set down. The Sunday at St. Paul was one of drenching wetness following almost perfect weather during the earlier days of the Convention. Early on Sunday morning it began to rain and the downpour was so copious that, as the little group of Disciples gathered at the breakfast table of the hotel, we all fell back with assurance upon the proverb, "If it rains before seven, it stops before eleven," and we thought we should all be able to attend the morning services without inconvenience. But, as time went on, the rain increased. Dr. Power was slated to preach at the Portland Avenue Church in Minneapolis, and it was the Visitor's intention to go with him and enjoy a good sermon for once in a long series of busy Sundays. But as the hour came on, the downpour was so unabated that discretion or inertia prevailed and I remained in my room at the hotel, hoping momentarily that there might be sufficient slackening of the rain to permit journeying to some nearer place of worship.

While these thoughts were balancing themselves, fate came in the form of a committee. Some of the Christian Endeavorers in the hotel had decided that the one hundred or more shut-ins, who were unable to venture out in such weather, might have a service in the hotel parlors; and the Visitor was the victim chosen to conduct it. It was the penalty of indecision. Far easier it would have been to brave the storm and enjoy Dr. Power's sermon than remain for the fate that ensued. But the parlor service was at least an inspiring one. The little company that first gathered in the double rooms was augmented soon by people from all parts of the hotel, and the parlors and the hall were filled. It was a proof of the fact that nothing can stop a Christian Endeavor crowd from enjoying the ministries of the Lord's day, no matter what weather conditions may be.

From St. Paul to Chautauqua, New York, is a "long jump," as the lecture bureau people say. But Chautauqua was made interesting last week by a series of important conferences on religious education held under the direction of the R. E. A. The program of these meetings has been published in the Christian Century and need not be repeated here. But the morning conferences, the afternoon lectures, and the executive sessions of the Council of Religious Education were all deeply interesting. One of the most important features of the week was the meeting of the joint committee representing the National Education Association, the Religious Education Association, and the Federal Council of the Churches. The purpose of this committee is to formulate the principles in accordance with which a satisfactory Sunday-school curriculum may be outlined. It is definitely understood that no existing plan of study is to be interfered with nor is any publication interest to be favored in the new scheme. It is simply to provide a series of suggestions and ideals which shall issue in a Sunday-school curriculum, adjusted to the needs of children and young people who are already familiar with the splendid results of pedagogical work in the public schools and colleges. It is significant that three great organizations, devoted to religion and education, can unite in this plan. The progress that is being made in Sunday-school pedagogy is encouraging to a high degree.

From Chautauqua the Visitor went directly to Pentwater, Michigan, which is gradually becoming a rendezvous for the Disciples. Beautifully situated on the eastern shore of Lake Michigan, it has all the natural features which have made a number of places along that shore the resort of seekers after summer rest and recreation. As yet, Pentwater has the charm of an unspoiled paradise. The resorters have not found it in such numbers as to make it a fashionable place. Simplicity is the note of its life. In front of it, to the west, lies Lake Michigan, stretching out in fascinating perspective to the sky line. Connected with this by a narrow channel is the inner Pentwater Lake, some two miles in length, on whose margin the town of Pentwater is situated. All along the main shore of Lake Michigan to the north and south of the channel the sand hills rise to varying heights, covered with thick growth of oak and cedar. On these sand hills, which command magnificent views both east and west, the summer cottages of an increasing company of people rise.

The Disciples have two parks or tracts of land on the lake front. Garrison Park, some distance south of the channel, is developing admirably. Several Disciples have followed Dr. Garrison to this excellent location, and it is destined to be a beautiful summer colony within a few years. To the north of the channel lies Campbell Park, owned by a company of Chicago Disciples. Here several cottages have been erected or are in process of building. Along this shore all the fascinations of forest, hill, and lake are combined. There is the perfect freedom of unconventionalized life. Children, emancipated from the formalities of city existence, return to nature with an abandon and zest that give them the joy and advantage of an uninterrupted out-of-door life for the long vacation months. Fishing, boating, hunting, swimming, nature study, building and reading are the arts and crafts of the place and the time. The days are always cool and in the evenings beach fires or the blazing comfort of cottage fire-places add fascination to the place. Pentwater is easily reached by both steamer and railroad, and its attractiveness for Disciples, already great, is certainly increasing from year to year as the two groups, located now, increase in numbers. The Visitor came back to the activities of the summer quarter at the University with a longing that he might escape for a much longer period to the delights and rest of that mecca of the weary on the eastern shore of Lake Michigan.

The Preacher and the People

An Intimate Talk About the Preacher's Practical Problems

By Edward B. Bagby

Personality is God's chosen medium for the communication of truth. God might have spelled His love in the stars, or disclosed it in visions and dreams, or announced it to the wondering multitudes by herald angels. "But God sent forth His Son, born of a woman." "In him was life and the life was the light of men." "Of his fulness have we all received and grace for grace." As Jesus commits to his disciples the task of the establishment of his Kingdom upon the earth, he follows his Father's method. "As my Father hath sent me into the world, even so have I sent you into the world." In effecting a moral transformation of humanity God relies not upon a compendium of formulated truth, nor upon a body of organized forces, nor even upon the inspired pages of Holy Writ; but upon people made in His image and regenerated by His Spirit. "The spirit of man is the candle of the Lord" "And a man shall be as a hiding-place from the wind and a covert from the tempest, as streams of water in a dry place, as the shade of a great rock in a weary land." Not by truth formulated and fossilized, but by truth incarnated and personally communicated; not by dead ecclesiasticism, but by a living body whose members are Christians and whose head is Christ; not by the cold type of the printed page, but by living epistles known and read of all men. The Master finds the earth in darkness and says to his disciples, "Ye are its light," he finds society corrupt and deteriorating and to his people he says, "Ye are its leaven to transform: ye are its salt to preserve." Is it not true that personality has been the great illuminating, purifying and regenerating force in the world? What are Heaven's best gifts? Love that beareth all things, faith that does not falter, hope that sings in the darkness. Have not these and virtues of every lovely hue been borne to us through a mother's love, father's authority and teacher's influence.

Life Begets Life.

Only life begets life. Nothing but fire will kindle fire. A manufactured seed will not sprout, a dead branch will bear no fruit, salt that has lost its savor is good for nothing. We cannot proffer what we do not possess. No man can give what he has not. Being filled with the fulness of God we must seek outlets. There must be personal contact between giver and receiver. The light is not to be hid under the bushel, but its place is on the stand; the salt must mingle with the mass, the leaven permeate the meal. "I pray not," said the Master, "that thou shouldst take them out of the world, but that thou shouldst keep them from the Evil One." Insulated from evil and energized for good. "Freely ye have received, freely give." "Being partakers of the promise in Christ Jesus through the gospel, we must be ministers thereof according to the working of His power." "He is not to be conformed to the world, but being transformed by the renewing of his mind" he is to be a transforming power in the world.

"O, fill me with Thy fulness, Lord,
Until my very heart o'erflows,
In kindling thought and glowing word
Thy love to tell, Thy praise to show."

Paul says that the minister should take heed not only to himself and to his doctrine, but also to them that hear him. This implies an acquaintance with the people. How shall he show himself approved unto God, a workman that needeth not to be ashamed, if he does not study the material upon which he works. How shall he give answer to the chief Shepherd if he does not know his sheep?

Must Know His People.

He must know his people—know their names, street numbers and occupations—and know, too, their dispositions, their temptations, their struggles, rejoicing with them in their joys and weeping with them in their sorrows. As one has said, "The preacher cannot carry people over the route of his ministry as a ferryman carries passengers across the river, always running his boat in the same line and never asking the names of the people he carries. He must count himself rather like the tutor of a family of princes, who with careful study of their several dispositions, trains the royal nature of each for their special Kingdom over which he is to rule.

With those outside his own fold, as well, he should seek to cultivate a close acquaintance, manifesting for them a sympathetic interest and going out of his way to extend to them practical help. Like his Master he will welcome opportunities for ministering to the lowly. He will care for those for whom no one else cares.

When a great evangelist whose name is known over two continents and who is an eloquent advocate of the higher life, was holding a revival in Washington, I said to him one day, "There is a servant girl in the hotel in which you are stopping who is in great distress. Would you seek an opportunity of speaking to her?. It might be the means of her salvation." "No," he said, "I find that I cannot do this work. I must save myself for my public ministrations."

Jesus' Way.

"And Jesus, being wearied with his journey, sat thus by the well. There cometh a woman of Samaria, etc." You know the story, and can make the contrast. Made after the perfect model was Phillips Brooks, who, in the last decade of his ministry, with health impaired, gave himself with abandon to work among the lowly, though his particular field was among the rich and noble. Expected at a fashionable reception, he did not appear until nearly 11 o'clock. He had been detained at a hospital by a colored man who had been injured and had sent for him. A physician expressed surprise that he had not sent an assistant, as any physician would have done. Mr. Brooks' reply was, "But he sent for me."

I would not undervalue the minister's official duties; his public proclamation of the Word, his pastoral visitation, his conduct of weddings and funerals; but I would emphasize a phase of his ministry which is too often slighted, viz., the transforming influence of his personality as he lives among the people; touching them in the market place, hailing them upon the streets, dealing with them over the counters, sharing their common life.

Many will thus meet him who may never come to his church, or call upon him for any ministerial function; but if for his presence the sky is bluer, the sun brighter and life nobler and purer, his labor is not in vain in the Lord.

The Preacher for the People.

The preacher for the people should be able to look at life from the people's viewpoint; he should seek to understand their bodily needs, their intellectual difficulties, the trend of their religious life. He should study profoundly the problems of his times. He must take people as he finds them and summon them to the best of which they are capable.

While one with the people, yet, in a sense the true minister must be apart. There need not be a difference in the cut of his clothes or in the tones of his voice or in any of the outward details of his life; but he should always be to the people God's man. His presence should be a call to prayer; his smile a benediction, his handgrasp an uplift and inspiration. He must lead in the procession. He should be able to say, "Be ye imitators of me."

Living among his people but manifestly constrained by a diviner motive; his daily life a protest against materialism; he brings a gift and is not for graft. His anxiety is for the flock and not the fleece. "I seek not yours, but you." He does not ask, "How many will serve me?" but rather, how many can I serve? and with what completeness of service?

An Example.

Secretary Thompson of the Presbyterian Home Board tells of such a minister. With his family he lived in a contracted and difficult field on the frontier. He was offered a pastorate of comfort and special educational advantages for his family, and was repeatedly solicited to accept. It was a hard pull. Every worldly consideration and family pride urged him to go, but at last he wired, "I cannot leave my cowboys." What is our greatest problem? Is it not this? How may our homes and business and politics and statesmanship, and literature and amusements be leavened through and through with the spirit of the gospel of Christ? Is not the measure in which we aid in the solution of this problem the true measure of our success as ministers? Not the number of names added to the church roll, nor the amount of moneys raised, nor the length of the pastorate, but the spiritual impress upon the community. Is the merchant more honest? the servant tidier? the home life sweeter? the thoughts of youth purer? Is there more of heaven on earth?

This message is from one who is painfully conscious of the disparity between his own ministry and that of the standards presented. Suffer then in closing the word of one who embodied what he preached; "Take heed unto yourselves, and to all the flock, in which the Holy Spirit hath made you overseers, to feed the church of God which he purchased with his own blood. . . Watch ye, remembering that by the space of three years I ceased not to admonish everyone night and day with tears. And now, I commend you to God and to the word of his grace, which is able to build you up and to give you an inheritance among them that are sanctified. I coveted no man's silver or gold or apparel. Ye yourselves know that these hands ministered unto my necessities and to them that were with me. In all things I gave you an example, that so laboring ye ought to help the weak, and to remember the words of the Lord Jesus, that he himself said, 'It is more blessed to give than receive.'"

THE LOST TOP.

I lost my top—O, what a pity!
But now its fate I know,
I'm sure 'twas swallowed by my kitty,
'Cause when I listen so,
And put my ear down close to her,
I hear it humming—
"Whir—whir—whir-r!"

Mr. Wakefield's Extra Inducements

By Hilda Richmond

"Tildy gone?" said Mr. Wakefield, peering into the thick cloud of smoke in the kitchen where his wife was broiling a steak. "Gone for good?"

"I hope so," said his wife between her set teeth. "Tildy really was the most worthless, incompetent girl I ever saw, but I felt forced to keep her as long as she would stay because help is so scarce. Arthur, I wish you would take Violet and the baby out of this room at once. They are in my way all the time."

It was a sizzling hot place for the day was warm and depressing, and his wife's face bore the look of a martyr, or perhaps Mr. Wakefield would have given his views on the subject of domestics just then. As it was he rescued the infants, and made his escape, reserving what he had to say until the disturbers of the peace were safe in bed and he was seated with his wife on the front porch. Not that the two children were incorrigible, but the sultry weather and the fact that their mother had had little time for them since early in the morning when her incompetent hand maiden departed, made them whine and fret and add to the general discomfort.

"Where are you going to get another maid?" he asked by way of introduction.

"Advertise, I suppose," said Mrs. Wakefield wearily. "That's the only way I know."

"Well, my dear, you know what I have always said. I am sorry for you, but you seem to prefer your old ways. Now I never have any trouble getting good workers, for I always offer just a little bit more in the way of inducements, and I get the cream of the bunch. If you would adopt that plan your troubles would all be over."

"I pay as much as any other woman in the neighborhood, and in many cases more," said Mrs. Wakefield. "I think, Arthur, if you had to wrestle with the servant girl problem, you would lose a lot of your beautiful theories. Women are not like men, anyway. A girl works a little while until she gets some new clothes, and then she goes home to wear them out, or she gets married or else she knows there are so many places waiting to receive her with open arms that she tries variety. You never had any experience along that line so—"

"But I'm going to have," interrupted Mr. Wakefield. "Next week I have my vacation, and I'll examine the prospective candidates for the situation of maid-of-all work in this establishment. You'll see that by offering a few extra inducements I'll get just the right person. It is easy to pay out a little more for a good article, than to save money by taking a cheap one. We'll try to scrape along somehow until I get home, and then you'll see what will happen."

So the advertisement carefully worded was placed in the paper, and applicants notified when to call. Mrs. Wakefield was just doing the morning dishes when the first candidate appeared on Monday morning. She was a tall, stylishly dressed person, and she gave the man of the house a thorough survey as she explained her errand.

"What wages?" was her brief question as soon as she entered.

"What wages have you been accustomed to?" hedged the man of the house, thinking this was not his ideal maid servant.

"Five dollars a week, and no washing and ironing!"

"I am willing to pay more than that for a competent maid," said the man of the house.

"How much more?"

"Well, to the right person six dollars. I mean to one who gives entire satisfaction."

"How much of a family?"

"My wife, myself and two children.'

"How old are the children?"

"Look here," said Mr. Wakefield, his wrath rising, "I am not going to be put through a regular catechism. I am sure you are not the right person."

But when he thought it over the rest of that day and no other person came, he concluded he had been too rash. Mrs. Wakefield said nothing, but he felt that she was enjoying his nervousness and the haste with which he answered the door bell all day.

"Where is the lady of the house?" said a rather good looking young woman, trim and tidy, when he opened the front door at nine the next morning.

"Mrs. Wakefield is busy just now," he said politely. "What is it you want to see her about?"

"I saw your ad in the—"

"Come in!" said the master of the house, flinging open the door. "I can explain about the place."

"Well, what about it?" said the girl encouragingly.

"We want a competent maid-of-all-work," began Mr. Wakefield easily. "Our family is small and the house convenient. There are two children, one five and the other three, and these with my wife and myself complete the family. We send out the washing and buy our bread in summer. The house is not large and the work not burdensome." He paused, but the girl said nothing so he felt forced to keep on. "What experience have you had?" he asked as a thought struck him.

"Here are my references," she said producing some letters from her hand bag. "I am a stranger in this town though."

Of course the references meant nothing, so he tried a new tack. "We are willing to pay very good wages to the right person," he said. "Perhaps you would like to come on trial, and—"

"Indeed, I've never had to go on trial anywhere, and I'll not begin now. How many evenings out does the girl get, and what sort of a room has she, and do you object to followers? I'd have to see the kitchen and everything before I made up my mind."

"The right girl will get six dollars per week and extra inducements in the way of time off," said Mr. Wakefield. "We want a maid who will give satisfaction and are willing to pay more than she can get elsewhere, if she is competent."

"Let me see your kitchen," said the young woman. "I can tell better then."

Mr. Wakefield meekly conducted her to the kitchen where his wife in a big gingham apron was preparing a salad. "How does it happen that you're leaving?" said the girl abruptly, turning to the mistress of the house, while Mr. Wakefield was calling attention to the convenient cupboard. "Is anything wrong with the place?"

"That is my wife!" said Mr. Wakefield haughtily. "I don't think it is necessary to show you anything more in the kitchen."

"No, I think not," said the girl calmly. "I don't think the place would suit me. I prefer work where there are no children."

For a week Mr. Wakefield labored and offered extra inducements, every day recklessly promising more privileges, and every day raising the price per week. He had a number of applicants, but could induce none of them to stay. At last he gave up in despair and turned over the task to his wife with the meek confession that the problem was beyond him. She almost immediately selected a girl at four dollars per week, the price paid in the neighborhood, and made no calculations as to how long she could keep her.

"Why, that's the very girl I offered six dollars a week to, and three evenings to entertain her best beau, and one afternoon off and every other Sunday free," whispered Mr. Wakefield to his hostess some weeks later, as he and his wife were spending the evening with friends, and the maid brought in cake and ice cream. "What on earth did you have to promise her to get her?"

"Four dollars a week and the usual time off," said the hostess struggling to keep back a smile.

"You don't mean it! What did she say about me? I see she told you something I'll give a dollar to your favorite charity, Mrs. Gregg, if you'll tell."

"That is too good an offer to lose," said the hostess. "She told me that all the girls you tried to get felt sure there must be something wrong with the place when you offered such good wages. Hester, that is our girl's name, said she felt sure you must be a tyrant, or you'd let wour wife manage, and she just couldn't bear to live in a house where the man tried to run everything."

"Tell him the rest," said Mrs. Wakefield. "I don't mind."

"Hester says some of the applicants thought Mrs. Wakefield must be rather feeble minded, and you wanted a guardian for her, and one thought the house was haunted. It excited their suspicions to find some one who was so anxious to get a maid, and they wouldn't try it."

"Laugh if you want to," said Mr. Wakefield. "I'm done offering extra inducements, and I fully sympathize with you ladies. If I had as much trouble hiring men as you have with one girl apiece I'd flee to a desert island. Never again will I offer my advice in household matters!"

The Blind Spot

In all vision there is a blind spot; every savant is a fool upon some topic. This is exemplified by the readiness with which the most astute business and professional man will dabble in speculation—such as mining and allurements similar.

What man of ordinary common-sense would think of buying a house which he had never seen and his agent had never seen; or a horse, or a gun, or almost anything into which he is putting money, without privilege of examination and expectation of using that privilege? And yet the majority of men will invest, "sight unseen," as the boys say, in a mine, in an oil well, in a rubber plantation,

Somehow, ninety-nine out of a hundred men who thus invest, as a side issue, seem to anticipate that chance will overlook their utter disregard of business principles, and will work a miracle in their favor. They go upon the theory "A fool for luck." This is why speculation of this nature is fallen into evil ways, and why a gold mine so often proves a gold brick.

The public has itself to blame. Mines, oil-wells, rubber plantations, can be made sources of profit, and are made sources of profit; but they should not be played as one plays a slot-machine.—Edwin L. Sabin in Lippincott's Magazine.

Gran'daddy's Birthday

To My Grandfather, by F. Dana Burnet.

Gran'daddy, Gran'daddy,
  Ha' ye put a chair,
Before the place wha' wad be mine,
An I were ainly there?
Gran'daddy, Gran'daddy,
  I ha' kept a spot,
Open i' my heart for you
  Whether I'm there or not!

Gran'daddy, Gran'daddy,
  I ha' made a prayer,
To fill the place wha' wad be mine
  An I were ainly there!
Gran'daddy, Gran'daddy,
  Here's wha' I wad say,
That a' my heart's gang hame wi' you,
  Whether I'm there or nae!

Gran'daddy, Gran'daddy,
  May nae cauld blast blaw
Upon your ingle, burnin' blithe,
  And waft its warmpth awa'.
Gran'daddy, Gran'daddy,
  May God's blessing fa'
Upon your house and keep it safe,
  From sorrow, grief and a'.

Gran'daddy, Gran'daddy,
  Seventy years and three,
You've walked, a mon amidst a' men,
  Sae brae and fearlessly!
Gran'daddy, Gran'daddy,
  'Tis like you I wad be,
Sae honored o' men, sae blest we love
  O' the childer' at your knee.

Gran'daddy, Gran'daddy,
When you're breakin' bread,
Together wi' a' those ye love,
  And after Grace is said,
Gran'daddy, Gran'daddy
  Say a wee bit prayer,
Beneath your breath for me, and I
  Will be as guid as there!

Charley Rand's Cherries

BY SARAH N. MC CREERY. . .

"Mrs. Evans! Mrs. Evans!" Ned Tillman's shrill, childish voice caused Mrs. Evans to open her eyes with a start.

She sighed as she went to the window. It was just half an hour before, that she had come up to the pretty blue and white room for a rest. "I shall have two good, long hours before I must dress," she had told herself. That was the reason she asked rather impatiently, "What do you want, Ned?"

"Mother sent me to tell you that some boys are stealing your cherries. Three boys are in the trees, and they are throwing the cherries down to the rest. I peeked in at the front door, and I thought you were upstairs, so I just called," Ned explained.

"Well, wait for me, I'll go back with you," she returned. Ned sat down on the porch and fanned himself with his hat while he waited. "That's just the way I thought it would be," grumbled Mrs. Evans, as she turned from the window. "I knew, when mother went to California and left us to look after the fruit, that we would get precious little of it. "I wish Jerrol was home," but there was no use wishing that, for Mr. Evans had taken the "Express" to Greenfield that morning, and would not be home until the last of the week. "If I had those boys—" but she had reached the porch and the thought was not finished.

"Mother tried to make the boys get out," Ned remarked, "but they said the cherries did not belong to her."

"They are bad boys to cause so much trouble. You wouldn't steal anybody's cherries, would you, Ned?" Mrs. Evans asked, smiling down at the boy.

"I might," he admitted honestly, "if I thought father wouldn't find it out, but he would be sure to, and then I would get a thrashing. Some folks don't care if their boys do steal," he added.

Mrs. Evans laughed at his frankness. "Thank you, Ned, for telling me about the boys. I am going down the alley, perhaps I can catch them, and it is nearer, anyway." She had gone a short distance when she saw Charlie Rand coming toward her with something in his hat. "Cherries," she said, under her breath, aloud she remarked, "Good afternoon, Charlie."

"Good afternoon," returned Charlie, as he whisked the hat behind him, and started to hurry on.

Mrs. Evans stopped him. "Mrs. Tillman sent me word that some boys are stealing my mother's cherries," and she tried not to notice the tell-tale flush that spread over the boy's face. "I want those cherries to can," she continued, "I am so fond of them. I can't watch them, they are too far from my home, and I thought perhaps you would do it for me. I would make you a "cherry policeman." Would you be willing to do this for me?"

"Yes'm, if you wanted me to," the tone was low, and Charlie looked crestfallen.

"All right, I shall not worry another bit about them, and I'll pay you for your work." She smiled as she went in at the back gate.

When Charlie left Mrs. Evans, he went to a little park opposite his home, where he was soon joined by the other boys.

"We got out just in time," giggled Guy Thurston. "I'll bet you got a good lecture."

"I didn't either. She just asked me to look after her cherries, and—and—I promised to do it. I guess she didn't see the hatful I had," Charlie ended sheepishly.

"No, I guess not," Joe Knowles responded, "she would never have asked you, if she had. You're easy, if you really said you would do it."

"I did promise, and I mean to keep it. You boys won't steal any more cherries, will you?"

"Getting awful good, aren't you? Well, I think, before you watch any cherries, you had better tell Mrs. Evans about the ones you stole. You were too big a coward to do that," taunted Fred Burrus.

Charlie's face grew sober. "Perhaps I ought to, I never thought of it." The boys returned winks, then they had more to say. Charlie sat deep in thought and did not heed them. "You're right, boys," he said, finally, "I ought to tell Mrs. Evans, and I will."

He started down the street, and as he turned in at the Evans' gate, he heard the jeers of the boys in the distance. His hand trembled as he rang the bell. He secretly hoped Mrs. Evans would not be at home, but in a moment she opened the door. "I came to tell you that—that—" he faltered, "that I stole cherries, too. I don't think you will want to trust me to watch the rest."

"I knew you did," and Mrs. Evans smiled into the troubled face, "but I knew, too, that you would not take any more when you had promised to watch them."

"Oh," and Charlie was puzzled. He couldn't understand why he should be trusted, when his fault was known. That was not the way folks usually did with boys.

"I want you to pick my cherries, if you will," Mrs. Evans continued. "I will pay you what other pickers get."

"I will do it, but I ought to do it cheaper because—well, you didn't scold or anything."

"And I should pay you more, because you were brave enough to confess that you took some," she returned. "I will let you know what day I want them picked."

The next few days were trying ones for Charlie. His boy friends teased, taunted, and threatened to "clean up every tree," but he prevented it. One night he had to watch until midnight, but the trees were safe. On Monday the picking was begun, and it was Friday night before it was finished. Charlie thought he never saw four trees have so much fruit. "I'm through," he announced to Mrs. Evans, as he brought over the last bucketful at dark. "I was just bound to finish today."

"You have picked a hundred quarts," Mrs. Evans said, as she emptied the bucket, and she handed him two dollars. "I hope you can help me when the peaches are ripe."

Mr. Evans had come to the porch and he watched Charlie with interest. "My office boy left this morning," he said suddenly, "do you happen to know where I could find another?"

"I would like the place," said Charlie eagerly, then his face fell. "You might think I would take things because I took some cherries."

"I would be glad to give you the place," was the hearty answer. "You proved true to your trust in case of the cherries, and that is a good enough recommendation for me. I don't think you will disappoint me, when you know I am trusting you. You may come in the morning," and Mr. Evans went indoors.

"Oh, thank you!" Charlie called after him, then he ran home to tell his big brother the news. He couldn't tell his chum, for there had been a coldness between them since he refused to take any more cherries. "I think it is better to be kind to a boy when he has done wrong," he finished, thoughtfully, when he had told Don about his good fortune. "If Mrs. Evans had scolded me, I believe I would have taken some more cherries. When I found out she trusted me, anyway, it gave me—" he hesitated.

"Respect for yourself?" suggested Don.

"Yes, I couldn't think of that word. It made me respect myself too much to do a mean thing. And I think I got this place because I had the grit to tell what I had done," ended Charlie.

"I know you did," was Don's answer.

The Vacation-less Summer.

By Grace Dickerson.

It is high time a good word was said for the vacation-less summer. A great deal has been written and spoken about the value of vacations, their joys, their re-creative power, in fact, their absolute indispensableness for young and old, rich and poor, men, women and children. Now, we subscribe to all this; we have nothing against vacations either in theory or practice: indeed we have practiced them faithfully for many years. All we say is that it's time somebody said a good word for the summer without a vacation. There come such summers to most individuals and families—and they are not nearly so black as they are painted. They are full of pleasant possibilities; possibilities which we have quite ignored while we were basking on ocean beaches, or climbing mountains, or skimming over blue waters, or lighting camp fires. Of course, the pleasures of a summer at home are different from those, very different; but they are none the less real. In the first place there is the pleasure and freedom of being at home—the joy of sitting on your own front porch quiet and unmolested, instead of watching a dizzying procession of hotel "guests" tramp back and forth before you; there is the pleasure of just doing nothing when you want to, instead of taking a hand at some game in a stuffy parlor "to oblige Mrs. Shetland" because "the gentlemen are so scarce, you know"; and if you are a woman there is the comfort of slipping on your old, thinnest muslin for dinner, instead of your best one, and not having to persecute the children into the starchy respectability of clean dresses three times a day. When it's hot there is the pleasure of the porcelain tub and of roaming through a whole house hunting the breeze; and perhaps the luxury of choosing one's bedroom at night. If it's cold and it rains for three days, there is the wood fire and quiet therewith. Yes, my vacationer, you who are dripping in camp, or shut up in a boarding house parlor or a mountain hotel, reduced to worsted work or bowling, while the children romp and quarrel, think of the joy of a wood fire in the living-room at home, of the peaceful luncheon, of the contented children off in the nursery and the chance to read or snooze in a room where all the shoes are not moulding and sheets are not clammy with dampness! There's the pleasure of sleeping at night, too, when you want to; without listening to the piano and the dancing below, or to the fussy lady packing her trunks above your head, or to the other fellow's baby crying next door; without the arousing presence in the heart of nature, of the black fly and woodticks, or the still, small, unanswerable voice of the blood-thirsty mosquito. Ah, yes, there are compensations in the summer at home.

Not to be passed over is the luxury of clean clothes; think of it! you poor creature whose "washing" is gone for a three weeks' stay. Think of the joy of putting on clean duck trousers or a fresh shirt waist when you need them! Oh, we all remember what we have suffered from the hotel laundry that empties the pocket-book and makes the clothes as blue as their owner, and from the country "washer-woman" who "cal'lates to wash 'em clean," even if she washes away all the buttons and large sections of the garments as well; or from the "agent," in more remote regions, into whose railway basket we reluctantly cast our collars and shirts, knowing that like bread upon the waters they will return to us only after many days, or perhaps not at all. At home we do not need to "do up" all the handkerchiefs and "iron" them on the window panes and mirrors.

Among all the pleasures of the home summer, however, the greatest perhaps is the pleasure of eating. Might 's well say it right out—the pleasure of eating a square dinner every night in the week. We agree perfectly with President Elliot when he includes among the pleasures of a happy life that of eating. He frankly admits that he is partly animal and says that while he remains so he expects to enjoy good food. He seems to think it has a beneficial effect upon mankind in general and himself in particular. With ill-concealed glee he tells the story of the pious old lady who was visited on her death-bed by her minister. "My good woman," asked the clergyman solemnly, "as you look back over your long life, in what have you found your greatest pleasure?" and without a moment's hesitation she replied: "My victuals." Honest old soul! She was never deluded into spending many summer vacations away from home! We all remember the resorts where the fresh eggs and garden "sass" are sent to the city, where the cream is saved for cheeses, and where we strive in vain to make the huge doughnuts take the place of chicken and roast beef.

Poor wretch, looking hungrily for a raspberry or a juicy peach, and trying to get fat on the "view," what wouldn't you give for a chance to sit down at the home breakfast table with the well-iced melons and the fragrant coffee? And how about the roast chickens for dinner and the peaches and cream—real cream? Mr. Dooley knew what he was talking about when he said: "the place to be ain't where all the good things comes from, but where all the good things goes to." Not that we have anything to say against summer vacations, remember. We have all taken them, and we'll take them again—whenever we get a chance, of course. That's all right. But there's a thing or two in favor of the summer at home. If you can't go away, don't think you're suffering awful privations. Remember how we've dragged out a weary existence during a week's rain in camp, how we've gasped on the humid shores of inland lakes, fought all manner of "critturs" in mountain forests, and starved in well-advertised resorts on the coast. Reflect upon these things and admit that staying at home has its compensations, and that, after all, there are worse things in life than the vacation-less summer.

The Story of a Mountain Bluejay.

For many years Cedar Canon had been the home of woodpeckers, bluejays and gray squirrels. The tall pines were theirs and the sloping hillsides. Through long, bright summers and snowy winters they lived undisturbed in their far-away corner of the Sierra mountains. At last men came to cut down the giant trees. Straight through the lovely canon they built a railroad to carry logs to the sawmill below. Soon, instead of gray squirrels, woodpeckers and bluejays, sixty men were living in the canon, sixty men and a few families. They put up tents and built shacks in the midst of squirrel homes, laughing the while at scolding bluejays and indignant woodpeckers.

At last the gray squirrels, the woodpeckers and bluejays moved away from Cedar Canon. But they loved their old home and the bravest often went back visiting. One bird, a beautiful buejay, with a tuft of perfect feathers on his dainty head, used to go every day to the canon. His own folks warned him of danger. The gray squirrels said he would be shot, and the woodpeckers told him that men were always trying to shoot their red caps. Truth to tell, the venturesome bluejay knew that two little children lived in the canon. Their names were Jennie and Robbie. He wasn't a bit afraid to go near them, and one day, when the children were eating dinner in their outdoor dining room the bluejay perched on a tree close by and talked to them with his head on one side. After that he flew down to the railing beside the table. Next thing the bluejay knew he was eating dinner with the family.

A few days later the children named their pet; called him Dick. In time Dick lost all fear of strangers. No one harmed him, and he supposed every man in camp was his friend. Robbie and Jennie loved the bird. They fed him choicest dainties and watched for his coming whenever they sat down to the table. Always the bluejays in the forest warned Dick to be careful The men in camp had guns, and just for the fun of seeing how straight they could shoot they aimed at birds. It wasn't safe to fly through Cedar Canon tree tops dressed in blue and brown.

Sometimes when Robbie, Jennie and their mother climbed the hills they found on the ground birds that would never fly again. Jennie did wish men wouldn't shoot birds: but what could one little girl do to save their precious lives? She didn't know. One evening when the canon was lighted with the wondrous glow of sunset above surrounding hills Jennie offered Dick a bit of cheese. The bird fluttered down to the table and fell in a pitiful bunch by Robbie's plate. He had been shot.

"But some one may shoot him again," sobbed Jennie. Suddenly the child wiped her eyes and wrote a notice, which the man in charge of the commissary allowed her to tack upon the door.

This is what every man in camp read the folowing day:

"I have a little pet bluejay. Somebody shot at him yesterday and broke his leg. Please don't do it again. Jennie MacColl."

Some of the men whistled, many of them laughed; but every one of the sixty had a kind heart, and from that day it has been perfectly safe to fly through the tree tops of Cedar Canon dressed in blue and brown.—The Churchman.

The delight in nature is the purest, sweetest, freshest of our pleasures. It has no after-taste of pain. And this God's infinite bounty has brought within the touch of every hand.—James Baldwin Brown.

THE FINDING OF CAMILLA

By Lucie E. Jackson, author of "Feadora's Failure," "For Muriel's Sake."

Copyright, Ward Lock & Co., London.

"Please do," returned the old lady, wiping away a tear that was trickling slowly down her cheek.

The letter was not a long one, but it contained much. It filled one whole sheet of foreign paper, and was written in a shaky hand.

No waste of words, no extravagant expressions of affection, had been used by the writer. He merely stated that he had not behaved as he should have done in keeping out of touch with his relations, and that he hoped they had not given him up for dead.

"The bad and the useless always turn up," read aloud Brian Falconer slowly and deliberately. "And in this case I fear the latter adjective must be applied to me. But, bad or useless, I crave to see the old homestead once more, and to look into the faces of those I left sixteen years ago. For this purpose, and for one other, I am coming home, if my health, which is in a very precarious state, will permit me to travel in this bitter weather. I wish also to present to you my little daughter Camilla, whom I know you will love for her own sake if not for your wandering son's. Her mother Madeline died two years ago, and since then the child has been my sole companion. Camilla is eight years old. In your hands I wish to place her, for in what others could she be as safe—my one ewe lamb for whose safety I tremble when I think of him who led me, weak fool that I was, into more wickedness than I thought it possible. You know whom I refer to—the fellow you always guarded me against when I was but a scatter-brained youth. I can hardly bring myself to write his name, but that merely shows my weakness. To conquer it I must write the name in full, if only to cast shame on my folly of olden days. I write of Roger Densham. You will shrink from the name as you read it; I know you will. And so do I, but for reasons apart from yours. I tell you I fear Roger Densham for my child's sake. I have made him my enemy since, nine years ago, I married the girl he had intended for himself, and when I married her I flung off his influence with a desperate hand, all the more desperate for realizing the evil courses he had gradually drawn me into at the gaming tables. My marriage was my salvation: it was Madeleine's influence that kept me away from my so-called friend. I cut myself adrift from him on the very eve of my marriage, and have had no intercourse with him from that day to this. But, for all that, I tell you I fear him—not for myself. Madeleine and One other have made me strong to resist his temptations. But I fear him for my child's sake. He will attempt to do me an injury through her, and this thought is helping me to drive me homewards, lest I die in a foreign land and leave my child to the mercy of strangers and to him.

"Forgive, if you can, your erring son, who craves your pardon for himself, and your tender care for his little child.

"REXINGTON FALCONER."

Brian Falconer's voice ceased as he came to the end of the letter. Then he looked up and said quietly—

"Poor old Rexington!"

His eyes met those of his mother. The tears were streaming down the old lady's cheeks. Algy stayed his occupation to throw his arms round her and give her a hearty kiss.

"Don't cry, grannie," he said softly. "You'll soon have Uncle Rexington with you."

"Please God," said his father.

And "Please God," sighed the Squire.

Mrs. Falconer wiped her eyes, and the next instant Nicola Bartoletti was announced.

He was a man of middle size with an Italian-liooking face, dark, restless eyes, and thin lips. His sister Francesca had been the wife of Squire Falconer's second son, Lewis. At her husband's death she had jealously guarded the interests of her only child, Anita, and when she lay dying she had bequeathed this guardianship to her brother Nicolo.

He shook hands with the Squire and his wife, gave a nod to Mr. Brian Falconer, and took no notice of Algy, who had returned to his whittling, and who contented himself with making a grimace behind the Italian's back.

Mr. Bartoletti looked from one to another as he drew up a chair and held out a pair of well-shaped hands towards the welcome blaze.

"It is blowing guns outside," he said in a strangely musical voice, while his eyes furtively glanced at the letter Mr. Brian Falconer still held.

"Hum," replied the latter. "It's a nasty day, but the Squire has heard news which has filled us all with joy. My elder brother Rexington has written at last to tell my parents that they may expect to see him any day, and that he is bringing his little daughter with him."

Mr. Bartioletti's jaw dropped. He stared for an instant as if not able to understand what had been said to him. Then suddenly pushing his chair back he stood up.

"I—I did not know he had a child," he said, stammering slightly.

"Yes," returned Brian Falconer; "she is eight years of age."

"And—she—comes—too?" questioned Mr. Bartoletti with a pause between each word.

The Squire gave a curt inclination of his head. He had never liked Mr. Bartoletti and he never would like him; he distrusted him.

The Italian said nothing for the next minute or two. His eyes traveled towards the window where a portion of the park with its beautiful trees and its spotted deer could be seen, and beyond that lay the woodlands which even in their winter dress had so great an attraction for Mr. Bartoletti.

His thin lips twitched nervously. He glanced round the room, then let his eyes wander slowly back to the Squire's face.

"And does your son say nothing of why he has kept you all this time in ignorance as to his whereabouts, when you had given him up for dead?" he asked.

"He has told us everything," said the Squire coldly, "but these particulars we keep for our family alone."

"I have for some time considered myself a member of that family," returned the Italian with emphasis.

"Only to the extent of being brother to my son Lewis's wife and guardian to his child," replied the Squire haughtily. "Had my son Lewis not died and had his wife not died, you would never have set foot amongst us, sir."

Mr. Bartoletti's features settled into an expression of hardness as he said shortly—

"However that may be, you will not dispute my authority as guardian over Anita, and for this reason alone I must make inquiry how the sudden turning up of this eldest son affects my ward's position as the inheritor of this vast property." He waved his hand as he spoke towards the view from the window, which he had been regarding just a while before.

"And it is for this reason that I have asked you here, Mr. Bartoletti," remarked the Squire in choleric tones; "for this reason and no other. The sudden turning up of my eldest son, as you term it, must of course affect my granddaughter Anita's position in a large degree. According to the entail, my eldest son will now inherit the greater part of my property. And, failing him, it must go to my granddaughter Camilla."

"And failing her?" The sneer was plainly visible, and Mr. Bartoletti's mouth took an ugly twist.

"Failing Camilla, it reverts to my second granddaughter, Anita."

There was dead silence in the room for a short while.

When Mr. Bartoletti struck in, a sneering note sounding through the music of his voice, "Does his former chosen friend and confidante, Roger Densham, accompany him?"

"No, sir, he does not!"

The words were roared out in a voice which made Nicolo Bartoletti spring to his feet. The old man had risen too, and they both stood facing each other. The British lion in the Squire was roused; his features were quivering with anger; the veins on his forehead and temples stood out like whipcord.

With a leisurely movement Brian Falconer interposed his burly form between the two men, and then turned on the younger a look that pierced even his cold heart.

"That was a question which only a dastard would have asked," he remarked with cutting emphasis; then, in a different tone of voice he turned to the Squire. "My dear father," he said, "I think that the business for which you summoned us is now at an end. You have told us that my brother Rexington is alive and returning to his home. That now, I take it, is what you wished us to learn, and having learned it we will keep you no longer, but will bid you good-day."

Then, wheeling sharply round, he said briskly, "Come, Bartoletti, we shall detain my parents no longer."

Mr. Bartoletti took up his hat, bowing low to the old lady, and returning a curt nod for the glare which the Squire cast on him. He found Brian Falconer at his side as he reached the hall door; but as they stepped out into the biting blast Brian Falconer stopped.

"Go on," he said coldly to the Italian. "I may or may not catch up. I shall stop behind to speak to my mother for a while. Don't wait for me," and he had stepped back into the warm hall and had closed the door before Nicolo Bartoletti could open his lips to offer a remonstrance, had he so wished.

"A neat way of getting rid of me and of finding out for himself what that fine brother of his has written home. A precious rascal he was, if all that my sister Francesca told me is true. And to think—to think," cried the Italian, raising his voice as the wind swept round him in whirls and gusts, and the rain drops pattered heavily on his umbrella, "to think that this property should fall into the hands of a rascal who will only play ducks and drakes with it at the gaming table, instead of into the hands of my niece Anita, who, with me as her guardian to control and direct her, would make a fitter inheritor than even the Squire's eldest son will do, be he the rightful heir or no."

CHAPTER V.

At the Inn.

With the step almost of a guilty man, Pierre Gascon bore Camilla off in his arms when the lifeboat grinded on the shore of Deal.

It was four o'clock in the morning, a cold raw morning with the wind blowing a hurricane.

Without waiting to exchange a word in that big crowd, and with Jacques following close on his heels, the Frenchman hastened away, casting an occasional glance over his shoulder in dread of being followed by the man in the black coat. But Roger Densham was nowhere within sight, and Pierre hurried along as fast as his wearied limbs and dripping garments would permit him.

To a small inn standing on a lonely road on the outskirts of Deal he made his way, and there thundered impatiently at the door.

A long silence ensued, which Pierre followed up by another onslaught on the panels. Then suddenly a window from upstairs was flung open, and a man's voice called—

"Who are you that make noise enough to wake the dead?"

"Sh—sh—sh, Robert," was the Frenchman's reply, given in a subdued tone. "Don't stand talking there, but come down and let me in."

"Not till I know who you are!" was the answer.

"Bah!" cried Pierre in a tone of anger. "But don't you know! C'est moi—c'est Pierre."

At this the window was quickly shut, and in a short while steps were heard on the inside of the door, and the sound of a key turned in the lock. Next, the door was opened, and Camilla, half frozen and wholly miserable, saw the face of a big burly English innkeeper with a kindly eye.

"What brings you here at such an hour?" he exclaimed, as the Frenchman staggered in and sank exhausted on to a settle with Camilla still in his arms.

Pierre did not reply immediately. His breath was coming in short quick gasps, and where he sat little pools of water circled round the floor from his own and Camilla's dripping clothes, upon which the innkeeper's eyes rested anxiously.

"What on earth has happened to you, Pierre," he said at length, "and"—with a good humored shrug—"what will Jeanette say to all this?" waving his hand towards the water on the floor.

"She will be thankful that her brother has been spared a watery grave," Pierre roused himself to say. "Call her quick, Robert. I want her to put this little mademoiselle into a warm bath and bed. We have both been fighting for our lives in the surf off the Goodwin Sands."

"The Goodwin Sands! Ah! then we were right when we thought we heard the lifeboat ring!" exclaimed the innkeeper. "Jeannette! Jeanette!" he called, running to the foot of the stairs. "Here is your brother come like a drowned rat, just escaped from the wreck, with a little miss in his arms."

In a trice a trim, plump little Frenchwoman, clad in an amazingly flowered dressing gown, had tripped down the stairs, fallen upon her brother and kissed him warmly on both cheeks, and then, lifting Camilla into her arms, she kissed her as energetically.

"Can you put her into a warm bath and bed at once?" said Pierre anxiously. "She has been in the water too long, and the wind cuts like a knife outside. I'll tell you all about everything later."

"Pauvre petite ange!" was his sister's reply, as she bore her off.

The innkeeper was already engaged in lighting a fire in the cozy little parlor. This done, he bade Pierre strip himself of his wet clothes, and then went away to seek for dry garments.

When Jeanette returned in the space of half an hour, it was to find her brother sitting warm and dry by a glowing fire and looking on with hungry eyes at the innkeeper, who was frizzling slices of ham round a circlet of eggs.

"Ciel!" cried Jeanette, "voyez le cher homme!" Then seizing her husband round the neck, she planted a couple of hasty kisses on each cheek. "Does he not always think of the right thing! But for my angel upstairs I must have other food than that rich dish. I have it! The milk over from our tea of yesterday! Oh! the good thing that I took a pint extra, thinking to make Robert a dish of the English pancakes that he makes so much of." She poured a creamy draught of milk from a jug into a bright saucepan and placed it coaxingly near the frying-pans. "With some bread this will make just the meal for the little mademoiselle. Ah! Pierre, it is that I am longing to hear your story. But presently—presently."

The milk was soon warmed and poured over the bread in a basin, and the brisk little woman trotted off with it, leaving Pierre to partake of her husband's more deliberate cooking.

This he was soon doing.

It was getting on for six o'clock when Jeanette trotted down again to announce the fact that "la petite ange" was sleeping soundly.

"And now for what you have to tell us," she said, drawing her chair close to her husband's.

Pierre then proceeded to give an account of all that had befallen him. In a few rapid words he revealed to his listeners all the awful terrors of that night, and of the charge that the dead father had laid upon him.

"I shall go alone and find out where Miss Barrington lives," ended Pierre, "and when I have delivered the message to her I shall return for the little mademoiselle and take her in a cab. By doing this mademoiselle will not encounter the dark gentleman whom her father feared. Would you not advise me this?"

Jeannette warmly assented. "And for me, I will take the greatest care of la petite enfant whilst you are away," she cried.

Pierre now intimated his wish for a sleep before the day's work began: so to bed he went, only too thankful to stretch his tired limbs and fall into a heavy sleep; whilst Jacques curled himself up on a mat near the door and dozed at intervals.

CHAPTER VI.

Pierre Receives a Shock.

For Jeannette and her husband there was no more sleep. It was now close upon their usual time for getting up, so they moved softly about the house, fearful of making the slightest noise that might rouse the wearied travelers under their roof.

But Pierre was up long before Camilla's little tired frame was rested. The knowledge of the charge laid upon him had awakened him earlier than his sister had expected. At ten o'clock she found him standing before the kitchen fire rubbing his hands before the blaze in slow meditation.

"I think I do right to seek out first the lady," he said, looking up at her with a somewhat troubled expression of face. "What I must not let her out of my sight until I placed her in Miss Barrington's care; and if I leave her here—"

"Ah, bah! Bless the man!" interposed Jeanette. "Do you think for one little instant that any evil-minded Englishman could overcome me? I will guard that sweet child with my life. He will have to kill first Robert and then me before he reaches that angel!" And she drew herself up with a gesture that satisfied even her brother.

"Ah well, then, from your and Robert's hands will I demand the little mademoiselle when I come back," said Pierre in manifest relief, sitting down to the breakfast that his sister had been laying for him all the time she talked.

"She is the bonniest little lady I ever set eyes on," said the innkeeper heartily.

"A perfect angel," returned his wife in her cheeriest tone.

Half an hour later Pierre started on his quest. Lyndhurst Road was easily found; so also was Rose Cottage. It was a pretty little house standing a short way off the road, with trailing creepers covering the red brick walls. The morning sun shone cheerfully on the beds of wallflowers and the trim-shaven lawn.

As Pierre rang the bell he contrasted the bright calmness of the day with the horrors of the night before.

The door was opened by an elderly woman servant. She looked inquiringly at the visitor.

"I have come to see Miss Barrington on urgent business. Will you ask her if she will do me the favor of seeing me?"

But as the woman only stared at him without replying, Pierre added quietly—

"If you will tell her that a gentleman whom she will remember, named Monsieur Rexington Falconer, has sent me, she will not deny me a hearing."

"But—but—Miss Barrington is not here," exclaimed the women.

"Not here!" Pierre's heart sank for an instant, then rose with a bound. "Perhaps you will kindly tell me where she has gone?"

"She is dead."

"Dead!"

The Frenchman stared stupidly at her.

"She died six weeks ago. The house has been taken by two ladies—strangers to Miss Barrington; they came from London last week, and I came with them."

The shock for a minute deprived Pierre of all speech. He could only gaze strangely at the woman, whilst he asked himself what was to become now of the child entrusted to his care. What was he to do with her? Whom was he to place her with?

A sickening sense of fear took possession of him as the memory of the dying man's face came before him when uttering the words, "Roger Densham would try to do me an injury through my child, though I be dead a thousand times over." And with the remembrance came a feverish anxiety to return to the child, to protect her with his presence.

With a muttered word of thanks he turned from the door and hurried back to the inn, a terrible fear clutching his heart that in his absence the child might have been spirited away. The beads of perspiration stood thick on his brow as he burst into the kitchen.

"La petite enfant! Where is she?" he gasped.

"Still sleeping, the angel," replied Jeannette in calm tones, polishing the copper kettle till it shone like gold.

Sunday School Lesson

By Herbert L. Willett

The Home of Diana*

Ephesus was the most conspicuous city in western Asia. It was situated not far from the Aegean Sea, on its eastern coast, and was the center around which there were grouped many cities of importance in the proconsular province of Asia at the western end of Asia Minor. It is not improbable that at one time Ephesus was a sea-port, although even in the first century the sea had receded, leaving the city some distance from the coast. It was a highly complex life that Ephesus manifested. East and West contributed at once to it. Asia and Europe, the Semite and the Aryan jostled each other upon its streets.

It was the home of superstition and heathenism. Its patron goddess was Diana, the huntress of Greek mythology. Her temple rose as the commanding structure of this metropolis. It was the tradition that the first builder of the temple of Artimis or Diana had stood upon the summit of the structure and shot an arrow with his full strength. The line marked by the arrow's flight became the radius of a circle which he designated as an asylum for offenders of every class. Any man accused of crime could find safety within the wide circumference of which the temple was the center. The city, therefore, became at an early day the refuge of criminals and the vicious of all classes. And though that first condition had passed away in the days when Alexander the Great built the second temple to Diana, the city still preserved its mixed and feverish character.

The Arrival of Paul.

The goddess herself was worshipped in the form of an image kept in the sacred shrine of the great temple. This image was believed to have fallen from heaven at the time the first temple was built. Craftsmen in the city made a profitable business of fasbioning small images of the goddess or likenesses of the temple itself, and these were sold to the faithful who came at the festival times in great numbers to the city.

It was to this heathen center, as eager and restless as Corinth and far more complex in its life, that Paul came with his two friends, Aquila and Priscilla, on his way to Jerusalem at the close of his second missionary journey. He tarried only a brief time in Ephesus and then went on to Jerusalem, leaving his friends to take up their residence in Ephesus. But after he had paid his respects to the leaders of the mother church and had gone to Antioch to report the progress of his labors, he hastened back through the regions of Galatia and Phrygia and soon afterward arrived at Ephesus again.

Apollos of Alexandria.

In the meantime two interesting events had happened which are narrated in this lesson. One was the conversion of Apollos and the other the baptism of the uninstructed Jewish disciples in Ephesus. Apollos was a young Alexandrian, a Jew of the disperson or non-Palestinian type, who had come to Ephesus soon after Paul's departure for the East. Apollos soon made the acquaintance of Paul's friends, Aquila and Priscilla. He had learned some simple facts regarding the Christian doctrine, but was evidently unfamiliar with its larger meaning and was, in fact, in the condition of one who accepted John rather than Jesus as the Messiah. He had received the baptism that was preached in John's name. But the zealous husband and wife took him into their home and gave him the larger view of the gospel, which marked the teaching and baptism of John as only the preliminary step to the world-wide mission of Jesus.

Aquila, Priscilla and Paul had only recently come from Corinth. The two disciples in Ephesus knew the needs of the little church back in the Greek city. So when they deemed Apollos sufficiently prepared, they sent him over to be the teacher of that group, furnishing him letters of introduction to their friends in Corinth. The work of Apollos in the Greek city must have been highly successful, but the young man soon became aware that there was forming round him a faction in the church which used his name as a rallying cry to combat the friends of Paul and still other groups in the chuch. The factional differences of that company of Christians are described and reproved in Paul's first Epistle to the Corinthians. When Apollos discovered this tendency in the church he refused to lend himself to any such devisive tactics and left, probably returning to Ephesus. When Paul wrote the First Epistle to the Corinthians the church had requested the return of Apollos, but Paul informed them that the young man was unable to come at that time. Probably the apostle concurred in the judgment of Apollos that it was unwise to permit any growth of the sectarian spirit in that volatile community.

The Twelve Disciples.

The second incident happened soon after Paul's return to Ephesus from Antioch. In his teaching he came into contact with a group of Jewish disciples, some twelve in number whom he asked concerning their reception of the Spirit. By this question Paul wished to make sure that they understood the real character of Christianity as a spiritual and not a ceremonial religion like Judaism. He asked them if they had received the Holy Spirit when they believed; that is, were they possessed of the spirit and purpose of Jesus in their daily life? The answer to such a question would at once show whether they comprehended the meaning of Christianity or were only attached to its outward forms. They responded that they had not even heard that the Holy Spirit was given, and showed that they were still lingering in that twilight of Christian teaching in which Apollos had stood when Aquila and Priscilla took up his education. This led Paul to give to these Ephesian disciples further instructions regarding the life and purpose of Jesus and the necessity of possessing his spirit in order that they might realize the blessings of the new faith. To make emphatic the new teaching Paul laid his hands upon them and through them the work of teaching, tongues and healing manifested itself as through other members of the Christian community. These external gifts, like speaking with tongues and healing the sick, were not the essential proofs of the Spirit's presence in their lives, but they were useful in that age when faith was likely to rest in no small degree upon the visible manifestations of the Christian life in acts of power. Paul had occasion more than once to rebuke the early Christians for putting so much emphasis upon tongues, gifts of healing and the like. (I. Cor. 12-14.) It was only love, he said, which proved the reality of Christian life.

Paul in Ephesus.

This must have been a period of intense activity on Paul's part. He went into the Jewish synagogue and for a period of three months used every opportunity of reaching the men of his own race. Later, when opposition developed, he hired a debating hall owned by a man named Tyrannus, and there for at least a portion of each day he continued for two years in the work of public instruction. In this way his influence was spread not only through the city but in the adjacent regions, and probably those churches which are included in the list of "the seven churches of Asia," addressed in the early chapters of the Apocalypse, were planted at this time; not so much by his personal evangelism, as by the influences that went out from his work in Ephesus.

Especially against the superstitious practices of the city did he direct his efforts. It was a place given over to the teaching of sorcery and necromancy. Paul registered a strong protest against this false belief, and in actual conflict with the leaders of such unholy practices he championed the cause of the gospel. This work finally resulted in the destruction by the people of many of their books and instruments of divination, and a kind of "pyramid of vanities," like that which Savanarola burned in the public square of Florence, testified to the thorough nature of the reformation. In this manner Paul's work in Ephesus during more than two years was prosperous.

The Two Gifts

There is the gift of a beautiful face,
And there is the gift of a heart of grace.
Which would you have—now tell me true!
Which of these gifts, were it left to you?

The beautiful face will fade some day,
But the heart of grace will last for aye;
So, better a gift of endless worth
Than the dearest treasure in all the earth.

All cannot have a beautiful face,
But each may possess a heart of grace;
This wonderful, priceless gift is free
To king and to beggar, to you and to me.

So he whose face will never be fair
Needs not to give one sigh of despair,
For he may, if he choose, have a heart of grace,
Which is worth far more than the lovliest face.

Prayer Meeting

FULL-ORBED CHARACTER.

Topic, Aug. 11. 2 Cor. 8:1-9; Phil. 4:8, 9; Luke 18:18-25; Matt. 5:43-48.

Life would be fuller of meaning and power if we could only remember at all times that the only serious limitations are those of character. The restrictions imposed by the external world have their significance for character and as such we must reckon with them. The advantages possessed by others in the way of wealth and culture do not take from us the privilege of having the right attitude toward God and our neighbor. We may accept every limitation of external condition as an invitation to go deeper into life and to get a firmer hold on the things that abide.

The Open Hand.

The stingy man is either exceptionally ignorant or exceptionally mean. He is more often densely ignorant of his debt to society. In his stupidity he imagines that he has produced the wealth he controls. He does not know that centuries of toil were required for the production of the simplest tool he uses. He does not know that the sentiments that are at the basis of the laws of property and that insure to him the right to control what he calls his own have been produced by the travail of humanity. Or the stingy man may be intelligent but mean. He is indifferent to the common good. He avoids paying school taxes if he can, because he has no children. If he has children, he uses them as he does his horse. His patriotism ends where his selfish schemes end. His religion, and he may think he is religious, is about the sorriest sentiment that ever resided in the heart of man. He bargains with God as he does with the horse trader. Over against the stingy man is set the Christian. He is aware of his debt to others and it is his delight to pay his debt. His hand is open for every kind of service. He takes the initiative in good works. When he is invited to help and is not able, he does not resent the invitation, but regrets his inability to do more.

The Open Mind.

It has been said that it is easy to be open-minded without convictions, and to have convictions without open-mindedness, but that it is extremely difficult to be an open-minded man with convictions. In Phil. 4:8, Paul tells how the two may be united. A man has to think upon the great themes in order that he may grasp a truth firmly enough to let it grow in his mind without getting away from him. The excitement connected with the announcement of a new aspect of truth is evidence that men have not thought long and seriously upon the truth committed to them. Things that are true, just, pure, and lovely do not remain unchanged in the mind of him who reflects upon them. They grow more beautiful and their truth is seen to be manifold. If they do not grow as we contemplate them, they cease to interest us. Monotony kills interest. But the fault is with us if they remain monotonously the same. On the other hand, uncertainty kills character. We may be willing to leave many things in doubt, but we need to feel the power of some truth if we are to develop moral vigor. But the certainty is gained by grappling with real problems and thinking through them. Borrowed convictions lack in force. So, then, it is the open mind that acquires unshaken confidence.

The Standard of Character.

Great moral heroes are a mystery to the majority because so much of our morality is shrewd bargaining. It is like the peace of nations that is preserved by lying diplomacy and the sword. Each nation profits by the misfortune of the others if it can. In like manner our morality is prudent selfishness. We look always to the consequences for ourselves and are more than willing to make others pay the cost of our enjoyment. Christian morality is another thing. Its standard is in God. The young man who came to Jesus to ask what he should do to inherit eternal life learned that God's service demanded the elimination of every trace of selfishness. He was not allowed to keep his vast wealth when it was selfish to keep it. To those who were indignant at wrongdoers Jesus spoke of God's loving care for the evil and the good. The spirit of revenge is absent from the full-orbed life. It overcomes evil with good. It believes in schools and homes and churches more than in jails and penitentiaries. It sends the missionary, not the warship, to the savage peoples.

Christian Endeavor Lesson

By W. D. Endres

TOPIC AUGUST 15.

Pilgrim's Progress Series: VIII. Two Valleys. Ps. 22:1-8; Mic. 7:7, 8; Rom. 8:35-39.

It is a splendid thing for young Christians to study the experiences of Christian in the Valley of Humiliation and in the Valley of the Shadow of Death. It sets forth a true Christian experience which every Disciple must learn early in his religious life if he is to be effective, viz., to be religious, one must be able to struggle and endure. The Christian life is both beautiful and heroic. Mark this well. Too many there are like Pliable, who decide quickly and easily to be Christians because of the joys and blessings it offers but who fail to see that while these are within the reach of all they are likewise "pearls of great price."

Christian's descent from the Palace Beautiful where he enjoyed to the full the worship and the companionship of the saints, into the Valley of Humiliation where he must withstand the attacks of Apollyon, shows us the wide range of his experience. But it is not untrue to life. Many are the young men and women who have come out of a long series of protracted meetings, in which they took the name of Christ, and during which they were carried into the mountain top where they tasted the rare joys of forgiveness and the fellowship of Christian saints, only to rush out into the world, where they are made the objects of prolonged and severe attack.

The great ideal of the Christian is righteousness. The indispensable condition to its realization is humility. Jesus wants us to learn of him because "he is meek and lowly of heart." Our true purpose, then, may be, it often is, by way of self-obliteration. But many a man has stepped aside here, as he was making this descent for personal distinction and honor and has been lost forever to his righteous ideal and to God. He who would succeed here must carry in his soul the elements of discretion, piety, charity, and prudence.

But he who succeeds in this valley is no weakling. His struggle is moral but real. Is not every great struggle, worthy of commemoration, so? Was not that a moral contention which resisted taxation without representation; or that which freed four million black slaves; or that which broke the tyrranous grip of an old world nation from an island people?

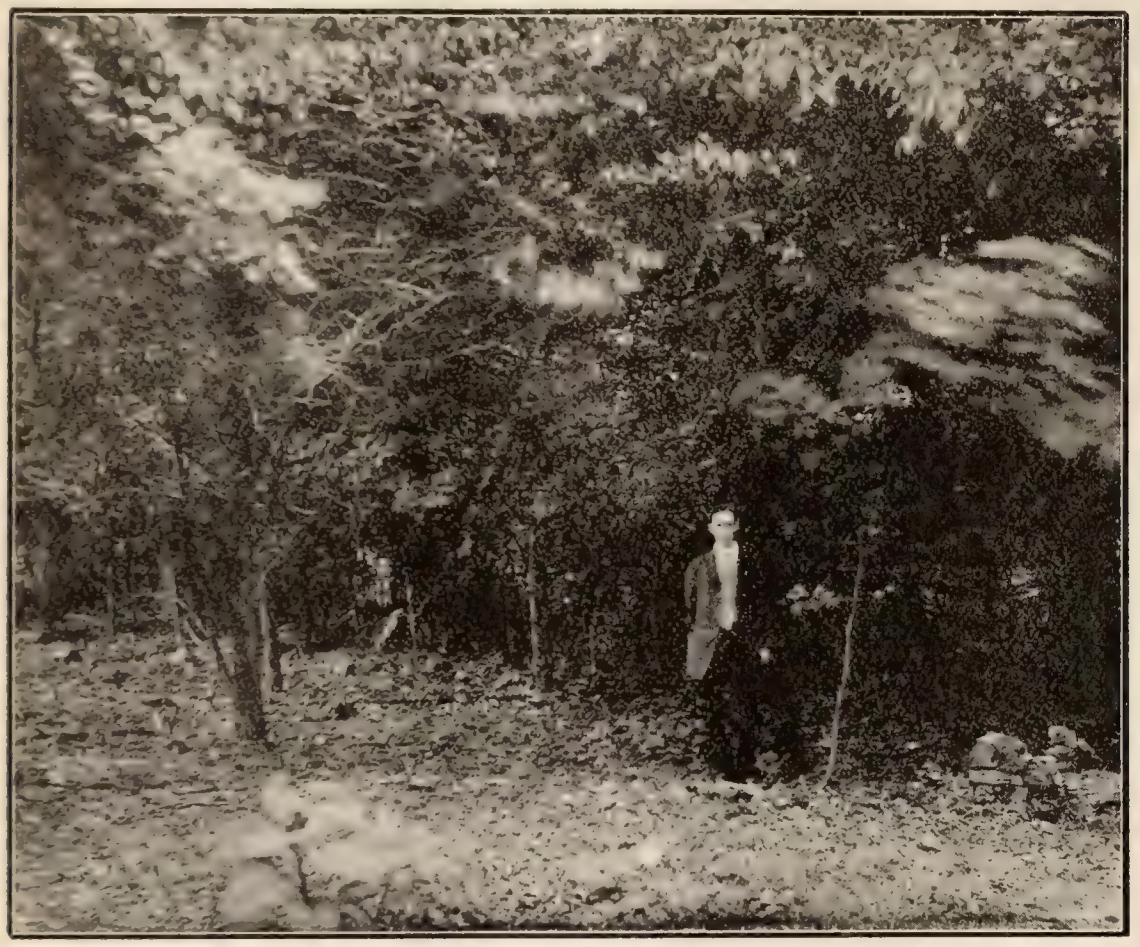
As the nature of this new life begins to differentiate itself in the mind its responsibilities in the nature of trial and struggle become more apparent. They loom large in his mind. Shall he turn back? The welcome of old associates awaits him; familiar scenes are ready to greet him; and former habits offer him their old time joy. His present ideal offers him little hope of immediate relief. His former companions love to dwell on his mistakes of which he is keenly aware. That he will make still others and give to them other occasions to scoff at him and scorn this new mode of life, is morally certain. But, when he recalls the fact that he abandoned the old life because its burdens were too heavy to be borne; that others before him have struggled in like manner and come off "more than conquerors;" and that the Lord is faithful to help and gracious to forgive, he is able to "reach out his hand" and give a "deadly thrust" to the temptation which besets him.

But all our struggles do not arise on account of attacks from without. All have experiences of mental confusion, darkness and doubt. The young Christian who grows introspective, with the impatience of youth, often moves rashly, makes serious mistakes, and as a result, incurs grave problems. In these moments the non-religious people try his soul. They never tire of pointing to Christian failure. His toil, his disappointments, his struggles, and his anxieties, are constantly on their lips. In contrast they point to themselves and others who are well to do, who go in good society, and enjoy life generally. What then is the good of being so concerned about the will of God?

Moreover they point to scores who have continued for a considerable time in the Christian life, but who have finally given up the struggle. They are living examples of the foolishness of it all. "What more hope is there for you," they say. "Just as well give up the fight." It is an easy step from that to say that a God of justice, kindness, and love, will not work such a hardship upon his children. Many a Christian's faith has suffered shipwreck here.

But if he will ponder deeply, the experiences of those about him, as well as himself, he will see that by no means can the irreligious lay exclusive claim to comfort, joy and peace. Indeed he will see that their suffering is widespread and intense. He will also recall that great throng who have waged a successful fight and closed their lives in triumphant joy. Once more as he surveys the nations of earth, he discovers that those nations whose people have anchored their faith in God are leading the world's civilization. He is convinced that God's children suffer not because of his neglect or injustice, but because of the selfishness and injustice of those with whom they must live on the earth. From his gloom he emerges with a conquering faith and in the words of Paul declares: "I am persuaded, that neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor things present, nor things to come, nor powers, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature, shall be able to separate us from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus, our Lord."

SAFEGUARDED.



We think to be defeated,
By Satan and his band.
But let me tell you one thing:
"Our God is right on hand!"

Chicago—Pittsburg

The Secretary Stands Where the Campbells Were Baptized

The drive from West Middletown to the site of the old Brush Run church takes one through a country of steep hills which are much wooded. In the days of the fathers this country was solidly wooded except for the small clearings that had been made in it by the settlers. It is not thickly settled today and must have been even more sparsely settled in those days, for the character of the country is not such as to support a dense population.

Were one to have inquired a year ago in this neighborhood for the site of the old Brush Run church, he would have found few who could have answered him. It is almost a forgotten place and only the companies of Disciples who have gone through recently have aroused any measure of interest in the place. The spot is identified by the Farrar school house which is about three miles from West Middletown. It is an ordinary country school-house of rather modern construction and has no interest save as a landmark of the more interesting spot we were seeking.

Site of Brush Run Church; C. A. MacDonald, McKees Rocks, Standing at Lines of Foundation

We left the carriage at the Farrar school house and walked half a mile back of the school house into the timber on one side of the deep valley called Brush Run. There had once been a road that ran directly to the church, but the topography of the country has changed and the site of the church is now far removed from the ordinary lines of travel.

Site of Brush Run Church.

On the hill to one side of the deep valley of Brush Run, we found the old stone foundation of the church. The place is so abandoned that there is now a number of young saplings growing within the enclosure made by the stones. What was once clearing around the building, has grown up thickly with brush and so dense is it that we experienced considerable difficulty in getting the picture which we present of the lines of the foundation.

We stepped the lines of the building as they are marked by the stones just protruding above the ground. The old church was 30x36 feet in dimensions. One can easily calculate from this that it did not hold over a hundred people. Probably this was as large a building as so sparsely a settled country would demand, though many of them attended here from a considerable distance. The stones are ordinary limestone hewn out with no very great deal of precision and laid in their place without any plaster or cement so far as we could discover.

The story of the building of this church is an interesting one. The Campbells were at this time residing at Washington, but many members of the Christian Association resided in the vicinity of Buffalo Creek. It was decided to build a meeting house in this community where they had so often used dwelling houses as the place of meeting. They selected a site on the farm of William Gilchrist on one side of the valley of Brush Run, two miles from its junction with Buffalo Creek. There was a saw mill on an adjoining farm.

First Meeting in the Church.

The first meeting held on the site was on a temporary stand where Alexander Campbell was invited to deliver the first discourse. He chose as his text the words found in Job 8:7, "Though thy beginning was small, thy latter end shall greatly increase." This discourse was delivered September 16, 1810. The sermon was often referred to in subsequent years as being prophetic of the rapid spread of the movement.

On May 4, the following spring, the Christian Association met in its semi-annual meeting at Brush Run. Thomas Campbell had this spring moved on to a farm in this vicinity. At this meeting the group was organized as a church and Alexander Campbell was licensed to preach. On the following Sunday they observed the Lord's supper. Alexander Campbell preached from the text, "I am the bread of life."

On June 2, 1811, the first meeting was held in the new meeting house of Brush Run, which though unfinished was used from this time on, rough seats being provided for the assembly. The building was of frame construction. The church at this time could count up only about thirty members; as many had separated themselves from the movement at the change of opinions manifested by the Campbells on Christian baptism and on some other questions.

Thus the old Brush Run church was the scene of the labors of the Campbells at a formative period when they were working out the principles of their movement. No other spot can have the historical significance for the Disciples that does this lonely church yard in the hills of western Pennsylvania.

After gathering some small fragments of stone from the foundation and cutting some canes from the young saplings of the church yard, we drove on full of memories of the past that had been awakened by this visit.

Site of Campbell's Baptism.

Fortunately a previous party had taken a person to the spot of Campbell's baptism, who had accurate knowledge of the place through long residence in the community. We followed their route. The site is on a side road at a place where the Buffalo Creek is deflected at right angles by coming against the side of the bluff on which the road runs. At this right angle turn there used to be a deep pool. We did not investigate the depth here at the time of our visit, but there would unquestionably be enough water there now to furnish a place for baptism, though at other places the creek did not seem to be over a foot in depth.

The first baptism performed here was performed by Thomas Campbell before he was himself baptized. In his day an old tree stood at the turn of the stream with its roots projecting into the stream. Thomas Campbell sat upon these roots and baptized the candidates without himself getting wet. Later more seemly methods of baptizing were adopted.

Applying a Principle.

The immediate occasion of the baptism of the Campbells was the birth of Alexander's first child. The wife's parents were Presbyterians and there was the practical question, should the child be christened. The group had taken as their motto "Where the scriptures speak, we speak; where the scriptures are silent, we are silent." They had been warned that this principle would exclude infant baptism and now they searched the scriptures for authority for the baptism of the child. They found none and in their investigations, Alexander became convinced that he had not been baptized scripturally. With him conviction involved action. He announced his decision to his father, expecting to encounter opposition, but found that his father and mother and sister were also determined to be baptized.

Matthias Luce and a few other Baptist preachers were present but no "experience" was given and the ordinary customs of the Baptist church were set aside, the Campbells being baptized upon a profession of faith in Jesus Christ. The date of this baptism was June 12, 1812.

The meeting that day occupied seven hours. Both Thomas and Alexander Campbell preached on their change of views and defended their decision. James Hanen and wife were so impressed with the argument that they too were baptized with the Campbells, making in all seven persons. Before long all of the members of the Brush Run either accepted immersion or left it, not because of exercise of authority, but through natural choice.

We cannot but honor these brave men who acted through a sense of fulfilling the Divine will. Perhaps this acceptance of immersion did not have the significance in their minds that it does in ours. Certainly they never made the subject one of such continual preaching as have many of their disciples. But they were men of conscience and their bold public act of renunciation of the old-time baptism is in striking contrast with that of an enemy of the Christian Association who fought the Campbells for a long time and then became convinced they were right. Rather than publicly admit his error, he baptized himself in the Buffalo while all alone but was not able to keep the secret afterwards.

It was night-fall when we left the scene of the baptism and we drove in the darkness of a summer evening the eight miles to Bethany. The "lightning" bugs filled the air and the stars showed dimly. We passed the hazy outlines of a country which must be surpassingly beautiful in the day-time and arrived full of fatigue but with the impressions of a rich day's experience filling our souls.

People of Importance

—Leon Bourgeois has been appointed to succeed Clemenceau as Premier of France. He has served his country in various capacities since 1877, when he became Secretary of the Department of Marine. He was President of the Chamber of Deputies in 1902-3. He is recognized as chief of the Radical party.

—The oldest man in the United States Senate is Isaac Stephenson of Wisconsin, who got there by rather uncertain methods a while back. He is 80 years old and his term expires March 3, 1915.

—Sir Robert Hart, who has spent a year's leave of absence in England, the first vacation he has taken in more than twenty years, has practically decided to retire from the position of director general of Chinese customs on account of ill health.

—Senator Aldrich has accepted the invitation of the Commercial Club of Chicago to address that body at its annual meeting in November. The address will be on financial reforms. Senator Aldrich by November will have made his visit to Europe and have gathered up all the data necessary for a long talk on that subject.

—Prince Bulow, former chancellor of the German empire, left office after having been the longest lived of German chancellors after the first and greatest, Bismarck. For his services in connection with the Spanish agreement about the Caroline and other Pacific islands, he was made a count; while in 1905, on the occasion of the crown prince's wedding, the kaiser raised him to the rank of prince, or, rather, "furst," which is akin to that of the British marquis and only inferior to that of duke.

—J. Pierpont Morgan has returned to this country after four months spent in Europe, looking much thinner and less ruddy than formerly. He brought back with him $30,000 in art objects.

—Sir Edward Morris, the new Premier of Newfoundland, is fifty years of age and has spent half of that time in public life. He is an example of the class of men which by sheer merit is going to the front in so many of the British colonies as well as in the United States. He taught school to earn the means to take a course at Ottawa university, and then entered the legal profession, where he soon acquired the reputation of being an able criminal lawyer.

—Ahmed Mirza, the newly proclaimed Shah of Persia, is the second son of Mohammed Ali. He has precedence over the eldest son of the dethroned shah because the mother of that eldest son was not a princess of the reigning Kajar house. There are three brothers and several sisters. Among the new titles which the new shah will assume as ruler of Persia are Shah-in-Shah, meaning king of kings; Zil Allah, Shadow of God; Kibleh Alum, Centre of the World, the Exalted One, Exalted as the Planet Saturn, the Well of Knowledge, the King Whose Standard is the Sun and Whose Splendor is That of the Firmament.

—Embassador Thompson, United States representative in Mexico, was robbed of $13,000 while absent from his post by a trusted employe, according to a letter received at Janesville, Wis., from Mr. Thompson.

—Now that Mayor Hibbard has declared himself a candidate for re-election, the Boston democrats display a disposition to nominate Joseph H. O'Neil, president of the Federal trust company, and a former member of Congress and United States treasurer in Boston.

Woman's Sphere

—Mrs. Kate Douglas Wiggin, assisted by Miss Charlotte Thompson, has written a play. It is called "Rebecca of Sunnybrook Farm." It will be produced this fall.

—Miss Helen Gould was forty-one years old lately and has already done more good with her money than the average millionaire of twice her age, says a writer. Miss Gould is sweet and sane in all her work for the good of mankind in which she gives not only of her money but of her mind, that humanity may not be uplifted but may have opportunity to uplift itself.

—Mrs. Julia Ward Howe, with her daughter, Mrs. Maud Howe Elliott, is at her home, Oak Glen, near Newport, R. I. She still continues her historic and philosophic studies.

—Mrs. J. Addison Hayes, fifty-four years old, daughter of the late Jefferson Davis, president of the confederacy, died July 18, at her home in Colorado Springs, after an illness of six month. Her husband was president of the First National Bank there.

—Mrs. Elizabeth Taylor Dandridge, who has just died at Winchester, Va., was once mistress of the White House. A few weeks after the election of her father, Zachary Taylor, to the presidency Elizabeth Taylor married an army officer, Captain Bliss, nicknamed for his attainments and popularity "Perfect Bliss." For one year, and until General Taylor's death she presided over the executive mansion in a manner that has linked her popularity and her graciousness with the fame of Dolly Madison.

—Rose Nouchette Carey, the novelist, died last week in England. She began as a novelist in 1868. Her works included "Robert Ord's Atonement," "Not Like Other Girls," "Other People's Lives," and the "Highway of Fate."

—Mrs. Margaret E. Langdale of Cambridge, Mass., has just given the Phillips Exeter academy $50,000 to found a scholarship to be known as the Charles E. Langdale scholarship. Mrs. Langdale's husband, the late Prof. Charles E. Langdale, was for many years the dean of the law faculty of Harvard, and this scholarship is to commemorate his work.

—The women of Colorado have begun a campaign to elect Mrs. Sarah Platt Decker to congress two years hence. "Of course, it is difficult to tell whether we will be successful in our efforts or not," said Mrs. Harriet Wright, former member of the state legislature. "But we are looking forward to landing a woman in the halls of congress, and we certainly are going to make a determined trial."

—Accompanied by her mother and Mr. and Mrs. John Macey, Helen Keller, the blind girl will pass the summer in their new home, Linden Grove farm, near Brunswick, Me. While there she will write a book on nature study.

—A woman contributor to The American Magazine says the following about Mr. Rockefeller: "Conduct your business as you wish, Mr. Rockefeller, for, after all, we rather admire sharp practice when it makes good. Put your helpless competitors out of the game, drive them to failure, despair and suicide, buy up the Upper House, create a Third House. But don't on top of that, don't we beg of you, have the face to preach the Golden Rule. Really, Mr. Rockefeller, when it comes to this Sunday-school proposition, you're nothing but a joke. Beat it!"

Church Life

O. L. Summer has resigned at Elk City, Kansas.

A fine new church is to be built at Marion, Ind.

T. S. Tinsley becomes pastor of the Third Church, Louisville, Ky.

Will your church send its preacher to the great Centennial Convention?

A Sunday-school building is being erected by the church at Cuba, Ill.

During the last twelve months there have been 100 accessions to the church at Okmulgee, Okla., where B. F. Hill is the pastor.

The church at Winsboro, Texas, have called to their pastorate, M. M. Smith, and are erecting a parsonage for his use.

W. M. Groves is supplying the pulpit at Jacksonville, Ill., while the pastor, R. F. Thrapp, is on his trip to Palestine.

Claire L. Waite, pastor of the First Church, Milwaukee, speaks with enthusiasm of the work of the new Second Church of that city.

Large audiences are in daily attendance at the union revival meeting in Cameron, Mo. Chas. E. McVay is leading the singing.

During the summer months the churches at Alva, Okla., are holding union Sunday evening services.

The hospital at Chuchow, China, has had during the past year, 7,400 patients with 390 in-patients, an increase of three-fold over former years.

Miss Jennie Jenkinson, Bellefontaine, Ohio, succeeds Miss Ellen Smith as pastoral helper in the church at Columbia, Mo., where M. A. Hart is the pastor.

E. E. Elliott, Peoria, Illinois, is removing to Kansas City, to become one of the secretaries of the National Brotherhood movement.

The church at Athens, Illinois, led by their minister, J. M. Francis, will hold a revival in September. Charles E. McVay will be the song leader.

Henry B. Robinson, pastor at El Paso, Texas, is preaching a series of sermons on "The Kingdom of God and the Program of Jesus, for Civic, Commercial, and Social Life."

The public press of Washington, D. C., made large use of Dr. F. D. Powers' admirable paper on "War against War" presented before the Christian Endeavor Convention recently held at St. Paul.

C. Manly Morton has just been elected corresponding secretary of the North Carolina Christian Missionary Society, succeeding J. R. Rountree. The Christian Century wishes the new secretary the best of success.

Illinois state convention at Eureka, August 30-September 1. J. Fred Jones, corresponding secretary, urges that those who desire lodging and breakfast at the hands of the church, write David H. Shields, pastor at Eureka.

A fine program was held by the church at Shenandoah, Ia., July 30, on the occasion of the graduation of the teacher training class. The address was by Edgar Price, Council Bluffs.

T. J. Golightly preached the baccalaureate sermon July 25, to the classes graduating from the Western Normal College at Shenandoah, Iowa. The services in all other churches were dismissed for this meeting.

The Illinois State Secretary, J. Fred Jones, has arranged the Illinois Headquarters at Pittsburgh to be at the Fort Pitt Hotel; European, $1.00 and upward. The society will have a special train from Bloomington.

A telegram from L. L. Carpenter says: "Bethany assembly crowd equal to last year. Two thousand people heard concert, Sunday. C. W. B. M. and Bible school conference this week."

Arthur Holmes, Philadelphia, recently supplied the pulpit of the Sterling Place Church, Brooklyn, speaking on "A Man's Work in the Church." Thomas H. Bates was the preacher in this church July 18.

O. W. Winter, pastor of the church at Belding, Mich., supplied the pulpit of the Fifth Ave. Church, Grand Rapids, July 11. Homer Sala, Wellsville, Ohio, has been called to the pastorate of the Fifth Ave. Church.

Much space was given in local papers to an address by W. E. Crabtree, First Church, San Diego, Cal., on "John Calvin, Benefactor." The address was delivered on the 400th anniversary of the birth of "The Great Genevan."

A Pittsburg club has been organized among the Disciples of Des Moines. It is composed of those who plan to attend the Centennial. A campaign will be conducted in an effort to secure sufficient number of passengers to get a special train from Des Moines.

It is announced that W. M. Taylor has resigned the pastorate of the Soniat Ave. Church, New Orleans, La., thus closing a pastorate of three years. Mr. Taylor is well remembered as one of the genial hosts of the convention last year.

By recommendation of the Ohio Convention, Ohio Fellowship Day will be observed the first Sunday in October. On this day the pastors of the state will exchange pulpits, having one sermon in each church on State Missions.

The church at North Yakima, Washington, has granted its pastor, Morton L. Rose, a two months' vacation, which he and his family are spending at Magnolia Beach, Washington. During the pastor's absence the pulpit is being supplied by Allen Hickey, L. D. Green, Frank A. Luse and Mrs. Cora Green.

Professor W. D. MacClintock, who has been spending the early part of the summer at Boulder, Colorado, in lecture work in connection with the State University, has returned to Chicago to resume his teaching at the University of Chicago during the second term of the summer quarter.

James R. McIntyre and wife of Grand Island, Nebraska, are spending a few weeks on the Pacific Coast; their address being at 518 Maple avenue, Los Angeles, Cal. For three years Mr. McIntyre has been pastor of the church at Grand Island. During this time there have been 226 additions to the church.

Levi G. Batman, who has for six years been pastor of the First Church Philadelphia, has received and accepted a call to the First Church, Youngstown, Ohio, where he succeeds J. R. Ewers, recently called to East End, Pittsburg. Mr. Batman has done excellent work in Pittsburg and is just the man to continue the fine work Mr. Ewers has been doing in Youngstown.

A $6,000 church building was dedicated at Joliet, Montana, July 18, by Edward E. Cowperthwaite, pastor at Billings, Mont. State Secretary T. S. Raum was present, and with the assistance of his singer, Prof. Saxton, began a meeting with the church the same day. The pastor, O. G. Shanklin, and his wife are doing an excellent work with the vigorous young church.

The First Church, Lincoln, Nebraska, has inaugurated the single Sunday morning service beginning at 10:30 and closing at 12:15. It consists of Bible study, preaching and Communion. They have tried the plan but two Sundays, but are delighted with the results. The attendance for both divisions has increased; reverence and devotion characterize the entire service.

Rev. L. G. Batman, of the First Christian Church of Philadelphia, has resigned that pastorate. He will conclude his work September 1. He has spent a number of very fruitful years in that fine, old church, which has more than seventy-five years of history. His departure will be regretted by his people, who have learned to love him for his work's sake. He will also be missed in the associated Christian work of Philadelphia.

The attendance of students at the University of Chicago during the present summer quarter is considerably larger than in any previous year. This is, in a measure, due to the presence of such eminent teachers as President Mullins, of Louisville, President of the Baptist Theological Seminary, and Professor George Adam Smith, of Glasgow, in addition to the regular staff. Other departments of the university as well as the Divinity School show a marked increase in attendance.

The Second Church, Milwaukee, holds the palm for church building. A church built in three days is their record. Two carpenters began on Thursday and, with the assistance of eighteen other men on Saturday, they finished the work so that services were held in the tabernacle the following Sunday. The church is located on the East side, which is now recognized as the best residence part of the city. Professor Sherman Kirk, who is preaching for the church during the summer, hopes to see a good man located as pastor of the church by autumn. If this can be done, the church will be in a position to erect a fine building within another year.

A. W. Conner, of Lafayette, Ind., has just closed a week's work at Brownsburg, Indiana, in a "campaign for boys." It was a "gala week" with the boys and their friends. The hours spent with Mr. Conner will be long remembered by the people of the community. Forty-one boys were knighted as "Princely Knights of Character Castle" upon showing their proof of loyalty by passing through the "dungeon." A banquet was served by the ladies of the different churches, which was an enjoyable affair for the Princely Knights and their Chosen Friends. The last lesson was given in the presentation of a short drama entitled "The Unseen Friend."

The Japan Harbinger for May contains an interesting account of the marriage at Tokyo, of Mr. Frank Naotaro Otsuka to Miss Ai Ito, which was celebrated on April 3, in the Koishikawa Church of Christ. The service was conducted by Rev. A. W. Place, of the Christian College, and the occasion was one of interest to the community of Disciples. Mr. Otsuka, who is a graduate of Bethany College and of the University of Chicago, will hereafter be occupied with teaching work at the Bible College. Mrs. Otsuka is spoken of as a young woman of Christian training and culture and likely to be a constant source of inspiration in her husband's work. She is a graduate of an arts school in Tokyo and for some time previous to her marriage attended the Methodist Girls' School in Hakodati.

Note—We are sorry that in the "make up" last week the order of the paragraphs by A. W. Taylor was broken up, thus confusing their meaning.—Editors.

The Indiana State Convention

By Austin Hunter.

The convention of the Indiana Christian Missionary Sosiety was held at Bethany Park July 27-30. The attendance was the best for several years. W. E. M. Hackelman, who has attended several state conventions this spring, stated of the opening session that there were more preachers present than of any state convention he attended with but one exception.

The addresses were of unusual merit. S. D. Dutcher, who has recently come to Terre Haute, spoke upon "State Missions the Basis of Our Missionary Enterprise," and sounded the key note of the convention. W. J. Wright thrilled us with a fine address upon "The Centennial." The convention requested the publication of this address in our leading papers.

E. F. Daugherty, of Wabash, spoke upon "The State of the Cause," in which he sounded out the need of county organization and the elimination of the district as the most effective plan of operation. One afternoon was devoted to a series of short addressed by the District secretaries, touching the practical phases of the work. This conference was one of the most fruitful of the convention.

The report of the corresponding secretary, J. O. Rose, showed an increase over previous years of funds for Indiana missions, though a decrease in the amounts given by churches. The fact that about two thousand dollars, given to this work by the churches as such, has called forth more than five thousand dollars additional, indicates something of the larger possibilities of the work and the fruitfulness of the Indiana field. Through the generosity of Marshall T. Reeves, of Columbus, Wm. Chappell has been supported full time as an additional evangelist, and has done most excellent work. The report of State Evangelist T. J. Legg, as always, was satisfactory in every way. In addition to these regular evangelists the twelfth district in the southern part of the state supports their own evangelist, Melnott Miller, who succeeded in greatly strengthening the work in that district. Also excellent reports were presented from the Lake District in the extreme northwest, where Cecil Sharp and others are leading the work. It was felt that, while Indiana is somewhat behind her sister states in the amount of actual cash raised by the state society, she is second to none in the amount of real missionary work done throughout the state. Many new fields have been entered, many struggling churches have been strengthened and many have been added to the churches through our state evangelists.

The Indiana work suffers by reason of a lack of concentrated interest. Other states have one great convention where the brethren have but practically one opportunity to come together during the year, and so they all quite as much as interest in the work that draws them. But the assembly in Indiana affords ample opportunity for the brethren to meet each other and so those who attend the state convention come because of that interest in the state work. It is felt by many that a better convention would be secured were it held during the spring of the year at some church. It may be that the board of directors will effect this arrangement for the coming year.

The officers selected for the coming year are L. E. Brown, of Lebanon, for president, C. H. Winders, Indianapolis, for vice president, E. E. Moorman, Indianapolis, for recording secretary, and W. D. Moffett, Indianapolis, for treasurer. The new members on the Board of Directors are J. M. Vawter, of Sullivan, and E. F. Daugherty, of Wabash.

A committee was appointed looking to a legal consolidation of the State Missionary Society, the State Sunday-school Association, and the State Christian Endeavor Societies.

Disciples Divinity House

The total attendance in the Divinity School during the First Term of the Summer Quarter surpasses that of any previous summer term. The total registration reaches 227. There are thirty different denominations represented in this number: thirty-four states and eight foreign countries.

The religious bodies sending the largest numbers are as follows: the Baptists, 84; the Disciples, 21; the Methodist Episcopal, South, 18; the Jewish, 16; the Presbyterian, 15; and the Methodist Episcopal, 11.

The Disciples who are registered in the Divinity School are as follows: E. J. Arnot, J. K. Arnot, Prof. E. E. Boyer, W. W. Burks, H. F. Burns, Geo. F. Chandler, W. D. Endres, C. A. Exley, Richard W. Gentry, W. H. Hanna, Prof. F. L. Jewett, Prof. Silas Jones, W. W. Mower, C. A. Pearce, G. W. Sarvis, A. J. Saunders, A. W. Taylor, R. L. Handley, Mrs. C. S. Meriweather.

Besides these, there are as many more Disciples in other departments of the university, of whom Prof. O. B. Clark, Prof. Henry Lloyd, Prof. C. W. Winter, Mrs. E. W. Darst, Miss Mary E. Monahan, are a few.

Letters to the Editors

The New Christian Century Co.:—Your letter requesting me to send names or get subscribess for your paper received. We are readers of The Christian Standard, have been for twenty-five years; it is the best paper publi-hed. We believe in Moses, that Job lived, that Daniel lived, that Christ is divine, conceived by the Holy Spirit—born of a virgin; that he died on the cross, conquered death, gave the great commission, ascended to heaven, and is King of Kings. We are great friends of McGarvey. We like to read his articles. I preach the old Jerusalem Gospel, as revealed by the Holy Spirit and ever will as long as I live.—John A. Armstrong.

Solon, Ohio.

Editor Christian Century:—Your unique editorial in the last issue on "God's reputation," is worth the price of the paper. It will no doubt feed many a hungry heart. The Christian Century is making itself more and more an indispensable visitor to my desk. May God richly bless you in the work you are doing, in loosing the old chains that tied the soul to a dead past of tradition and setting it free to find its God. Yours for an increasing power of the Christian press.—T. J. Golightly, Shenandoah, Iowa.

Editor Christian Century:—May I take exception to one of the "facts" on which you base your criticism of revivalists? They do not confine their personal work to the hour of invitation following the sermon. On the contrary, Scoville and his helpers here in Danville carefully canvassed the city, doing more personal work than had been done by others in years. And the pastors who followed up this kind of work not only "held what they got," but frequently "got the rest of the family, too." One church lost very many, indeed, they "lost 'em all." That is, they lost the cards, with names and addresses. But they have saved half their new members in spite of themselves. Among the converts were several preachers, one of whom has had ninety-eight added to his churches.

Danville, Ill. E. E. Hartley.

[There has been no purpose in the series of articles on revivalism to question such facts as the ones set forth by Mr. Hartley. Our study has been pursued with the explicit statement reiterated that we are far from denying that our present day evangelism is productive of good results. For all this good we thank God. But the truth of our critique would not be offset if all the signers of cards joined the churches, and if all who joined the churches remained in them—an ideal condition which is far from realized in any revival but which we are willing to hypothecate in order to make the point of our argument more clear.—Editors.]

Ohio Headquarters

The Committee appointed at the recent Ohio State Convention, held at Elyria, for the purpose of arranging for Ohio Headquarters at some good hotel in Pittsburg during the coming Centennial Convention, have chosen the Colonial-Annex as such Headquarters. Cars going to the Convention Halls pass the hotel, it being a fifteen or twenty minute ride to the Halls.

Rates, European plan, are $1.00 a day and up. We recommend that those desiring to be accommodated at Ohio Headquarters engage their rooms as soon as possible. The number of rooms, especially at the lower rate, are limited. Many delegates have already engaged rooms for the convention. Write direct to L. F. Klooz, Manager Colonial-Annex, Pittsburg.

A Visit to Nebraska

On Wednesday morning, July 14, the writer left Vincennes, Ind., for Nebraska. Through Missouri we encountered high waters everywhere. We passed through fields that fairly groaned because of the great harvests that are to be found on them. During the last twenty years the writer has crossed the great Mississippi-Missouri River Valley country twenty-seven times, but never before has he seen such a crop growing on it as may be seen now. The harvest is indeed bountiful.

The first stop was made at Pawnee City, Nebraska. The fates were with us. It so happened that we arrived when the C. W. B. M. ladies had arranged for a picnic. It was a great privilege to meet so many of the excellent workers of the Pawnee Church. We are indebted to Chas. L. Wheeler, the pastor of the church, and Mrs. Wheeler, for many kindnesses and courtesies shown us. It was a great pleasure to meet Mr. and Mrs. Griffith, father and mother of Olive Griffith, our missionary in India. The ladies rendered a most excellent program. It was a joy to speak to them. The whole church is loud in its praises of Evangelist Wilhite, who had just closed a meeting there that resulted in seventy-eight additions.

From Pawnee City we went to Fairbury, Nebraska. a former field of labor. Luther Nelson, one of the saints of the Fairbury Church, met us, taking us from the train to the church, where a large number of the persons were waiting for us. It was a happy moment in our life to meet the people for whom we had ministered in former years. This church has been a great church for years. It is greater now than it has ever been. The present pastor, Thomas A. Maxwell, is much beloved by the church.

From Fairbury we went to Bethany, Nebraska. A Christian Endeavor Echo meeting was being held in the Bethany Tabernacle. It gave us the opportunity to meet many that we had known in former years. We were again treated to a fine outdoor repast. While in Bethany we had the pleasure of being in the home of Mr. and Mrs. Aylsworth. This was a great joy. Twenty years ago the writer entered Cotner University. During these twenty years many changes have come. Many times during these years the fate of the university seemed to hang in the balance. But during all of its trying years, one man, above all others, has stood by the university. This man has been President Aylsworth. The Lord never made a more saintly character nor a more heroic spirit than Pres. Aylsworth. He has literally poured out his life for others. Many students, the writer among them, can rise up and call him blessed. To receive a double portion of his spirit is all that any Elias could ask of this Elijah among the teachers of the prophets. Cotner University, that he has been a father to for twenty years, is now in its most prosperous condition. The future is bright for a great school. To parents that are seeking a school where they may send their children to school with a feeling that their moral and spiritual interests will be looked after, as well as their intellectual and physical development, I would say, you can send them to no better place than Cotner.

While in Bethany we enjoyed a visit with H. O. Pritchard, pastor of the Bethany Church. His work with Bethany Church prospers. The fine new building that the congregation is erecting will soon be ready for occupancy. It is an elegant and most commodious structure. It will mean a great forward step for the Bethany Church. The congregation has worshipped for nearly twenty years in the college chapel.

We next visited H. H. Harmon, pastor of the First Church in Lincoln. Brother Harmon is doing a great work in Lincoln. It made our heart glad to learn of the great proportions to which the work in Lincoln has grown. The new building recently dedicated is a great workshop. While the church is already a great hive of activity, it is still planning for larger things. This great church right in the state capitol, Lincoln, is destined to work out a great influence for our cause throughout the entire state. Brother Harmon has the elements of a great leader.

From Lincoln we journeyed to Valparaiso, the home of our childhood. What shall a man say of his home? Simply this: "There is no place like home." Valparaiso is where brothers, sister, and father live, and where mother lies quietly sleeping in the silent village churchyard. For three years the writer preached for the church in Valparaiso while he was a student in Cotner University. The church has suffered much by removals and by deaths. It has given much of its strength that other congregations might be organized in other fields. But, while there have been great losses by removals and by death, there is still left a faithful band that is determined to hold up the cross of King Immanuel. Prof. J. E. Beattie has been called to preach for the church this coming year. We shall look for a year of splendid growth under his wise ministration. On Sunday we had the great joy of preaching for the congregation. Great audiences greeted us both morning and evening. The Methodist people adjourned their services and met with us.

We returned to the good old Hoosier State feeling that it was a rare treat to sojourn in the great state of Nebraska, where everything is large with opportunity. The Century has many friends in Nebraska. The high character of the paper is making a deep impression on many.

William Oeschger.

Every Minister a Reporter

I lately embodied Wr. R. Warren's article, "Centennial of the Disciples of Christ," which I presume every one of our ministers has seen, in three of the great dailies of Kansas City, Missouri. The editors were not only glad to get the report of our forthcoming Centennial and a short history of our movement, but asked for a photograph of Alexander Campbell, which I furnished, so that they could run a cut of this apostle of union in their columns. Had I sought to purchase the four columns and a half of space which they freely gave, from these papers, it would have cost me $300.00 My suggestion is that every preacher among us will follow the example of Brother Priest of Columbus, Ohio, and see that their papers make an announcement of the convention and a short history of our movement.

This will in some measure aid the herculenean efforts of Brother Warren, who has so efficiently served our great Brotherhood, in the capacity of General Secretary. Brethren, please do not neglect this very important matter, another day. "Do it now."

Keuka College, Keuka Park New York

In our papers we have recently seen accounts of almost every College among our great Brotherhood, except that of Keuka College. But the last is not the least.

Keuka College is situated in Yates County on Keuka Lake—a beautiful body of water, twenty-two miles in length. Steamers pass in front of the college several times daily, discharging and taking on passengers. I am told that Dr. John H. Vincent, of Chautauqua fame, preferred Keuka Lake to Chautauqua Lake for the location of the greatest summer school in the world.

Keuka College is located four miles from Penn Yan—a town of about 5,000—and an electric line along the lake's edge connects the two places, besides there being two lines of steamers. The college building is worth $100,000.00. It is five stories high, sixty-five feet wide and 200 feet long, built of red brick and crowned with slate. The property is well worth $150,000.00.

We, the Disciples of Christ, were invited by the Free Baptists to join them in the conduct of Keuka College, to name the president from among our Brotherhood, to establish the Bible Department and place at its head one of our brethren and to name others on the faculty and the Board of Trustees.

In March, Arthur Braden, graduate of Hiram College, and also of the Theological Seminary in Auburn, New York, where he

GOT TO Have Sharp Brains Nowadays or Drop Back.

The man of today, no matter what his calling, needs a sharp brain, and to get this he needs food that not only gives muscle and strength but brain and nerve power as well.

A carpenter and builder of Marquette, who is energetic and wants to advance in his business read an article about food in a religious paper and in speaking of his experience he said:

"Up to three years ago I had not been able to study or use my thinking powers to any extent. There was something lacking and I know now that it was due to the fact that my food was not rebuilding my brain.

"About this time I began the use of Grape-Nuts food, and the result has been that now I can think and plan with some success. It has not only rebuilt my brain until it is stronger and surer and more active, but my muscles are also harder and more firm, where they used to be loose and soft, and my stomach is now in perfect condition.

"I can endure more than twice the amount of fatigue and my rest at night always completely restores me. In other words, I am enjoying life and I attribute it to the fact that I have found a perfect food." Read "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs. "There's a Reason."

has been a successful pastor four years, was chosen as professor of Sacred Literature. In June, at the annual meeting of the Board of Trustees, he was elected president of the college. He graduated with honors in the Auburn Theological Seminary, where he is highly regarded.

The Department of Sacred Literature includes English Bible, New Testament Greek, Church History, Hebrew, the Old Testament, the New Testament, Homiletics and Apologetics. The English Bible will afford a practical study of the scriptures in English, and courses in systematic and pastoral theology.

Last September the writer was chosen as vice president and field secretary of the college, and to pave the way for a consummation of the plans agreed upon by the Free Baptists and Disciples of Christ in the conduct of the college. More than $7,000.00 has been raised, mostly in cash. Of this amount, the Hon. Thomas W. Phillips, of New Castle, Penn., gave $1,000. The Ball Brothers of Muncie, Ind., gave $2,000.00. These gentlemen are generous friends of the college, and, we believe, will continue to respond in proportion to the response on the part of the Disciples of Christ. Thus far our brethren in New England where I have visited are generously interested in Keuka College. Our churches are few in the East, but never has any Christian enterprise met with greater favor among them than has this Keuka College. We have a four years' preparatory course, affording a diploma under the seal of the University of New York; and after this a four years' course, giving an A. B. degree, under the seal of the University of New York, because our college is in honorable relation with that well known institution which gives a graduate a standing in every state of the Union. We know of no other school affording a student ten months' education for less cost.

Peter Ainslie, of Baltimore, says, that no greater opportunity has come to the Disciples of Christ in the century than the one in Keuka College.

A Word to the Bible School Superintendent

Bible school superintendents are reminded that the work of the National Christian Bible School Association depends upon a prompt response to the suggestion of the Central Committee, P. H. Welshimer, R. M. Hopkins, and H. H. Moninger, that each Bible school in the Brotherhood sends us one of its regular offerings in July or August to the National Superintendent, Marion Stevenson, 393 North Euclid avenue, St. Louis, Mo. Only a few of the schools have yet responded to this reasonable request.

The National Christian Bible School Association needs $2,000 to enable it to carry out its large and helpful plans for the three months preceding the Pittsburg convention. No school can afford to miss its fellowship in the national work. Few will refuse to give us one of their fifty-two offerings, if they are asked to do so. Send it now to the National Superintendent, address given above.

Prince Edward Island Letter

By Hugh T. Morrison.

Prince Edward Island, lying in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, is the smallest of the Canadian provinces, containing but little over 2,000 square miles with a population of about 100,000. Its pastoral scenery is most delightful. In all my travels I have found no country that excells it in the beauty of its scenery in the summer season. But its winters are long and severe. The people are intelligent, moral, happy and hospitable. No better place for rest and recreation can be found in the summer season.

The writer spent four years of his early life on this island. Here he became a disciple of Christ, laid down the carpenter's tools to enter the ministry, preached his first sermons and married the woman who shared his lot as wife and mother for more than thirty years.

When in London, on my return trip from Australia, I received an invitation to become pastor of a union church, composed of Baptists and Disciples, on this, the extreme eastern end of the island. For more than fifty years the community had been divided between these two parties, with the usual amount of misunderstanding and bitterness. Each party, with a good house of its own, was too weak to keep up its expenses and support a pastor. Over two years ago the leaders of both churches got together and unanimously agreed that the time had come to co-operate. They agreed to worship together, meeting alternately on Lord's Day mornings in both churches, and in the evenigs at the Baptist church, the larger of the two, and henceforth support one pastor. The union is a case of federation, pure and simple. Neither church gives up its name, its organization, its board of officers, or its denominational treasury. At all the meetings in the Christian Church the Lord's Supper is observed as it always had been observed. In the Baptist Church it is observed once a month.

The first pastor was a Baptist, and served the church for more than a year with the greatest satisfaction. The writer has now had charge of the work for the last four months, and as far as he can see, perfect harmony prevails. I have been in about a hundred homes, composing my congregation, and as yet have not heard a word of dissatisfaction with the union, or with the way in which the work is being done. I am now preaching to congregations of 250. As it was before the union 100 would have been considered a good congregation at either church. As time moves on the members of both churches are drawing closer together, and little or nothing is heard of party names or party ideas. I am profoundly convinced that living and working together is the only way out of partyism, and into the unity for which the blessed Master prayed.

Bothwell, P. E. Island, July 24.

CENTENNIAL OFFERING FOR CHURCH EXTENSION

It begins the First Sunday of September and should actively continue every Sunday of September and October until every missionary church has sent a liberal Centennial Offering.

PUT UP THAT MAP AND ORDER THOSE SUPPLIES

A poster-map and a post-card have been sent to every pastor or correspondent. Give the Map a Conspicuous place in your Auditorium and call attention to it. It shows a great work done by the Board of Church Extension. Fill out the post-card, ordering your supplies for the Annual Offering and send the post-card to G. W. Muckley, Kansas City, Mo. He will furnish up-to-date literature. It is attractive and the people will need it if you give it to them with a word of commendation.

IF INFORMATION IS GIVEN, MONEY IS GIVEN

People want the facts. We are criminally neglectful if we fail to give glowing facts to the brethren and thus fail to get money for the Extension of the Kingdom. The Church Extension Board has stirred up great activity in mission church building this Centennial Year by promising nearly $200,000 to 153 congregations to help them build. Let us help our Church Extension Board to pay these loans by rolling up a great offering for that work in the month of September.

LISTEN TO THIS: THINK HARD ABOUT IT

1.—1,248 churches have been helped to their buildings by the Church Extension Fund in 44 states.
2.—684 of these have paid their loans in full.
3.—Over $864,000 has been returned on loans, showing that the Church Extension Plan of having the money go out and, returning, go out again and again, is working beyond our fondest hopes.
4.—The Pity is that

ONLY 1,700 CONGREGATIONS

of our stronger churches have ever had fellowship in the annual Offering for Church Extension. Let us make it Unanimous This Year!

MR. AND MRS. HERBERT SMITH.

The Christian Century takes pleasure in presenting to its readers Mr. and Mrs. Herbert Smith, who have gone with Dr. Royal J. Dye to Africa. Mr. Smith, it will be remembered, graduated at Bethany College in June. Within a month he married and with his wife set sail with Dr. Dye. Chicago Disciples are happy over the part they had in sending these good people to help the beloved Dr. Dye.

Centennial Bulletin

Every day brings the Centennial Convention one day nearer.

Every day sees an increase in the work and larger indications that we will have the largest religious gathering of modern times, in Pittsburg, in October.

Every day brings new inquiries for reservations of rooms and it is to be hoped that every one coming will, as soon as possible, make that fact known to our good Brother Fred Marsh Gordon, who is chairman of the Entertainment Committee. Address him at the Centennial Headquarters, Bissell Block, and you will receive prompt and efficient attention. It would be a good thing if you would send your registration fee in, for then you would receive your room assignment in advance, your program and your souvenir badge which entitles the wearer to entrance to all of the meetings of the Convention, as well as many other courtesies that the good people of Pittsburg will shower upon our delegates from all parts of the world.

The Prospectus.

By the time this appears in print, the Prospectus will be on its way to thousands of people all over the United States. For three years Brother Warren has been collecting a selected list of names of the best people in the brotherhood to whom the prospectus will be sent. If you do not get one, it is not Brother Warren's fault, for he has tried to get your name many times from your preacher, but preachers, unfortunately, like other mortals, sometimes fail to realize the importance of doing the thing right now. But if you want a prospectus, address the writer and he will mail you one at once.

This prospectus is a very finely gotten up book of eighty pages, and is printed on the best of calendared paper, and is superbly illustrated. No better prospectus was ever sent out. It costs $2,000.00 to get out the 100,000 edition, and two cents to mail it, so if you want one, while it is free, it would be a graceful thing to enclose at least a two cent stamp for it.

The prospectus tells all about train rates, hotels, places of meetings and points of interest in and around the "great workshop of the world." You will want it as a souvenir of the Centennial; so send in early for it.

A Brother and the Roll Book.

A good brother out in Danville, Ill., by name, E. E. Hartley, writes to the Centennial office telling how he is handling the Centennial Roll Book. He says that he is making a canvass of all the churches in his county, asking and insisting that every church have a book and that every member of the church be enrolled. Good! If we had a million men like him we could take this country for Christ in short order.

The First Edition of Centennial Folders.

The first edition of Centennial folders reached the great total of 100,000. This has been entirely exhausted and a second hundred thousand is now on the press and ready for mailing. From the manner in which inquiries are coming in we will reach our 50,000 mark without trouble.

Centennial Stickers.

We have sent from headquarters in the Bissell block, more than half a million of the Centennial stickers to be used on envelopes in all parts of the mailing territory of Uncle Sam. The way they are being returned to us stuck upon the envelopes indicates that they are being used wisely and well. These stickers form a simple and unique way of advertising the convention, and if you have had none of them, or want more, address as below and they will be sent immediately.

The Real Purpose of the Convention.

Have you thought relative to the real purpose of the Convention and the Centennial!

Perhaps you have thought of it as a time and occasion when you might meet old friends and rejoice in seeing familiar faces of the long ago. The cry, "On to Pittsburg," indicates that many are coming for the purpose of meeting old friends. That is well and that is good. But there's something more to the Convention than the meeting of old friends.

Perhaps you have thought of the Convention and the Centennial as the opportunity and the occasion for a great rejoicing because of what we, as a people, have accomplished. Well, we have done much and we have a reason to congratulate ourselves on the effort and the achievements of the past. But that's not all there is to the Centennial and the Convention.

Perhaps you have thought of it as a great time when the hosts of the Lord will come up to hear the thrilling reports, see our splendid missionaries and listen to the great addresses. All that is good! You will do all this and more! But there is more to the Centennial Convention than this.

It should be a great time of "loin girding, range finding and heart searching." More than that, because of what the Lord hath done for us, it should be a time of renewed consecration to the work God has given us to do. We have raised up to help other people up. We have been united that we may unite other people. When the Disciples of Christ have no distinctive plea to offer the people, God will have no distinctive use for us. We have been fed on the Bread of Life, that we may feed it to others. We have been privileged to drink of the Wells of Salvation that we give the Water of Life to others. There is a giving that does not impoverish, there is a withholding that does not enrich. God has given us that we may give to others. The fields are white for a great harvest. The Convention and the Centennial should mean for us a sharpening of our sickles, and a reaping of the grain for the garners of Eternity. When we work as though all depended on us and pray as though all depended on God, when we work, watch, pray, then we shall get from the Centennial and the Convention the strength and the inspiration to do even greater things than we have ever done before.

Brethren, pray for the Centennial, the Convention, the speakers, and all who, in any way, help to make it the success it is going to be.

Sincerely yours,
John Anderson Jayne,
Chairman Publicity Committee.

Even our best workers have heard the call of the wild and in a week or two many of our churches will be without shepherds. C. L. Thurgood and wife of Central are off now. He is the honored President of our Ministerial Association. Thomas H. Hughes is off too,—most likely holding a meeting. Turtle Creek found a Master Worker in this man. J. G. Slayter is at Johnstown. This church is anxious to retain his services. Howard Cram-

THE NEW WOMAN
Made Over by Quitting Coffee.

Coffee probably wrecks a greater percentage of Southerners than of Northern people for Southerners use it more freely.

The work it does is distressing enough in some instances; as an illustration, a woman of Richmond, Va., writes:

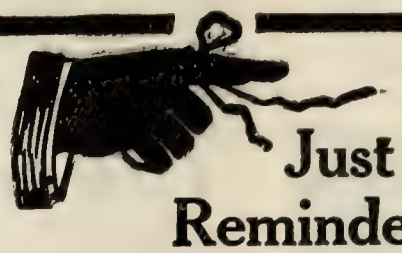
"I was a coffee drinker for years and for about six years my health was completely shattered. I suffered fearfully with headaches and nervousness, also palpitation of the heart and loss of appetite.

"My sight gradually began to fail and finally I lost the sight of one eye altogether. The eye was operated upon and the sight partially restored, then I became totally blind in the other eye.

"My doctor used to urge me to give up coffee but I was wilful and continued to drink it until finally in a case of severe illness the doctor insisted that I must give up the coffee, so I began using Postum and in a month I felt like a new creature.

"I steadily gained in health and strength. About a month ago I began using Grape-Nuts food and the effect has been wonderful. I really feel like a new woman and have gained about 25 pounds.

"I am quite an elderly lady and before using Postum and Grape-Nuts I could not walk a square without fatigue, now I walk ten or twelve without feeling it. Formerly in reading I could remember but little but now my memory holds fast what I read.



"Several friends who have seen the remarkable effects of Postum and Grape-Nuts on me have urged that I give the facts to the public for the sake of suffering humanity, so, although I dislike publicity, you can publish this letter if you like."

blet has a new building in mind for the McKeesport Church. It is the vision of a great Bible School. J. Walter Carpenter and wife at Uniontown have practically applied the latest methods in a great Bible School. E. A. Cole never gets through talking about the Bible School at Washington. And well he may be proud for even during these hot days more than two hundred attend his class alone. And we doubt not that often the busy church fades out of view and he sees the thirty odd rustics out in the depths of the virgin forest at Brush Run,—the first Bible School of the Campbells. But the thirty in this district has become twenty thousand, and again the Word has grown and multiplied. We have a lot of men in our Pittsburgh district with Bible School ideals. C. A. MacDonald of McKees Rocks is preparing to be a Bible School Evangelist. Fred M. Gordon keeps on the front line at Knowville. Just now he has an assistant. His midsummer park meetings have become famous. D. R. Moss is delighted with his experiment of the Pleasant Sunday afternoon at Homestead. Percy A. Davis of Duquesne deserves special praise in tiding the church through a most critical period of her history. Recently Errett Burgess Quick became the pastor of Braddock. William Ross Lloyd assisted most ably by Supt. Farr has brought Bellevue up to the front line in Bible School work. Old Allegheny is to be beautifully frescoed and carpeted before the Centennial so that Wallace Tharp and his splendid workers may give the royal welcome to all visitors to this honored Mother Church. J. A. Joyce, after a long wait, hopes to have a chapel up at Sheridan before the Centennial. J. D. Dabney says that Butler will dedicate her first house of worship before Christmas. George W. Knepper, always optimistic, is planning greater things for Wilkinsburg. The Ministerial Association has been tendered the music room of Frederick's great music house in which to hold the Monday meetings. For this summer there will be no vacation. Each Monday morning we will have the glad hand for visiting ministers.

out in smooth waters in sight of the haven. What would have daunted many another man he set himself to accomplish. It is being worthily done, too, and when it is all over we will honor the man who set a high standard and made us all work to it. And from the beginning his stenographer, Miss Shields, with rare fidelity has made his work hers, becoming responsible for its distribution and wonderfully aiding him in the attainment of his splendid ideals. This fidelity has characterized all others who have in any way worked for him.

And what shall we say of the men at the head of the departments? It has been a fine illustration of team work. J. A. Jayne, already well known in newspaper circles, is at the head of the Publicity Department. And he will make it go, too. G. W. Knepper is fast filling the pulpits prospectively for Lord's Day, October 17, 1909. Fred M. Gordon is securing places for thirty thousand guests in private homes. S. E. Brewster has a great room for exhibits and will be able soon to announce the space allotted to various exhibitors. C. L. Thurgood expects to have the time of his life in piloting excursionists. The writer is ready with the music of the program. E. A. Hibler, the new Corresponding Secretary of Western Pennsylvania, is working with the Centennial Bureau until the Convention is over. Pittsburgh business men have finally wakened up and many are backing up our undertaking in a most substantial way.

This volume is the classic for this our Centennial year.

Probably more copies of it have been sold than of any other book published by the Disciples in the last Decade.

Its popularity is due partly to its beautiful make-up—the printer's and binder's art has done its best—but mainly to its contents. This is what it contains:

ALEXANDER CAMPBELL'S "SERMON ON THE LAW."
BARTON W. STONE'S "LAST WILL AND TESTAMENT OF THE SPRINGFIELD PRESBYTERY."
THOMAS CAMPBELL'S "DECLARATION AND ADDRESS."
ISAAC ERRETT'S "OUR POSITION."
J. H. GARRISON'S "THE WORLDS NEED OF OUR PLEA."

Do We Need A New Religion?

If We Do, Why Not Try Christianity?

Ex-president Eliot, of Harvard, has considerably agitated religious circles by his recent announcement that the times demand a new religion.

The general statement would be enough to stir the resentment of the orthodox, but when the distinguished scholar draws the outlines of his new religion with some detail every evangelical sword is unsheathed for the defense of those doctrines which the statement of the new religion denies.

Presently, however, it occurs to some one that Dr. Eliot has always been a Unitarian and his new religion gets itself classified as "the same old thing" Unitarians have been exploiting for years, with waning success. Thereupon, the innocuousness of the "new religion" is apparent, and orthodoxy resumes its self-composure.

In company with all other evangelicals we must say that this so-called new religion does not please us either. What its "author" puts in is very good, but what he leaves out and what he denies seem to us often to be just as important.

But apart from the positive outlines of it, why should any one be agitated by the suggestion that the times demand and the souls of men need a new religion?

What other religion will do us any good except a new one?

Is it not just that element of newness that gives vitality and reality to religion—to our Christianity, at least, among all religions? For this is the distinction of Christianity that it is eternally new, that it has in it exhaustless powers of restatement and adaptation, and while remaining ever the same is ever new.

Most of us have formed the habit of thinking of Christianity as a historic religion. We assume that its chief significance must be stated in terms of centuries and epochs. We assume that its creeds and councils and rituals and organization constitute Christianity; and if we are able to trace through the ages a continuity of these items of historic fact, we are safe in affirming that the Christianity of today is the same as that of yesterday.

But the truth is that the real entity named Christianity is not found in history at all, but in human souls. What we are dealing with in the tracings of history are but the pale reflections of the blood-red reality.

And as soon as we refuse to stand in this or that historic epoch to inquire what Christianity is, and take our stand beside the human soul and ask what Christianity is, then we have greatly simplified the problems of religious thinking. And when we stand beside the soul to study Christianity one of the most obvious—yes, one of the essential—characteristics of it is its newness, its freshness.

Our Christianity is a new religion to every one who truly receives it.

This is the universal testimony of the great souls who have yielded themselves to the saving power of Christ. They are ushered into a new world. Old things are passed away. All things become new.

So thorough-going is this transformation of the inner life that oftimes the "new man" must have for himself a new name, in the spirit in which Mendel called himself Neander, and Simon came to be called Peter.

Dr. Eliot is reported to have named among the negative items of his new religion this: that there would be "no place in it for conversion."

But if a religion have no place in it for conversion it certainly is not Christian, but neither is it new. It is the old dead failure with which our humanity has been deceived and from which it has been disillusionized by turns through too many centuries.

They little understand the significance of the progressive movement in religious life today who see in it an attempt to substitute so-called culture for conversion.

The criticism to which orthodox evangelistic conversions are today being subjected is not due to their thoroughness nor to their suddenness, but to their shallowness.

No one is finding fault with hypnotic evangelism because it converts people, but because it does not convert them deeply enough and thoroughly enough. A religion of authority need not be new to its convert. A religion of ceremony and ritual need not be new. A religion of doctrinal creed need not be new.

But a spiritual religion, if it is really spiritual, must be new to the soul of its convert. Its fundamental characteristic is insight. Not belief about something, but faith in something. Its primary activity is obedience—not to an ordinance or an external organization or a mechanical device of the revivalist, but to the spiritual law, inwardly discerned by the soul, through which the goods of the spiritual world are realized. And its richest emotion is the joy of discovery, the sense of a new world, a new power, new values and standards, and a wondrous new peace.

In truth, this particular experience is absolutely new and unique in the universe. There are other experiences like it, but they are not this experience. Life is unique in each soul and because spiritual religion is life, new life, it too is unique.

Likewise, our Christianity will be a perennially new religion to every one who truly keeps it.

This, indeed, is the condition on which one may keep it: that it continually pass from grace to grace, from one stage of glory to another.

It is a sweet promise in the Revelation that the morning star shall be given to him that overcometh. Because the morning star is the symbol of the ascending life, the growing life, the crescendo life.

Poor indeed is that soul whose star has passed its zenith and falls toward evening, whose main inspirations are in memory, whose song is chiefly of

"The joy of the soul in its earliest love."

Our Christianity is essentially a progressive religion, a perennially fresh religion. Like all the gifts of God's grace, it is

"New every morning, fresh every evening."

And this progressiveness, this unceasing newness of spiritual religion, belongs not alone to the soul's peace and the soul's obedience, but to its insight as well.

It is an error which greatly hinders the increase of our life, that we may grow into fuller obedience and deeper peace, but we must conform constantly to a set standard in our beliefs. Thus our insights are blinded and the richer possibilities of obedience and peace shut out.

Let us who have learned much from Paul learn this too: That we all, whether new convert or apostle, see as in a mirror, darkly; that we know only in part; that the perfect is ever progressively revealing itself to us and, as it is disclosed, that which is partial is progressively done away.

The great error of Christendom is that of thinking of its religion as a thing of stability and sameness, whereas, it is essentially a religion of change and of difference.

The reason this religion can never be outgrown is that it makes provision among its fundamentals for growth and progress.

By what right, then, some one asks, do we call this ever changing, ever new religion by the constant name, Christianity?

Because, we answer, it was Christ who set the human soul free to seek the truth. He taught us that salvation lay not in orthodoxy, which is sameness, but in truth, which is perennial change, and himself blazed the way for our free pursuit of truth by his example and death.

But there is yet a deeper reason for calling this ever new religion by the name of Christ:

It is Christ's religion, not simply because he was its founder, but because he is its forwarder, not simply because he started it off, but because he carries it on, not simply because he presided at its inception in the souls of the first disciples, but because he is presiding over its inception in the soul latest born into the kingdom of grace.

The Trend of Events

By Alva W. Taylor

THE TRAIL OF THE FLY

The "trail of the serpent" is classic phrase. We are realizing that the "trail of the fly" is an awful and menacing reality. He is a "bird of prey," a vile and loathsome beast, that lives, like a vulture, off the dead. Unspeakable excresence is his favorite pabulum and the places men flee his choicest abiding place. He is the harbinger of disease, a black scavenger of death. Men should count him tout au contraire and shun him as a leper.

On his legs the common house fly carries a multitude of bristle like hairs of microscopical size. These he drags through the garbage and carrion on which he feeds and flies away with their accumulated load of disease germs. Then he seeks the kitchen and trails them over the exposed food, over the baby's face and lips, over uncovered cooking utensils and about the walls, and drops his invisible burdens of disease bacteria every where he goes.

His trail has been identified as a trail of death. In New York city death by typhoid was found to be in direct proportion to his coming and going and to the regions he frequented most. When the bars were shut on his welcome to the tenements of the poor the disease disappeared almost entirely. Here is the answer to the oft asked question, "Where could they have gotten it?" A million bacteria of certain disease dealing kinds can be picked up on the point of a needle. The nine hundred and ninety nine thousand may die and the thousand, if dropped in the right spot for their culture, will multiply until they bring sickness and death. Bar out the fly. Shun him as a plague.

VACCINATION FOR TYPHOID

Preparations have been made for some time to experiment with the new typhoid serum. On June 17, three brave young men, soldiers at Fort Omaha, submitted themselves to the test. They are soldiers indeed, knights for humanity's welfare. They each suffered with a mild form of typhoid as a result of the inoculation. They were then vaccinated with the serum again, but there were no ill effects. They then drank water several days old into which there had been deposited 1,000,0000 typhoid germs. The time demanded for the beginning of the symptoms of the disease is long passed and none have developed. The physicians are satisfied that they could not contract the disease.

It is now reported that the Tsetse Fly is not the agent for the transmission of the African sleeping sickness and also that successful experiments have been conducted with a serum for its prevention. Whole populations have been decimated in Africa by it. It is the plague of Uganda and all Central Africa.

Another report tells us that the small-pox germ has been isolated. One by one the secrets of the plagues are given up to science. The death dealing microbe is traced to his lair, his habits discovered and his enemies cultivated. These invisible germs are found to be as much unlike as alligators and elephants. They have their habitats, their enemies, and their own peculiar diseases. They are almost chemical entities, but they are as much unlike as other variegated forms of life. In them life lies like rivers at their sources, near one another, but as far apart as the oceans in their trend.

MICROBES FOR SALE

We usually think of microbes with horror. We know of germs as the progenitors of disease. In fact they are the progenitors of all living things. There are good germs and bad ones. Bacteriology is revealing wonders more wonderful than ever the telescope revealed.

Serums have long been sold to the medical fraternity for inoculation against certain diseases. Now we have news of bacteria being sold to farmers for the inoculation of the soil. The impoverishment of the soil comes through its being deprived of certain chemical elements. They are absorbed faster than they are supplied. Wheat ceases to make good crops after a few years on the same ground. It is necessary to "renew" the soil.

The farmer plows under clover as a renewer or fertilizer. It furnishes nitrogenous matter and nitrogen is the greatest of all elements for the making of plants. We live in an ocean of it, but we are like men in the midst of the sea with no apparatus to distill water. The microbe has been found that will catch the fickle gas and unite it with more stable matter for its work.

It was in Holland, with necessity as the stimulous, that the search first began. The nodules of the Legumes, such as clover, peas and beans, were studied to find the secret of their fertilizing power. Their power to fix the instable nitrogen was found to be the secret. Then the search for artificial means of capturing the element began. In Norway electricity is shot through the air, like lightning, and a small amount of nitrogen is distilled by each shock. Thus a roaring cataract is made to enrich the barren soil.

Then a way was found to induce the bacteria that made up those little nodules on the leguminous roots to propogate themselves apart from their native habitat and Dr. Moore, of the United States Department of Agriculture, tried sending cultures of them out in packages of cotton. The cotton proved too dry and the bacteria perished. Dr. Thomas of New Zealand found a fluid in which they could be kept for months and transported. The farmer can now buy them in tubes, put a few drops of the fluid into a gallon of water, dip his seed in the water, plant it, and be assured he will reap an increase in his crop. The results have been quite surprising where the operation was carefully performed.

In England, where, with older soil there is the greater need. W. T. Stead, the publicist, has been popularizing the experiments and trying to make them practicable by inducing intelligent planters to use the artificially cultured bacteria. He prints each month pictures of the inocculated and uninocculated plants grown side by side and the contrasts are very surprising. In Alabama it was found that clover that had been inocculated produced thirty times as great an amount of nitrogenous matter as that which had not been. At a cost of two dollars per acre, thirty dollars value was added.

The scientists are now telling us that we could not live without the bacteria. They seem to be at the root of the matter for both good and ill. Theirs is the secret of human chemistry and in them lies the nearest approach to the secret of the basis of life itself. They permeate living matter. That billions of them can dance on the end of a needle is greater than the problem of the ancients over the angels and the famed needle point.

A SOCIALIST PREMIER IN FRANCE

M. Briand, the Socialist, has succeeded Clemenceau, the Radical, as head of the French cabinet. He is not a radical socialist but belongs rather to the opportunist section of that party. He is not orthodox according to the canons of pure socialism. Nor is he a member of that wing of the movement in France that always votes against the budget and all military and naval appropriations. He represents more nearly the union of principles and policies brought about by the reaction of socialistic ideas on practical labor unionism in France. The bloc that Clemenceau was able to hold together so long, and to thus make his ministry of exceptional length for France, is behind Briand. It is composed of the Republicans, Progressists, and the several Socialist parties. It numbers 567 Deputies while the Opposition is composed of the various conservative parties, viz., Royalists, Bonapartists, Liberals, and Nationalists, and number but 117. Clemenceau's fall was occasioned largely by a burst of wrath when his administration was under criticism for its naval administration. Briand was the man who worked out the disestablishment of Catholicism through the new educational system. That reform grows increasingly in popular favor. He is also a favorite of labor and labor is playing an increasingly large part in French politics. Socialism gains by both and Briand is the first socialistic statesman to head a great government.

FRENCH SOCIALISM

The Frenchman is severely logical. He carries his conclusions to the mathematical limit. Then he inclines to act upon the theory thus evolved. It is less a mercurial temperament than this that accounts for the Frenchman. He is not a coward and inclines to take the consequences of his reasoning seriously and to try it on. This characteristic accounts for his radicalism and the diversity of party organizations. There are ten parties represented in the House of Deputies. The bloc is composed of six of them. They range from the Republican to the Socialist. The greater number are the Socialist Radicals. They are radicals with a socialist trend. It is to this party that Briand belongs. The Unified Socialists are the party of pure socialism. They number fifty-three and represent the national socialist organization. They always vote against military and naval and colonial appropriations and against the budget as a whole. They declare themselves revolutionists and expect to work the industrial revolution through the workingmen's organizations. They declare for reforms, but also declare that mere reform will do little.

Clemenceau was a Radical. Thus the socialistic elements have made a clear gain. Jaures, the great socialistic leader, is in favor of the methods of evolution. When Millerand entered the cabinet a few years ago the Socialist organization was split over an effort to turn him out of the party on the principle that they could not accept a place in a bourgeoisie ministry. Jaures led the Millerand faction and "opportunist" socialism triumphed. The orthodox faction continued alone for a time but a working coalition is again established.

The Unified Socialists (pure socialism) received 1,200,000 votes in the last parliamentary election. It was one-tenth of the entire vote. In twenty years they had thus grown from 30,000 and it was a steady growth. It has also 149 mayors in the republic.

THE POWER OF LABOR IN FRANCE

All French industrial organizations are called "syndicats." They were authorized in 1864 but had no real freedom until 1884. Then they were limited to moral action and purely professional matters. Later they received power to conduct strikes and of late years they have had many and severely fought ones. At the time of the Dreyfus agitation the Radicals were not able to cope with the clerical and anti-semitic and royalist elements and the socialists were called in. They had gotten great hold of the working classes and, endeavoring ever to work through the labor organizations, brought the labor unions to the front. Jaures, through the Millerand episode, saved them form their extremists, and gave them a hold on the parliamentary situation. Thus much favorable labor legislation was gained. They helped in dissolving the monastic orders, in suppressing catholic education and in establishing a secular system, in the dissolution of the concordat and thus the disestablishment of the Roman Church, and gave the state power to repurchase the railroads. Income tax and old age pensions are now pending action and Briand's accession to power will forward both.

But the Socialist party was too doctrinaire and the trades unions were anxious to get things done. The General Federation of Labor (Confederation Generale du Travail) was organized and the reign of what is called syndicalism began. The strike of the postal and telegraphic employees last spring was the first trial of its wings. It was doubtless too radical a move and lost its immediate contention but it at the same time proved its strength. It proved that the government dared not forbid governmental employees to join labor unions or to strike and it proved the government dared not attempt to dissolve the great General Federation as it has undoubted right to do. Its power lies in its political force. Briand's selection is doubtless a recognition of its political power. No party or coalition could successfully fly in its face and appeal to the country. There are nearly 8,000 unions with a million members and the leaders are as indefatigable propagandists as are the socialists of England. They would have the help of other millions who are not members. With the civil service force of the government with them they are growing formidable.

There is no reason why the world should stand aghast at this condition. It is but an opportunity for the masses to try their hands at government in France. The Revolution brought the rule of the middle-classes in place of that of the aristocracy. This movement is for a larger share in goverment by the masses as against the middle-classes. It is a marked step in the inevitable entre of the working millions into the actualities of political control. It will vastly forward the socializing of government as over against the old fashioned type of political and commercial government. It will not mean socialism but the leaven of socialism in the meal of commercial and political individualism. If it does overt acts it will do no more than all its predecessors have done. The net gain will be for the progress of mankind from the state of great wealth for the few to comforts for the many. France has but 5 per cent of illiteracy, but one-half that of our own country. Ten political parties certainly argues for independency of conviction among her voters. With an educated and independant ballot she will be safe.

Editorial

DR. IRA LANDRETH'S resignation as Secretary of the Presbyterian Brotherhood of America has been accepted by the National Council, and he has been elected to the office of Editorial Secretary. In this capacity he will edit "The Presbyterian Brotherhood," the quarterly magazine of the movement, in addition to his duties as President of Belmont College, Nashville, Tenn. Mr. Henry E. Rosevear, who for the past year has been Associate Secretary of the Presbyterian Brotherhood, succeeds to the Secretaryship.

REPORTS from those state conventions of the country that are held in the spring and early summer indicate that the approaching Centennial gathering has not reduced the attendance as greatly as many feared. The Illinois Convention to be held on the opening days of September, is at a special disadvantage in being so near to the Pittsburgh meeting. Some no doubt who are "going up" for the greater gathering will not be at Eureka. Probably for those whose circumstances compel an exclusive choice between the two this solution will be warranted. Yet the work at home should not be allowed to sag in this Centennial year. All over Illinois our men and women should stretch a point to be at the state convention if possible. The splendid program which we print on another page is a strong attraction. But just to go to old Eureka town is inducement enough. Many will have to cut their vacations a week short in order to make this engagement, but the days in Eureka will fit in with the vacation days so well as to seem to be an integral part of the holiday. Let the Illinois state conscience be kept alive despite the Centennial temptation.

IN ACCEPTING the office of Moderator of the English Presbyterian Synod last summer, Dr. J. Campbell Gibson of China made the following thrilling appeal to the synod for Christian unity:

"Can you not restore to us the unity of the body of Christ? For the sake of the life of young churches and great nations, for the sake of the perplexed Christianity of your own land, for the sake of the honor of your Lord, now at least make real to yourselves and visible to the world the unity of the body of Christ. The churches which you have planted across the seas have not been won by your watchwords of division. In the days of the great persecution in China nine years ago, when the Boxers tested the Christians there, they did not test them by the Westminster Confession, nor by the Thirty-nine Articles, nor by the sermons of Wesley. Instinctively they chose a more universal and more searching test; drawing a rude cross on the ground, they called on their prisoners to trample it under foot, offering life and freedom to those who did so and death to those who refused. In that hour of terror some fell from a scarcely grasped faith, but many thousands—men, women and children—could not bring themselves to put a contemptuous foot on the rudest symbol of the holy passion of their Redeemer, and they died unflinchingly not as Anglicans or Wesleyans or Presbyterians, but as Christians, members of the one body, holding the one faith, inspired by the one Spirit, and so they gained the crown of life."

And the Interior (Chicago) to which we are indebted for the report of the address adds:

"The churches of Christian lands can't long resist adjurations like that from the men who are closest up to the vanguard of the king's army of conquest. The only way to avert church union would be to call back all the foreign missionaries."

"CHICAGO—Pittsburgh," the heading that stands over Mr. Jordan's Chicago page has a double significance just now. To the regular reader of the interesting narrative the title suggests Chicago's interest in the approaching celebration at Pittsburgh. Mr. Jordan was appointed by the Chicago ministers as manager of the Chicago train to Pittsgurgh and he went to that city nine weeks ago to make provision for the entertainment of the delegation going from this city. While there he visited the sacred places in Western Pennsylvania and West Virginia where the fathers wrought out the beginnings of our hundred years' history. What he saw and what his camera saw he is showing us in this interesting series. But to the casual reader who keeps informed of the goings on in the secular world, the hyphenating of Chicago and Pittsburgh would suggest that the Christian Century conducts a baseball page in addition to its many other excellent features. For just now one of the most exciting races in baseball history is on between the clubs of these two cities for the pennant in the National League. Pittsburgh, far to the fore all through the summer, now feels the hot breath of the pursuing "Cubs" on her flanks (this sentence is not plagiarized from the sporting page of the daily paper) and any day may see Chicago in the lead. Queer as it may seem, the Disciples of Christ have a vital interest in this pennant race. Whether or not our Centennial Convention can use the great stadium, Forbes field, for its sessions depends upon the outcome of the baseball contest. If Pittsburgh wins, the final championship games are scheduled to be played in that city in the very week during which our convention is in progress, and Forbes field is pre-empted for that purpose. If Chicago wins, the championship games will be played here and the Centennial will have no distracting competition in the Pennsylvania city. How inextricably are life's interests tangled up! That religion and sport should be thus mingled gives a good text for some philosophising. Whatever the line of reflection might be we are sure it would come to this conclusion that every good Disciple's obvious duty is to "root for Chicago!"

DR. J. WILBUR CHAPMAN, the American evangelist who is making an evangelistic campaign tour of the world, spoke against the Catholic invasion of public school methods in Australia. In one of his largely attended meetings in Melbourne, at the close of his address, Dr. Chapman said, "I wish to make a statement entirely upon my own responsibility. I never allow myself to speak publicly on controvercial religious matters, and I never proselytize among Catholic Christians, or try to make a poor Protestant out of a good Catholic. I have, however, as is but natural, been studying conditions in Australia, and I find them very similar to American conditions. I think that the Roman Catholic church shows an infinite amount of arrogance to have its own parochial schools and to conduct them as it wills and then to come into schools where my children are being educated and tell them that they cannot have the Bible." The statement was greeted with unprecedented enthusiasm. People stood in their chairs and waved hymn books, shouting, "Say it over again, Dr. Chapman. Let us have more of this. Speak your whole mind." The audience cheered continuously for five minutes. When the cheering ceased Dr. Chapman continued, "I know what would happen to me if I were to introdue myself into a Catholic school and present my form of Christianity. The priest would have the right to take me by the nape of the neck and kick me out into the street, and I should thoroughly deserve what I got. Hear me, men! If either Australia or America attempts to raise her boys and girls without the Bible there is danger ahead."

JUST how authoritative is the source from which the movement to make Sunday, September 26, a "Declaration Day" arises has not been made clear to the brotherhood. But it is a suggestion which commends itself to the Christian Century as an appropriate and impressive way of ushering in the Centennial celebration. The Pittsburg convention will be but two weeks off. The "Declaration and Address" published by Thomas Campbell in 1809 marks the beginning of this marvelous hundred years of history which we are to celebrate in October. In many respects this old document is the freshest and most modern statement of the ideals and purposes of Disciples of Christ. To study it, to restate its principles and to give ourselves with a new consecration to their advocacy will be the dominant purpose of the great convention. But the thoughtful and quiet study of this our "Declaration of Independence" before the hosts go to Pittsburg will prepare the heart better to appreciate the greater messages of the greater occasion. In connection with the re-study of the Declaration and Address special attention will likely be paid to that sentence which has been taken as a motto by the Disciples, "Where the Scriptures speak, we speak, and where the Scriptures are silent, we are silent." That there is an ambiguity lurking in this form of words has long been apparent to many thinkers in the current reformation. A writer in the Christian Standard recently takes exception to the motto, bluntly declaring that it is wrong. "It should be reversed," he says, "and should read 'where the Scriptures speak, we are silent.' It is holy ground; it is God speaking, and we ought to take off our shoes as Moses did in the presence of God in the burning bush. We ought to go forward and obey God, asking no questions." The second half of the motto, the same writer says, should likewise be changed and rendered thus: "Where the Scriptures are silent, we may speak." "In fact, if we go forward in the Christian life," he continues, "we must often speak in reference to the very things the Scriptures are silent upon. This declaration has done much harm among us as a people. It is the very thing that has caused so much anti-ism in the Sixteenth Ohio District. Good men say, 'The Scriptures say nothing about the organ in the worship, therefore it is wrong and should not be used in the worship.' For the same reason, missionary societies and many other things that might be mentioned should have no place in the church because the Scriptures are silent." No doubt, to Thomas Campbell's mind his phrasing of the words was meant as a principle of liberty as well as a principle of authority. But their true meaning is not made clear until they have been translated into this revised form. It will be well in preaching upon them as a text to remember that they were not given by infallible inspiration.

ONE hundred of our churches are in the Living-link class. In most cases the Sunday-school combines with the church in this offering to support a missionary. These one hundred churches and Sunday-schools give approximately $60,000 a year for Foreign Missions. This is a little less than one-third the entire amount given by our churches and Sunday-schools. One hundred of our churches and Sunday-schools give $60,000, while 3,500 give $140,000. The Living-link churches and Sunday-schools in their combined offerings average $600 each, while the remaining 3,500 average $40 for each combined church and Sunday-school offering. Our great need is an advance in the average gifts.

A "Hideous Discrepancy"

Apropos of our leading editorial, this week, on "A New Religion," our attention has fixed itself upon a singularly significant editorial in the Christian Standard, of a week or so ago. The editor had just concluded an evangelistic meeting with five or six assistants, including Evangelist C. R. Scoville, for a time, in a Michigan county seat, and had been successful in establishing a church there with something over one hundred members. Before the meeting was held only thirteen Disciples were known to be in the town, while upwards of sixty came to light as the meeting progressed. In commenting upon his experience the editor is drawn into certain interesting observations. He speaks of the "hideous discrepancy" between the net growth of our churches and the "tremendous growth of our churches, as reported in our papers." "With an accession of not less than 125,000 per annum, our net increase is reported as about one-fifth of that number, and the wonder has grown, what has become of them?" The editor then calculates that there may be a million in this country, "indoctrinated in the New Testament faith, who are living apart from their true church associations." From this data the article draws one or two commendable inferences. But the writer seems utterly blind to the more vital significance of the "hideous" facts he so frankly sets forth.

To our mind these facts are chiefly important as a commentary on prevailing evangelistic methods. We are said to have a million and a quarter members. Now if there exists besides these another million of Disciples unattached to their true church associations how great becomes the indictment of our method of gaining accessions!

This million of unattached Disciples does not live mainly in communities where we have no churches. They are most numerous in communities where churches are planted. Chicago is an exception as compared with small towns but hardly so as compared with the larger cities; and here where we have twenty-one organizations with five thousand members, it is conservatively estimated that there are six times that many unattached Disciples living in the city.

The blunt truth is that the reports in our papers of evangelistic success are gross exaggerations of the spiritual facts. Not so many were converted as were counted. Many were manipulated emotionally or socially without being awakened in their intelligence and conscience. Once out of the situation within which they made the first step, their motive is gone. The root of the matter was not in their soul but in the set of conditions that had been built up around them. Moving away to another town or a great city they are lost to the cause.

But this is only another way of saying, in the terms of our opening editorial, the religion they "got" was not new. It was an old religion, a religion that had cooled off from personal experience into a splendid doctrine. Our contemporary's characterization of them as having been "indoctrinated in the New Testament faith," has in it a complete explanation of their helpless and fruitless condition.

The Psalms and the Saints

In previous meditations we have considered the Old Testament, as a book of devotional character, first because it records a large number of experiences and utterances of holy men in the free enjoyment of the spirit of worship; and secondly because it yields itself so readily to the discerning mind as food for spiritual mediation and enjoyment, not only in, but even beyond the confines of that historical and exegetical study which our generation has found so fundamental and so rewarding. A brief account may well be taken of the values which have been imparted to the Old Testament by its entrance into human life in hours of devotion or of supreme spiritual experiences. In this effort it is necessary to confine our inquiry to a limited section of this opulent material, and and alert spirit enters still deeper into the psalm country of prayer have a triple worth. They reveal the heart of the saints who for obvious reasons the part selected will be the Psalms. To the Christian who is seeking aids to the holy life, writings of this kind first uttered them; they serve as the gates through which the eager and holy thought; and they come to us bearing the rich burden of the treasured and accumulating joys and sorrows, hopes and visions of the men and women who have made them their own in the passing of the years. Says Tholluck, "What a record that would be, if one could write it down,—all the spiritual experiences, the disclosures of the heart, the comforts and the conflicts which men in the course of ages have connected with the words of the Psalms! What a history, if we could discover the place the Book has occupied in the inner life of the heroes of the Kingdom of God." Fortunately, not a few of these significant and illuminating experiences have been treasured. The most casual and superficial survey of the theme is sufficient to assure the seeker after God that he has high companionship on his journey to the celestial city, and that many fair souls have travelled this way whose recorded joy of the divine word are to him like brooks by the way. Sitvio Pellico, in the history of his imprisonment, has a striking chapter on the written records left upon the walls by those who preceded him in the cells through which he passed. Similarly the Psalms are written over, like a palimpsest, with the meditations and experiences of those who have found in them the solace for their sorrow and the fitting expression for their joy. The early Christian Church, the Reformation heroes in the lands of Europe, the covenanters in Scotland, have all of them found in the Psalms the means of grace and the hope of glory. They have done much to form the men who have suffered and triumphed in the Kingdom of God, and we need not wonder if we sometimes take up these songs and prayers of the ages only to find them moist with the tears of mourners and the blood of martyrs. What a wonderful story they could tell if we could gather it all from the lonely chambers, from the suffering sick-beds, from the brink of the valley of the shadow; from scaffolds and fiery piles witnessing in sunlight, and from moors and mountains beneath the stars; and in high places in the field where tyranny was driven back. When we read them we join with a multitude which no man can number.

There are those five scholars of Lausenne who went to their death of flame for the reformed faith in 1553, singing on their way to the stake the words of the 9th Psalm, "I will praise thee, O Lord, with my whole heart. When he maketh inquisition for blood he remembereth them. He forgetteth not the cry of the humble." When the Protestants who were driven out of France in 1685 by Louis XIV, went forth in search of homes, they wandered about, afflicted, destitute. A company of them went to Switzerland, and Pineton of Chambrun tells us that when he and his companions came in sight of Geneva, they sang with tears of joy the words of Psalm 26, "Lord, I have loved the habitation of thy house. My foot standeth in an even place. In the congregation will I bless the Lord."

India was still heaving with the ground swell of the terrible mutiny of 1857 when the wife of Sir John Lawrence was called home to England, and had to bid farewell to her husband, leaving him in the midst of the deadly danger. She wrote in her journal, "When the morning of our final separation came, we had our usual Bible reading, and I can never think of the 27th Psalm without recalling that sad hour: 'The Lord is my light and my salvation, whom shall I fear? The Lord is the strength of my life, of whom shall I be afraid? Wait on the Lord, and he shall strengthen thy heart. Wait, I say, on the Lord.'"

What a precious freightage of memory is borne by the 31st Psalm, especially its words, "Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit." It was one of the seven sayings of Jesus on the cross, and the last. It was the parting word of Luther, of Knox, of John Huss, of Jerome of Prague, and of countless more.

Columba of Iona died in 597, repeating the words of the 34th Psalm, "They that seek the Lord shall not want any good thing."

When Queen Louise of Prussia heard the disastrous news from Jena in 1806 she sat down after her first burst of weeping and sang the 37th Psalm at her piano, "Commit thy way unto the Lord, trust also in him, and he shall bring it to pass." When she arose her eye was clear and her spirit calm.

Luther's great hymn, "Ein feste 'Burg ist unser' Gott," is a paraphrase of Psalm 46, which Gustavus Adolphus had his army chant before the battle of Lützen in September, 1631. Psalm 68, "Let God arise and let his enemies be scattered," was Cromwell's battle hymn. It was also sung by Savonarola and his Dominican brethren as they marched to the Grand Piazza of Florence in 1497 to meet the trial of fire, at that spot which is still heaped with flowers on the martyrs' anniversary. But the list is too long for record here. The wealth of such incident is exhaustless. It is sufficient to have pointed out its value and its abundance. The Psalms are the imperishable and priceless possession of believing and devout souls throughout the centuries. They staid the hearts of Maccabaean martyrs amid the persecutions of "Antiochus the Madman." Christians in blood-soaked Roman arenas chanted them as the lions stole out from stone archways for their work of death. Refugees, hiding in German forests or on Scottish highlands, sung them as they watched the approach of their hunters. They are saturated with the tears and triumphs of sorrowing and rejoicing saints. For more than twenty centuries they have been the treasury of devotion for the faithful. For generations and perhaps milleniums yet to come they will be the prized possession of the church. They will last as long as joy endures and long after sorrow has ceased. And may we not believe that they will be sung along with the song of Moses and the Lamb in that region from which the silent dove returning at evening brings us sometimes tidings of a land that eye hath never seen.

It must be confessed that in these meditations only the merest glimpse has been gained of the inexhaustible treasure of sacred thought and experience in this record. The Old Testament has its purposes and its limitations. It is no longer our spiritual guide. It points the way to a better hope and an ampler salvation than it could reveal. Yet its beauty is eternal, and its words still profitable for study, meditation, enjoyment. To an age like ours, eager to find, now and then a moment for repose in a breathless and stressful life, it appears itself as a book rich in treasured prayers and praises. full of consolation and help. If we keep near us for devotional ends the works of Jeremy Taylor and Thomas a Kempis; if we find value in the thoughts of Pascal and the meditations of Tauler: if the spiritual experiences of St. Theresa and Monacha are of value as aids to the holy life, how much more the lives and messages of these holy men of old, who spoke as they were moved by the divine Spirit, and who have joined the choir invisible of these immortal dead who live again in souls made better by their presence, and whose music is the gladness of the world.

A Psalm of the Helpers

THE ways of the world are full of haste and turmoil:
I will sing of the tribe of helpers who travel in peace.

He that turneth from the road to rescue another
Turneth toward his goal:
He shall arrive in due time by the footpath of mercy,
God will be his guide.

He that taketh up the burden of the fainting
Lighteneth his own load:
The Almighty will put his arms underneath him,
He shall lean upon the Lord.

He that speaketh comfortable words to mourners
Healeth his own heart:
In his time of grief they will return to remembrance,
God will use them for balm.

He that careth for the sick and wounded
Watcheth not alone:
There are three in the warkness together,
And the third is the Lord.

Blessed is the way of the helpers:
The companions of the Christ.

Chicago's Secretary Describes Scenes at the Campbell Homestead in Bethany

BY O. F. JORDAN.

We had arrived at old Bethany at night, but the next morning we were astir to see the place. We had been told that the richest part of our journey would be the visit to this place where more of Alexander Campbell's life time was spent than at any other.

We strolled down the main street east past the little post office which distributes the news of the village in lieu of a newspaper. We went on over to the Bethany church, which was the third of our movement to be erected. The pulpit is on the street with the doors of admission on either side. Alexander Campbell used to preach for three hours, and he arranged the church in this way so that none of his audience would have the temerity to leave the house. The church at Wellsburg, going back to the Campbell's days, is arranged in the same manner.

From this point we continued east across the Buffalo Creek. We suppose Bethany students with all their pious traditions are very sedate, but such a creek in other schools would be put to ungodly use as is the creek called the bone-yard at Champaign, where the ardor of Freshmen is annually dampened. The creek has not here enough of beauty to justify the Bethany college song "On the Banks of the Old Buffalo," for it is here too full of rubbish to make even a desirable photograph. Up and down stream, however, it is worthy all the poetic efforts that have been bestowed upon it.

The Campbell Homestead.

Our first pilgrimage we wished to make to the old Campbell homestead. It is a long building that was built in four different parts. Alexander Campbell had fourteen children and it was his jest that he enlarged his house with the growth of his family, which accounts for its size. It was originally the home of the father of his first wife, Mr. Brown, and by the old spring house to the east of the house he did his first courting. In the old house he was married and in it all of his children were born. Here the spirit of the great reformer took its flight. The furniture is much of it fifty and a hundred years old, it being the pride of the house not to change its furnishings.

The Old Study.

In the yard stands the old study. It is a most enticing den with only light from above. On its shelves still stand many of the books used by the Reformer. In this seclusion, it was possible for him to lay the foundations for a scholarship which has probably never been equaled among the Disciples.

The hostess there now is Mrs. Decima Barclay, the only surviving daughter of Alexander Campbell. Her husband represented the government in consular service for many years. He now lives but in the physical and mental decline of old age. She is a charming hostess and received us with the southern hospitality which can nowhere be equaled. In a two hour interview we were given the traditions of the old house.

At one time, two presidents of very opposite tendencies met in this house, Jeff Davis and General Garfield. Mr. Davis brought a son to place in Bethany college. Mrs. Barclay was then a Miss in a boarding school, fifteen years of age. General Garfield was president of Hiram and he asked Mrs. Barclay her opinion of co-educational schools. She bitterly condemned them and quoted a recent newspaper scandal over a Hiram elopement. "That was not as bad as reported," said General Garfield, "I know, for I am president." Mrs. Barclay, or Decima Campbell as she was then, was deeply mortified at her seeming lack of courtesy as she did not know that General Garfield was connected with Hiram, but she adhered to her position with reference to co-educational schools.

Two Keepsakes.

Mrs. Barclay has two very dear keepsakes that she showed us. One was a piece of wood from the old church at Ahorey, Ireland, where Thomas Campbell preached for a number of years. She told us that the old church is still standing as it was a hundred years ago and that there had been but three new pastors since Thomas Campbell's day. She had also a piece of wood from the Luther tree in Germany which had been sent her mother, bearing this inscription, "From the favorite tree of the reformer of the fifteenth century to the wife of the reformer of the nineteenth century."

We were told that Professor Hagerman and wife are touring Europe this summer and that in the course of their travels they will visit the old home of the Campbells in Ireland with camera and note-book. We shall hope that some fresh tidings may be brought us from this visit that will make our understanding of the early life of the Campbells more clear.

Study of Alexander Campbell Standing in the Yard of the Old Home.

The Burying Ground.

It would be the grossest neglect to visit Bethany and not visit the Campbell burying ground. The Campbells were a numerous family. The family of Thomas Campbell came to this country. Alexander Campbell was married twice and had fourteen children. However widely the family traveled, they came home to die. The deciphering of the numerous Campbell tombstones in the burying ground is to study the entire family history.

The tombstone of Alexander Campbell is the best in the family ground, though on the other side of the burying ground are fine shafts erected to the memory of Pendleton, second president of Bethany, and to Richardson, who wrote the memoirs of Campbell, that quite eclipse in glory the monuments of the Campbells. The slab that marks the grave of Thomas Campbell did not cost twenty-five dollars. Probably he would not have cared for any more ornate monument, but as things go, it hardly seems fitting that we should celebrate the centennial of his epoch-making work while he lies by so simple a memorial slab. Even the monument to the memory of Alexander Campbell is not such as a grateful brotherhood would love to erect to its dead.

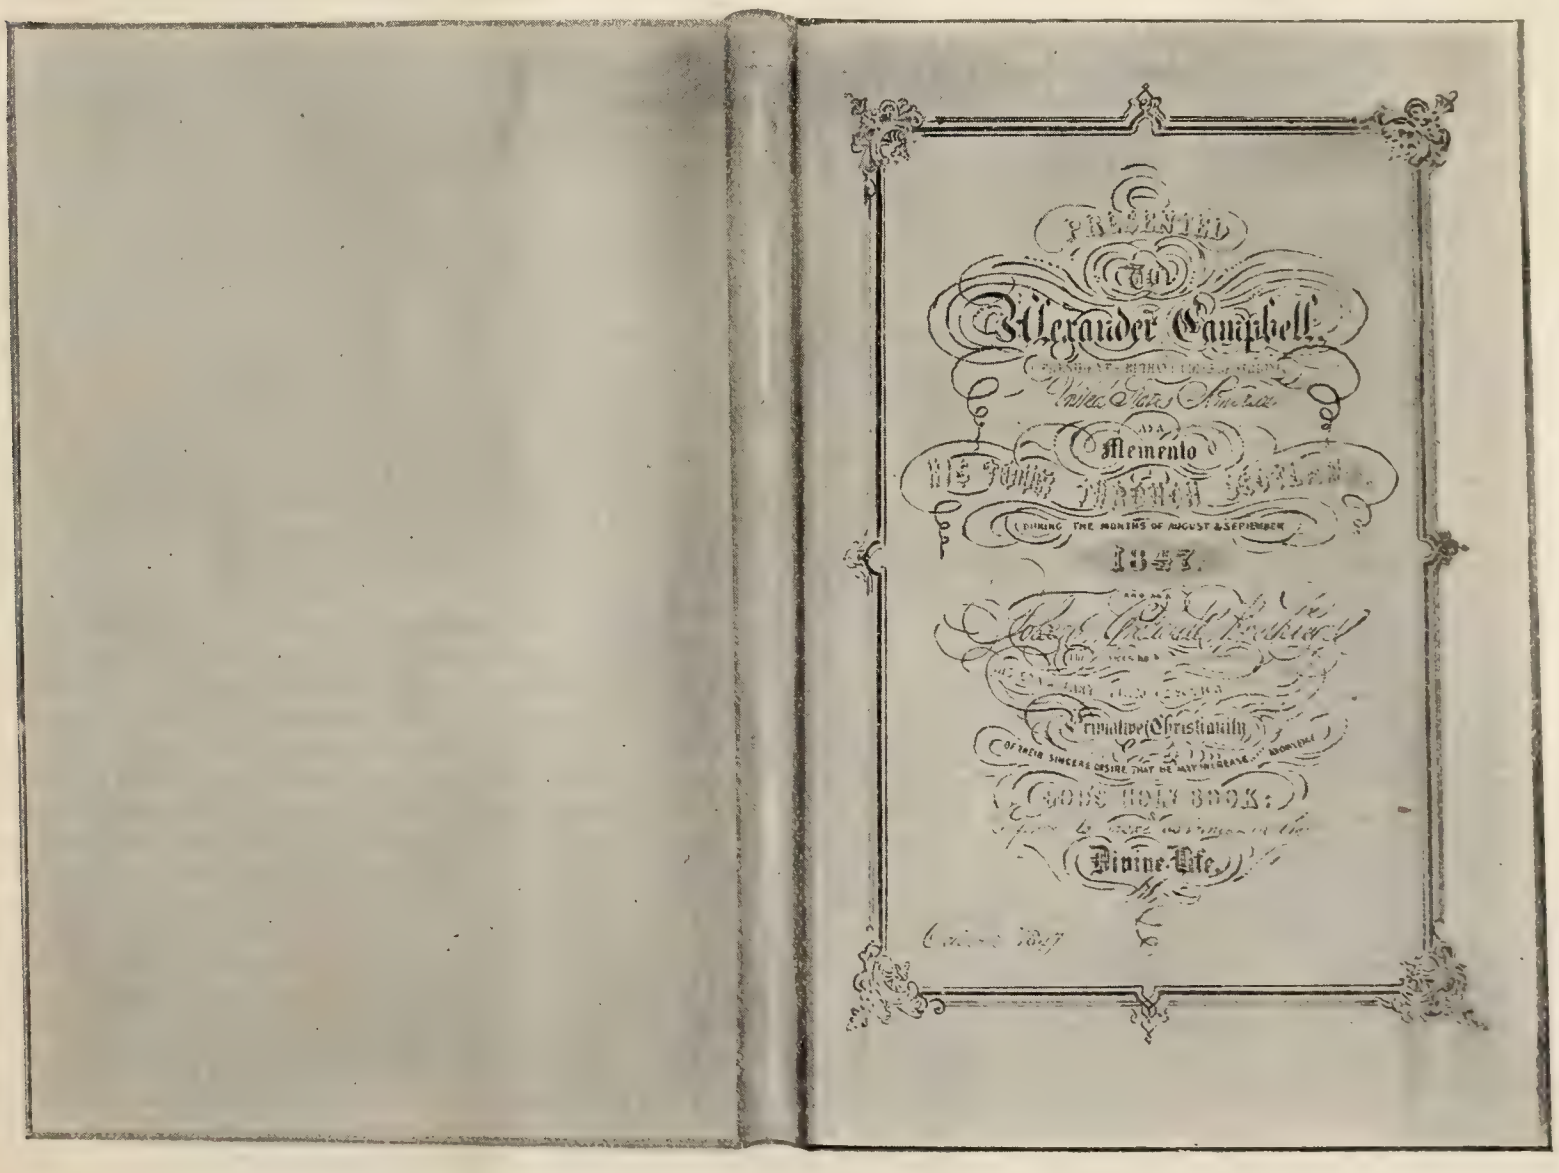
Present Life at Bethany.



We lunched that day in the hall of Bethany college, where seventy summer students refresh the inner man—and woman—for the schoolma'am is here to replenish her stock of knowledge and if not by design, yet by providence, to save the timid theological students from a celibacy that would neither be orthodox nor for the higher effectiveness of their ministry. The light plant was out of order, so they could not study of an evening, but this hardship was being borne with commendable Christian resignation. The evenings were not lost, for moonlight suffices to some tasks.

President Cramblett received us most cordially and spoke hopefully of Bethany's future. Even in the days of the Campbells, the college never had larger attendance and the prospect is that the old mother college will again assume her place of leadership in our educational enterprises.

That afternoon we went over to Wellsburg, W. Va., where the Campbells often preached. Here is the second church which they organized, which was founded in 1823, and the building that stands there now was built in 1848. Mr. Biddle ministers to the church. On the board of deacons is William Campbell, the only surviving son of Alexander Campbell. He is in the real estate business and has one of the most pretentious homes of the community. We interviewed him and secured a sitting for a photograph. He has a son in Chicago who does not seem to be in the church. He is Argyle Campbell and his business is to sell railway supplies. Since our return we have not yet taken time to call and carry the greetings of the father, though we shall do so.

Advice for the Pilgrim.

Thus we have finished our journey over the paths the fathers trod. We made the mistake of attempting the trip in too short a time. Weeks might be spent to great profit. Yet the things we have described can be seen by the pilgrim with limited time in a day or so. A few hours of advice may not be amiss. Travel in a good company. If you wish to travel cheaply. All arrangements for livery and hotel service should be made in advance, with all charges definitely fixed. if you do not wish to fall into the hands of the Philistines who will spoil you of all your goods. It would be a nice trip to go to Bethany one day and leave there the next morning for the drive across to the Wabash railroad at Avella. Pa. The convention goer would be away from Pittsburg two days by this method. The expense would run from three to five dollars per person by this method, depending upon the rate gotten for the livery service.

No trip we have ever taken has so deeply impressed us that we need not be ashamed to be called "Campbellites" in theology, however we may repudiate the term as a designation of church relationship. The Campbells were the religious liberals of their day. They never climbed the cold and barren heights of Unitarianism and always remained sympathetic with the ideals of the evangelicals. Yet they were broader than any company of evangelicals of their day. They anticipated

Vital Questions Discussed in Reply to a Pertinent Letter from J. S. Hughes

Dear Brother Gates: By far the most remarkable sentence in those able and delightful essays on the Disciples is the one in which you classify our divided christendom into the ecclesiastical, the intellectual and the ethical, and assign the Disciples to the ecclesiastical. The cogent reason you give is that they are primarily and dominantly in favor of the union of all believers, as believers now are, into one church. I regret I am compelled to accept this classification which has so deeply impressed me, and its consequences! Alas! But in your last essay, July 15, you express a confidence that the Disciples are capable of the progress which the changing times require, and which excellence no denomination has yet attained to and you cite "the principle of liberty" in which the Disciples came into being, but it was not a liberty that any body gave them, but one they took on occasion and which they offered to others outside far more freely than to those we had once "corralled." Then you cite that our principle of unity is a principle of progress, "seeking a basis common to all churches." In practice, however, the accentuation fell upon points that operated to entirely defeat the first design so much that not one ever the least sect has ever been induced to stand with us on this so-called common ground. We had fought and torn them all "daughters of the scarlet woman" and the writer can not entirely dispute the twit nor that a new sister has in ourselves been added to the family by adaptation to the times of sectdom.

Now my point of inquiry is where and when did an ecclesiastical establishment like ours ever move itself out of the column of the ecclesiastical into that of the ethical? Though you may mean that progress means only intellectual or educational "adaptation" and it is just here that I fear our roads fall apart, for the Christianity that I believe in is the ethical and is camparatively indifferent to the ecclesiastical and the intellectual which admit of change.

I am not aware that any so-called Christian body has ever lifted itself out of the intellectual or the ecclesiastical into the moral column, or that it was psychologically possible. Which one has ever led in a great moral reform? The colleges representing the intellectual and the Roman and other state churches and ourselves representing the ecclesiastical have never stood to the front of any great moral regeneration. To make it plain let me suppose that all the churches of your state, Illinois, should on this Sunday declare that "henceforth we stand united on the ground occupied by the Disciples" what would I find to be the status, in a year hence, of the tyranical trusts, what would be the condition of the liquor craft, or of any other organized iniquity? What record has the Disciple brotherhood made that would guarantee by their ascendancy the downfall of political corruption or organized greed, or of any other sin and crime against society? or that righteousness would now reign? "Progress"? Yes, that is a great sweet word and the ideal of my heart, but is any so-called Christian denomination in line for "the kingdom of God," ourselves or any other; and can you tell how we can progress toward that goal by the scientific fact of "evolution," or the ecclesiastical temporizing of federation? I wish you to help me to enjoy the hope that our Disciples can be moved out of the groove of "Churchianity" into the free open highway of "the kingdom of God" and his righteousness, in Jesus Christ, first-born, from the dead, the "Prince of the Kings of the earth." I am sure there are many in like need with myself.

If we are to progress in intellectualism or ecclesiasticism, without the other great change I had rather join the blue grass brethren and go the whole length of ecclesiasticide. All the talk of Christian union under the present low standard of morals is to me revolting and I pray it may not be. We have one Roman church and that is enough.

It seems to me that all the great essentials to the kingdom of heaven put all our churches out of date and that a new slate must be made. "Liberty and freedom!" Yes, but in practice it is the liberty to engage in any selfish avaricious custom of the day. The church that has always accepted the form of government under which it existed as its own and that now takes its commercial morality from the level of the corrupt mart of the world, and that always copies its theology from the philosophy of the academy and calls it "progress"; if you see my dilemma and feel it then tell me how to share in your hope that they who say "once a Disciple, always a Disciple" can be expected to form anew and get into line for the conversion of the world and the kingdom of God?

We have ecclesiastical heretics now like our federating sisters, but our moral corruptionists are not reckoned among these nor do the Disciples, any more than they, praise and exalt its men who lead in the overthrow of the liquor power or other works of the devil that war against the kingdom of heaven.

Possessed now of such worldly spirit and power and making a great crusade to Pittsburg to display our numbers in a Dowie fashion, how can you hope to turn us back toward the purer days and plastic state of being newly emancipated from the worn-out sectdoms of the past. Give me hope.

Jasper Seaton Hughes.

Dear Bro. Hughes: You are evidently conscious, as I was, of the incompleteness of that series of studies on "The Disciples and Future Progress." I closed the series with a statement of the "principles of progress" embodied in their fundamental plea for Liberty, Unity, and Loyalty. I did not inquire, as I now propose to do, in response to your communication, into the capacity or the genius of the Disciples for progress.

Principles and Practice.

Sometimes the principles of a religious movement are better than its practice, as you intimate concerning the Disciples. I am disposed to agree with you as far as some Disciples are concerned, but not with reference to all of them. I know some Disciples who are trying to be as good as the noble principles they have inscribed on their banner: and I can point to men through all their history who have not only proclaimed, but have practiced liberty, unity and loyalty. There have been, and there are still, all kinds of Disciples. Some are as good as their principles; others are a disgrace to them. And strangely enough, both profess to be equally sincere in their devotion to "the plea." One understands "the plea" on way; another understands it differently.

Evidence of Progress.

The best evidence that the Disciples have, the capacity for progress, as well as the principles, is the fact that they have made progress. I notice, as I read the history of the movement, that the Disciples have always come out at last on the right side. During the hundred years of their history they have grown. I speak now of the major part of the body. The lesser part has been smitten with atavism. Their face was turned toward the past. They could not go forward without getting away from "the fathers." The dead hand of the past lies heavily upon them. Look at them now; they have all the appearance of early nineteenth century Disciples. They look, and act, and talk, and dress like Alexander Campbell in the days of the Christian Baptist. If there are any "Campbellites" left in the world these are the ones. If Campbell were here today, he would be the least flattered by them. They forget that to be as good as Campbell we must be better; and to be like him, we must be different.

Difference From the Fathers, an Honor.

I have no quarrel with these dear brethren, when they prove out of the writings of Alexander Campbell that they are following him more closely than the body that have adopted missionary societies, Sunday schools, organs, and all other modern helps in the work and worship of the church. They may have all the comfort that comes from resemblance to Campbell, with my full consent. To them it is their glory: to me it would be my shame. I have never been seized with any passionate longing to look like any one of my remote ancestors. Even if we cannot all agree to the Darwinian hypothesis as to our earliest ancestors, we still can agree that the most of us had for progenitors men and women who ran wild in the forests of Northern Europe or Briton. The glory of the greater part of the Disciples today is (and this is the hope of their future) that they have departed from the fathers. I should despair of them if they had not; just as I should dispair of the American if he had not departed from his Anglo-Saxon fathers, in customs, religious faith, and disposition. Yet we are the lineal descendants of these same natural and religious fathers. We, their rightful successors and heirs, do them no dishonor—it is no crime—to be unlike them. They would be different—they would choose to be so from their former selves if they were here now.

A Departure From the Fathers.

The most far-reaching departure from the fathers, made by the Disciples in the hundred years of their progress, was the gradual change which came over their conception of primitive Christianity. At bottom this is the meaning of the present conflict between the progressives and conservatives, the liberals and the loyalists. Primitive Christianity was at first defined by Alexander Campbell as an "order of things." It was inevitable that it was so when we reflect upon the guiding purpose of the movement, which was to relate all believers to each other harmoniously in one organization. It was the organized expression of Christianity to which they gave attention in the New Testament. They used the motto, "where the Scriptures speak, we speak," to ascertain the primitive terms of fellowship, of worship, and church organization. These were the elements of primitive Christianity that interested them preeminently, and concerning which the Scriptures were found to speak. This was the selective purpose—to find an authoritative basis of fellowship and worship—and this was the guiding principle—to practice in the church only such customs as were practiced in the primitive church. The emphasis was upon the external order, and the letter of the Scripture was the decisive test.

A New Discovery.

The Disciples did not hold permanently by this principle. It was soon found that the Scriptures did not speak alone concerning Christian fellowship and ecclesiastical organization; they also spoke concerning Christian life and duty, and missionary service. It was a half century before the Disciples discovered the first part of the great commission—"Go ye into all the world." It is now seen to be as emphatic and important as the second part—"baptizing them." But where they awake to this new speech of Scripture concerning missionary service, they still thought the Scriptures ought to have a speech to guide them in the method of doing missionary work. They soon discovered that there was only one plan laid down in the New Testament and that was the plan of personal effort, such as in Paul's missionary journeys. The anti-society party were right—there is no new Testament precept or example for missionary societies.

What should be done? Missionary work must be carried on, but it could not be carried on successfully after the New Testament plan. There was but one thing to do, and that was to transform the principle of the literal authority of Scripture into the spiritual, and claim the spirit of the New Testament for missionary societies when "expressed terms and approved precedent" could not be cited. This mighty revelation of the Disciples in their relation to the New Testament which has made possible one of the most glorious chapters in their later history, was led and fought through by Isaac Errett. It resulted in a cleavage within the body which has widened into a permanent division. The anti-party stands upon the old basis of the movement, giving consistent respect and authority to the letter of Scripture, while the missionary party has found new basis in the spiritual authority of Scripture.

The Progressive Instinct.

It was the making of the Disciples. It represented the progressive instinct of the movement as expressed in its principle of liberty. It also marks the transition of the Disciples to a new doctrinal era. The first doctrinal period was created by the apotheosis of the letter of Scripture. The letter of Scripture was the authority that bound the conscience in the external organization of the church, as well as in Christian conduct; but it was also the material medium which enslaved the Holy Spirit. The "word-alone theory" of the operation of the Spirit was a logical deduction from the early identification of the "Word of God" with the written letter of Scripture. It began to be said among the Disciples that the Holy Spirit probably operated upon the soul apart from the Word.

Steps of Progress.

This was emancipation on behalf of progress, and the Disciples quickly took up the movement forward. They adopted missionary societies, instruments of music, and a nobler architecture. One forbidden help after another, from the apostate religious world, was taken up and found to be good and useful. The vicious dualism between things "of faith" and "of sin," scarcely less vicious and deadening than the ancient dualism between things "sacred" and things "secular," began to be overcome. While now in the larger body of the Disciples the old warfare over "innovations" is no longer matter of concern, scarcely of memory.

Spiritual Authority of Scripture.

The Disciples have settled once for all that it is not the letter but the spirit of Scripture to which they are bound; this is the Word of God. More or less stir is occasionally made by small leaders in the ranks over the big and little "d," or the name of the minister, or the priority of faith and repentance; but these manufactured windstorms soon spend their force against the solid body of the united brotherhood, and a great calm ensues. We are just now sailing out into a great calm after the storm over the "Centennial program."

Don't get discouraged with the Disciples, Brother Hughes; they are moving. They are a "party of progress" as Alexander Campbell characterized them in the beginning. They have the principles of a progressive movement, and I feel sure that they have the capacity and instinct as well. Their history bears witness to it in more ways than one. Of course they make progress against some reactionaries and in the face of strong opposition; but such progress is all the healthier and stronger. Have you ever noticed in your reading of our history that we have never been without the advanced party of progress? We are always sending out heralds and scouts into the new land, in larger or smaller companies. Robert Richardson, L. L. Pinkerton, Isaac Errett, Alexander Procter, were some of the leaders of these pioneers of progress.

The Disciples have never been without an advanced guard prospecting the way ahead. The interesting thing is that the body finally comes up with the advance wing. Do we not now have as progressive spirits among us as any other religious people on earth? And is there not large enough liberty among the Disciples to permit the widest difference of opinion? The Disciples have men, not a few, who are working their way into all the new fields of modern thought and method. We have men who as thinkers, teachers, or pastors, are as up-to-date as the most modern. And they are Disciples. I am happy to say: tolerated as Disciples. The time has come when it is possible for a man to be an evolutionist, and a Disciple; or a higher critic. He can even be both of these things and be a teacher in some of our colleges or pastor of some of our churches.

A New Forward Movement.

The Disciples as a whole have not stagnated; they have not crystallized around the ideas of Alexander Campbell. When the time comes for them to move over from emphasis upon the purely external, and ecclesiastical conception of Christianity to the spiritual and ethical, they will move; and the movement will be no more revolutionary than the transition from the literal to the spiritual authority of the New Testament under Isaac Errett. Preparation for this new transition is already going on through the mighty influences of university and press. The great books that our ministers are reading and the lessons our high schools, colleges and universities are teaching are alike emphasizing the inwardness of true religion and the social goal of the Kingdom of God.

Could you ask for anything more assuring than this? The Disciples can no more resist this tide of influence in the modern world than the earth can resist the influence of the sun. They can do but one thing to avert it, and that would be to shut up their ministry behind the walls of a cloister, and forbid them the reading of books and conversation with human beings. Even the Roman Catholic Church has not been able to escape this influence with all her surveillance of the training and reading of her ministry. But even if the ministry could be protected from it, the people would yet be open to it and take it in with every breath they breathe. It is a world movement, as all-encompassing and pervading as the atmosphere. Our danger is that the transformation shall be accomplished, and we shall have no part in it.

There is a power not ourselves making for emphasis upon the spiritual and ethical; the very stars in their courses are fighting for spiritual religion.

I shall address myself to other points in your letter in subsequent studies.

True Egotists—Real Altruists

By F. B. Sapp

There is a class of people who place but little, if any, value upon themselves. They are the driftwood of society; they have no particular object or aim in life. In the strata above this class is the common place egotist who, in the process of development, has become conscious of the ego or self, to himself wonderful because he is a new birth of Spirit which must be felt and appreciated by others. He is like the child who, by chance, touches the chords of a great instrument: strange sounds fill its ears and it strikes the chords again and calls to its playmates to come and listen. The period of harmony has not yet come—only wonder—and all other children must stand aside and admire the child who is trying to get harmony out of self. This is the creature that society knows as the egotist. The nobler egotism rises with the tide of self consciousness and power.

The Larger Egoist.

As the ego passes on in development, it becomes conscious of power that it is certain that others must share the same views of life and things in general, so "We" is substituted for "I," but bears its own apology of weakness like the new leader of men and movements, when none too certain that they will obey because he is fearful that a higher Destiny may overrule his actions. A world-spirit like Cromwell, could Command—and Parliament adjourned; and parliament assembled at his will. His egotism had become so large and well trained that there was no more likelihood of being called an egotist than there is of regarding the giant of the forest a small shrub.

It has become so large that it can afford to defy the winds and be looked at because it is worth more to man than when a mere sapling. The larger and the more genuine the appreciation of self, the larger the sense of gratitude and the sense of dependence and obligation to others.

The Eternal Spirit said, I AM THAT I AM. The philosopher said: "I think, therefore I am." God himself is the EGO from whom all things proceed. The glory of all His work was the creation of man made in the image of God.

Man, the Measure.

The Ego is man's standard of appreciation of all things. He who tells the world what "common sense" is, gives merely his own and best interpretation of intelligence applied to the affairs of life. He who praises the beauty of the sunrise or sunset, the glory of the mountains, the majesty of the cataract, the swelling of the boundless tides, the stately forest, the broad, sweeping plain, the roving herd, the ripening grain,—he it is who tells of the beauty in his own soul which but mirrors the beauty of Nature. In the degree the mirror is perfected, the images reflected therefrom will be true to Nature and life. Music, science, art, philosophy, literature and all things are judged by the self standard.

God himself to the sensuous is gross, jealous, revengeful. It is given to the pure in heart only to see God. The Son beheld him and came forth from the bosom of the Father to declare him. The prophets of all times regarded themselves more than worms of the dust when they came forth to stand before Kings and Princes and rebuke the sins of the rulers and the nations. When God called, one of the greatest responded, "Here am I, send me." Self love and appreciation is the Divine standard God has given man by which to measure his responsibility to others: "Love thy neighbor as thyself." "Do unto men as ye would that men do unto you."

Place of the Egoist.

Were there no egoists, there would be no generals to command, no statesmen, no reformers, no preachers, no lawyers, physicians, teachers, inventors, musicians, artists, sculptors, poets, philosophers, but society would sink to the low level of chaotic stagnation. No man ever sinks to the depths of degredation until he has fallen in his own estimate. Self pride, family pride, national pride, will keep men and nations in the line of progress. The great apostle to the Gentiles used the pronoun "I" more frequently than any other writer of the New Testament, in fact, more frequently than all others.

On the other hand, his labors for humanity were more far reaching and eternity alone can measure his worth to humanity.

Pericles, Caesar, Peter the Great, Wilhelm, Cromwell, Napoleon, Washington, Gladstone, Lincoln and on down to our time the men who have struck fire out of the flinty rock have been the men who in their day were the noble egotists. Like Athenasius of old, they dared to stand against the world.

A Flower Lady

My dress is made of satin;
I come when skies are blue.
And in the sunny meadows,
I wait and watch for you.

I know you love me dearly,
For when you take me up,
I hear your voice exclaiming,
"Why here's a buttercup!"—Ex.

The Dishes

Somebody did't wipe the dishes dry!
How do I know? Because I saw them cry.
Yes, crying as they sat upon the shelves.
I saw them and they couldn't help themselves.
They made no noise; each plate was in its place,
But oh, two tears were on the platter's face!
Oh, don't you think a little girl is mean
Whose dishes cry because they're not wiped clean.

Barefoot's Outing

By Ernest Gilmore.

He was little and thin and young and poor, but—could you have seen him—you would have felt attracted. There was a look in his big brown eyes that would have made your own misty without knowing why. The look in the big brown eyes meant that he was lonely—almost insufferably lonely. He could have cried aloud but he did not. He leaned on his elbow, his chin in his palm, looking out of the small attic window. There was no consolation in what he saw, house tops and chimneys with puffs of lingering smoke and a tired face or faces at upper windows here and there. All that he could see of the sky was a faraway streak. "Oh," his young soul cried out, "Oh, if I could go! If I only could! I've never been anywhere!"

It was time he was asleep—half past ten—but it was "too hot to sleep," he told himself wearily when his head began to droop. At last, however, he threw himself down—from utter weariness—on the old mattress on the floor, and—not thinking of consequences—cried aloud.

Some one rapped on the partition wall.

"Hey!" called a voice, "What's up? What ye cryin' for?"

The boy did not answer, but he stopped crying. He recognized the voice as that of a rag peddler whom he often saw going in and out and who occupied the attic room next to his own. Presently the attic door opened softly and the peddler came in.

"What's up? What ye crying fer?" he repeated, and then added, "Are ye sick?"

"No, I ain't sick, I'm lonesome."

"Lonesome?"

"Yes, that's it; I'm lonesome."

"What makes you lonesome?" asked the old rag peddler wonderingly, reaching out a hand in the darkness to softly stroke the small tousled head.

"There's a lot of 'em going off somewhere tomorrow to have such good times, and I can't go."

"Why can't ye go?"

"I ain't got a ticket, so I can't go. They can't take everybody, so Sam Smith says, but I ain't everybody. I'm just little Ben, that's all."

"Of course, you ain't everybody," comforted the man, "you're just little Ben, an orphan child. Where be all them goin' tomorrow?"

"I don't just remember where they said, but wherever it is there are birds singing and green grass and blue sky."

"And so you want to go where there's birds singin' and green grass growin'—do you?"

"Oh, yes; I want ter go awfully."

"Then come right on now. We'll start this minute."

"Sir," cried the boy, on his feet in a minute, "start for where?"

"Fer them green fields and singing birds and blue skies."

Presently the hot attic room was a thing of the past as far as Ben was concerned. He and the rag man had left the tenement and were moving slowly through the slums—on—on—on slowly but surely toward the land of birds and green grass and blue skies.

By half-past eleven they were out of the city—by twelve they were in the country. Ben was tired but happier than he had ever been in his life—more tired, too, I might say, for he was not accustomed to long tramps or to late hours.

"We can't go any further tonight," said the rag man as they came across a green field sweet with the scent of clover. "We'll just lie down here."

Ben fell asleep about as soon as he lay down and the rag man was not far behind. Under the starlight with the clover-springled turf their bed, they slept past the sweet early dawn. The sunlight, beating down on their uncovered faces, awakened them almost simultaneously. They blinked their eyes as they sat up and looked at each other. The old rag man was the first to speak. He chuckled as he questioned with a grim smile:

"Well, how do you like your outing as far as you've gone?"

"Oh," was the boy's response as he sprang to his feet and looked around admiringly, "I love it. I could stay here forever if I could find something to eat. But I'm awfully hungry, ain't you?"

The rag man was on his feet.

"I'm hungry enough," he answered kindly, "but I won't get anything to eat till I get back to my old attic room. I'm goin' back now. Good-by!"

"Oh, don't go," begged little Ben, "I'd be lonesome again if you'd leave me."

The old man gave a grunt of pleasure. Passing his wrinkled hand with a caressing touch over Ben's head, he said:

"You won't be lonesome. See that house over there?" pointing to one not far off.

"Yes."

"Well, there's where the salt of the world lives."

The boy looked bewildered.

"Eh!" he exclaimed, "What's that, 'the salt of the world?'"

The old man laughed.

"I'm talkin' about the folks—I know 'em. I call 'em the 'salt of the world' 'cause they're so good—good as gold. I'm goin' to start you on your 'outing'—don't you see? Now I'll be off, and you go right there—do you understand?"

"P'raps they'll drive me off."

"Don't you believe it; they ain't that kind. Jess tell 'em you're hungry—that's enough."

Presently they had parted, the rag man going cityward, the "barefoot" slowly but surely approaching the home of the "salt of the world."

The boy was hungry, ravenously hungry, and yet he had eyes for the beautiful scene that confronted him. He could not have told his feelings to anyone; he did not even understand them himself, but at sight of the comfortable-looking farm house in its environment of green fields, flowers and trees, something stirred within him that had never stirred before; making his face glow.

"God must live around here somewhere," he told himself joyfully.

It was all quiet in front of the house at this early morning hour. There was no one in sight. No one heard him open and close the white front gate. No one heard the patter of his small bare feet on the dewy, violet-sprinkled grass as he followed a path that led around the house. All at once there burst upon his sight a domestic scene such as he had never imagined. A sunny-faced man sat on the threshold of an open doorway, over which climbing roses were blooming. A tiny girl—not over three—rioted over him, rumpling his hair, hugging him around his neck with her bare, chubby arms, and kissing him on his forehead, cheeks and even his nose.

"Go away, you little rogue!" he called laughingly, as he broke loose from the encircling little arms and arose to his feet, "didn't you hear mamma say that breakfast was ready? Come on, your chariot is all ready, don't you see?"

The "chariot" was his shoulders. He lifted her into it gently and carried her inside. "Barefoot" watched them wistfully, but they did not see him. The door still stood open invitingly after the father and child had disappeared, but the boy did not approach it. He stood still in the same spot where he had been when the sweet picture dawned upon him. The branches of a big tree waved over him. The birds were singing to him. Over in a meadow cows were moving about knee deep in clover. On the hillside beyond there were sheep and lambs. Presently he heard light laughter issuing from the house, the laughter of the happy child. It was the sweetest sound he had ever heard. He stood on one foot and then on the other, not moving away from the spot. His legs were still tired from his long tramp but he did not mind that, he was thinking of the "salt of the world," the folks who were "good as gold."

It seemed a good while, but in reality it was only a short time before the child reappeared in the doorway and, catching sight of him, called out:

"Come, papa! Come, mamma! Here's a pitty boy come to see me. Come in to befuss, pitty boy!"

"Barefoot" was smiling upon her, but he did not speak. It was wonderful what happened then, or so it seemed to "Barefoot." He was too young and ignorant to know how his looks and his simple story appealed to the "salt of the world." They seemed to read him like a book, read his wan, thin face, with his beautiful, wistful brown eyes, read his hunger and his homelessness and his need. They did not doubt his story, how he had cried out in the night because he was so lonesome and how the rag man had heard him and brought him there—almost to their very doorstep and left him there because he said they were "good as gold."

"The salt of the world!"—"Good as gold!" Was the good old ragman right? It seemed so. The farmer and his wife looked at the boy and then at each other with misty eyes and, in a moment, almost in the "twinkling of an eye," the beautiful story was over.

The "hungry" was "fed," the "naked" was "clothed," the "stranger" was "taken in."

"You aren't going to keep the boy all the time, are you?" questioned a friend of the farmer's a few days later.

The farmer laughed in his genial way.

"Keep him?" he repeated, "of course, we're going to keep him. Didn't our good Father in heaven guide the little fellow right to our door?"—The American Boy.

The Old-Time Religion

FRANK L. STANTON IN THE ATLANTA CONSTITUTION.

I.

To a "old religion" feller they are talkin' strange today:
The doctrine some are preachin' leads the old-time world astray;
The scientific preachers claim we've got the Gospel wrong,
An' we're losin' time a-singin' of the Halleluia song.

II.

We pinned our faith to Noah, an' we give him hymns o' praise,
But they say he never stood it forty nights an' forty days;
No doubt he was a good one, with faith an' courage strong,
But no man in a circus looks at animals that long.

III.

An' as fer ol' Methuselah, they 'low it wasn't so:
No man would live a thousand years to watch the country grow;
An' Moses in the rushes—no sense in that they see:
Suppose the tide had riz up then,—oh, whar would Moses be ?

IV.

If Joshua told the sun to stop high in the sky that day,
He must have had no money, an' the gas bill was to pay;
If the sun had listened to him—so the science folk allow—
An' stopped fer his commandin', why, we wouldn't be here now!

V.

An' Jonah—well, he dreamed it ! It's a old-time fishin'-tale
Of the Ananias fellers who of minnows make a whale;
If Jonah'd lived to tell it in our day, he'd git the rub:—
They'd make him secretary of the Ananias Club.

VI.

That's jest the way they talk it; they rend Salvation's robe;
They scatter dust on Adam, an' they won't make friends with Job;
But—glory, halleluia ! still the old-time sky's in view,
An' still the old-time people hold the old-time Gospel true !

VII.

Halleluia on the hilltop, halleluia on the plain,
To the Lord that sends the sunshine an' the rivers of the rain !
Halleluia—all believers on this terrestrial globe:
I pin my faith to Joshua an' I'm closest kin to Job !

VIII.

In spite o' this strange talkin' in the valley, on the hill,
The lamp that guides our walkin' is the old religion still !
To the sweet fields of Eden it'll lead from Jordan's banks,
Till we march right into Heaven from the halleluia ranks.

A Prayer

By R. G. Campbell.

(Preceding a recent sermon in the City Temple, London.)

Our Heavenly Father, it is a strange and bewildering world wherein Thou hast placed us to beat the music out; a world full of sacred and solemn mystery; yet a world full of sad and dreadful things. Thou hast shown us much of winsome beauty in human life and experience, whereof we are glad; and Thou hast brought us face to face with things dark and terrible: and there is that within us—our ignorance, our folly—that has made us add to the dark and terrible, too often at the expense of the beauty and the light. We have lived so much by one another's weakness, have added so much to one another's want and sorrow, and have missed life ourselves in doing it. Oh, our Father, how often have we taken the wrong turning, how many wrong turnings before we found the right! We are doing it still. God put us in a better mind, give to us a nobler spirit, that we may live by contributing to one another's strength, and making weakness confident of kindness and forbearance ad the willing grant of good. Give to us to see more plainly wherein our good consists. Help us that, instead of looking so much upon our own things, we may learn to look upon the things of others, to look with kindlier eyes upon a brother's fault, with clearer vision upon a brother's need; and in so doing help us to realize, our Father, the mystic oneness of the children of God, the unity of the spirit in the bond of peace. We pray for all anxious people who have found their way here. We pray for all who are disturbed and apprehensive concerning what may be and have good reason to dread the dawn of tomorrow. We think of the people who see so little of happiness, and people who think they know what it is and don't; those who are ashamed of what is ignoble in themselves but do not know how to transform it, and those whose chief trouble is that they are lonely, isolated, shut up to their own concerns. Oh, our Father, we ask that the Spirit of Christ may take possession of us one and all, that these fears and all their concomitants of misery may go, and that we may realize that we are here not to serve ourselves, but in going forth from ourselves help us to know that we have found the true self, rendering the best self-service. Knit us together in brotherly love; do not permit that we profess it with the lip only; grant that in the language of our deeds our kinship to Thee may be manifest. So shall we bring glory to Thy name and good to our own souls. We ask it through Christ our Lord. Amen.

Woman's Sphere

—Mrs. Catherine Lent Stevenson, president of the World's Woman Christian Temperance Union, is touring in China, where her work is said to be highly approved.

—The Women's Anglo-German Friendship Union is a London organization formed to help conquer the feeling of distrust between England and Germany by means of receptions and dinners at which German visitors will be the guests of honor. The first meeting was held at the house of Mrs. Lloyd-George. Many society women were present, who promised always to show German visitors what "old fashioned English hospitality means."

—Mrs. Taft has just received an edition de luxe of the memoirs of the elder Count Bernstorff, who was Bismarck's first ambassador in London after Prussia had been absorbed in the German empire.

—Mrs. Herbert Parsons was Elsie Worthington Clews before her marriage and received her degree of doctor of philosophy at Barnard College in 1899, filling a lecturer's chair there for four years thereafter. She enjoyed a good social position, but was nevertheless so interested in questions of sociology that she gave much of her time to it. She continued to lecture after her marriage until her husband was elected to congress, and she has been of much help to him in his political work.

CHAPTER VI (Continued).

But Pierre was too perturbed to be convinced by her words. Slipping off his boots, he crept softly upstairs and stood by her bed. She was sleeping, but the sleep was a troubled one. The childish brow was marked with pain, the blue-veined hands were closed tightly together.

"Daddy! daddy!" she murmured in her sleep. "Oh! daddy, I am so frightened!"

"Thou needn't be, ma petite," murmured the Frenchman softly; "thou needn't be. Pierre will guard thee with his life, come what may."

"La pauvre petite ange!" whispered Jeannette's voice over his shoulder, whither she had followed him. "She still dreams of the wreck."

Then, as Pierre tip-toed himself out of the room, she turned on him a sarcastic face.

"You thought I had allowed her to be carried away, eh? You couldn't trust Jeannette Hendry, you! Bah! what it is to be a man!" Then something in Pierre's face startled her; she caught him by the arm. "Tell, quick, what is the matter? Did you find the lady?"

Pierre shook his head. "She is dead," he returned in a dull tone.

"Dead!"

"Died six weeks ago."

Jeannette's jaw dropped. "And what are you to do with the child?"

They had reached the kitchen, and she stood facing him. Pierre's somber eyes looked fixedly into the heart of the glowing fire, but he said nothing.

"Don't you know anything of those belonging to her?"

"Only that she has grandparents, but where——?" Pierre's shoulders went up to his ears, and then his head sank on his breast in thought.

"Mais, quel dommage!" exclaimed Jeannette, raising hands and eyes to the ceiling in her perplexity.

Catching sight of her husband, she went out and whispered the disastrous new to him. He followed her back to the kitchen, and there they both stood gazing in hopeless perplexity at Pierre, whose head was buried now in his hands.

Suddenly the Frenchman sprang to his feet. His cheek was flushed, a bright light shone in his eyes.

"The papers—the roll of papers that he gave to me to give to Miss Barrington! I can at least open them and see if any mention is made of the home of her grandparents."

He made a rush to where his wet coat still hung near the stove to dry. With quick fingers he turned the breast pocket inside out. The purse fell out and some of the money rolled along the floor, but Pierre paid no heed to it. His eyes were starting out of their sockets; his honest brown face was pale beneath its sunburn.

"The papers—the roll of papers!" he gasped. "Where are they?"

"I have removed nothing," said Jeannette, coming to his side. "Let me see; go away; you are clumsy."

Into one pocket after another she dived her nimble fingers, and at last was fain to look up in as great dismay as Pierre.

"They must have fallen into the water," exclaimed the innkeeper.

"Ah! Pierre, that is a loss," cried Jeannette; then, "No matter, you must get the police to help you in finding out her grandparents."

"Never!" exclaimed Pierre almost fiercely. "That I never will. What! play into Monsieur Densham's hand! He will answer their inquiries, and swear black is white that the child belongs to him. No, no, I will be true to her father in not letting him know where she is. I shall keep her by me"—doggedly—"until I find her people."

"Keep her! But how?"

"She can travel with me as I go along with my troupe."

Jeannette held up her hands in mute dismay. "The idea of the man! Take that child along with you? A child that has never known a rough life!—a child that has been brought up as delicately as she has!"

"I'll see that her living will not be rough," returned Pierre in the same dogged tone. "Every farthing from that purse will be put to her use." He began mechanically to pick up the stray pieces that had fallen to the floor. "It will last a long time with care, and when it is finished the bon Dieu above will perhaps have led us to the home of her grandparents."

Jeannete shrugged her shoulders. "You know not what you undertake," she said.

But at that moment a cry from Camilla's room was heard. Jeannete darted from the kitchen and flew up the stairs.

CHAPTER VII.

Camilla Finds Friends.

Camilla was sitting up in bed, looking pale and frightened.

"Daddy! Daddy! Oh, where is daddy?" she cried, the tears raining down her white face.

In a twinkling Jeannette had lifted her out of the bed and was sitting down with her on her lap.

"Jeannette will dress you, cherie, and give you some breakfast——" she was beginning.

But Camilla interrupted her with a wild cry of, "The ship—and the water—and daddy! Oh! oh!"

With soft touches the Frenchwoman stroked the golden hair. "Remember you anything of the ship last night, mon ange?" she asked gently.

A shiver went through Camilla's whole frame. She hid her face on the good woman's shoulder.

"I remember everything—everything," she whispered in a voice choked with sobs. "Didn't daddy have—time to leave—the ship?"

"Remember you how ill he was,' pursued the Frenchwoman softly; "how he coughed; how sunken his cheeks were; how he shivered with the cold?"

Camilla nodded, unable to speak. "Daddy was like that a long time," she said at length between her tears. "He seemed to get worse and worse; but he thought he would get better if we came to England. And now—and now——" The child fell into a passion of weeping.

"And now," said Jeannette still more softly, "now he coughs no more; now he shivers no more; now he suffers no more. In a word, mon ange, he is quite well."

"Well!" Camilla started from the good woman's knee. "He is well?"

"He is quite, quite well, and the good God has taken him to live above the blue sky. The bon Dieu wanted him. He called for him when the vessel went down, and monsieur your father was pleased to go."

"No! no!" cried Camilla passionately, "he was not pleased. He couldn't have been pleased if I wasn't with him. Daddy and I—Daddy and I—we were always together. Why didn't God call for me too?"

"Because He wasn't ready for you; because it wasn't time for you to go. But when it is time the bon Dieu will have a place for you quite close to monsieur your father, where you will never be parted from him. Will not that content ma petite? And, in the meantime——"

Jeannette paused. She did not know what would happen in the meantime.

Camilla sobbed on, her little frame growing weaker and weaker, till at length she lay back in the Frenchwoman's arms quite exhausted.

"I had no one but daddy," she said at length; "no one but daddy."

"No mother?" questioned Jeannette kindly.

"No; mother died a long time ago. Daddy and I were always together."

"No grandparents?" asked Jeannette quietly.

Camilla lifted large grey eyes and looked at her. "Yes, I have a grandfather and a grandmother."

"And where do they live, cherie?" asked the Frenchwoman coaxingly.

Camilla shook her head. "I don't know."

"Think, cherie. Did monsieur your father never say anything to you about where they lived in England?"

"I think not; I don't remember. We were to go to their house, and daddy was to get quite well. But—but it doesn't matter now; daddy is not here to get well."

She hid her face again on Jeannette's shoulder, and the kind little woman patted her and called her by a thousand endearing names, till at length Camilla's sobs grew fainter.

"You never saw them, then?" asked Jeannette after a pause, thinking that her brother's quest might be even more difficult than they thought.

"No, never. There was only daddy and me; no one else."

"A Monsieur Densham, perhaps?" said the Frenchwoman insinuatingly.

Camilla shook her head. "I don't remember," she said wearily.

"Jeannette will trouble you no more, ma cherie," said the Frenchwoman kissing her cheek softly, "after you have told her whether you remember a Frenchman who carried you off the ship last night?"

A spark of brightness shone in Camilla's wet eyes.

"That nice man with the funny dog?" she said. "He carried me all through the water," with a shudder and a catch in her voice. "He was very kind to me, and so are you."

"The angel!" cried the little Frenchwoman kissing her rapturously. "That Frenchman, Pierre, is my brother; he is waiting to see you downstairs. Your clothes have dried nicely. Will you let Jeannette dress you and take you to the room where he sits?"

Camilla assenting, Jeannette bustled away, to return soon with her arms full of the child's clothes.

When ready she took her downstairs and insisted on her having breakfast before meeting Pierre. "For," said the little woman with a bright laugh, "it is well to do business on a full stomach rather than on an empty one; one's mind is clearer."

The room was the inn parlour, and one that was used only on rare occasions. But today a fire had been lit, so that Pierre and his charge might talk undisturbed.

The snowy cloth spread on the round table, the white china basin of hot bread and milk, a cup of steaming French coffee, the small dish which Jeannette uncovered with a flourish, disclosing a poached egg on a delicate round of buttered toast, all looked so appetizing that Camilla felt hungry at once, and said so.

"Eh bien!" said Jeannette well pleased; "then eat, cherie."

CHAPTER VIII.

Pierre Discloses His Plan.

Later on, when the breakfast had been done full justice to and everything cleared away, the hearth brushed up, and a bowl of laurestinus placed in the middle of the table, Jeannette ushered Pierre in, followed by Jacques.

The Frenchman bowed low. "Mademoiselle is rested?" he inquired somewhat wistfully.

"Yes, thank you." Camilla was not satisfied with the bow; she extended her hand, saying softly, "Your sister has been so kind to me."

"The angel!" exclaimed Jeannette, looking highly delighted, "that she should think so! Who wouldn't be kind to you, ma petite? And now I will leave you, for I have household tasks to attend to, and Pierre here has much to talk to you about."

She tripped lightly away, and Pierre busied himself in making his little charge comfortable in the big armenair she had occupied before. This done, he seated himself and looked gravely into the fire.

Camilla waited patiently for the talk that seemed so long in coming. Then, with a serious, old-fashioned air she said softly, "You wanted to speak to me?"

Pierre started and rose from his seat; then walked two or three times down the small room and came back and reseated himself.

Camilla by this time was becoming uneasy. Catching tight hold of the arms of her chair she slightly raised herself out of it, exclaiming tremulously—

"Has my daddy been saved?"

Pierre turned his eyes full upon her. Such honest eyes they were, and so full of pity just then.

"No, mademoiselle, it it not that. Monsieur your father was not saved." And as Camilla sank back again with a little cry, he went on, "He could not be saved, mademoiselle. Even if he had not gone down with the ship it would have been no use trusting himself to that icy water."

Camilla went on crying softly. Her tears were not wild or passionate. Pierre's soothing manner and voice, with the knowledge that he had seen and talked with her father, and that her father had liked him, acted like balm on the sorrowful little heart.

Pierre continued gently. "Figure to yourself, mademoiselle, that delicate frame of monsieur's battling with the water as I battled with you, and as the young gentleman battled with Jacques. Think you he could have done it?"

And, as Camilla shook her head with her tears falling fast, he added—

"Was it not better that his poor weak body should not be so tried, but just allowed to sink down with the ship?"

Camilla's tears would not permit her to say anything, but she held out her small fairy-like hand, and laying it on Pierre's brown fist squeezed it gently. The Frenchman's eyes rested wonderingly on it. Never during his thirty years of life had he seen such a hand; it looked so small and white resting there. She did not remove it at once, and Pierre, as he looked at it, felt his heart more drawn to her by this one spontaneous act than he had even felt it drawn before.

"Daddy liked you," she said at length.

Pierre's heart leaped up as she spoke, for her words gave him greater confidence to speak on the subject that was now troubling him.

"Mademoiselle does not know that monsieur entrusted her to my charge long before the lifeboat came in sight?"

"When daddy had that long talk with you in French?" questioned Camilla, with a shrewd old-fashioned expression in her eyes.

Pierre inclined his head. "It was then, mademoiselle. He commissioned me to take care of you and to bring you to a lady, a Miss Barrington, whom he used to know, and who was living, to his knowledge, in this same town a few months ago."

He had interested Camilla, he could see, by the way she sat bolt upright in her chair, staring hard at him with the tears still standing in her eyes.

"I went to that lady's house this morning," continued Pierre very slowly, and then he paused, and looked full at her.

"Yes?" said Camilla, with breathless anxiety.

"I did not see her. I was told that she was dead—had died six weeks ago."

Camilla stared at him, and then her hands dropped from the arms of her chair into her lap with a wearied, pained gesture that went to Pierre's heart. To his fancy the pathetic face looked paler than before.

"What will you do with me?" she asked with a pensive drooping of her mouth. "I don't know where to go."

"That is what I am coming to, mademoiselle. Miss Barrington was to take you to your grandparents, but as she is not here to do so, and as monsieur put you into my charge, why should not I take you to your grandparents?"

Camilla's eyes shone with sudden affection on him.

"I don't know where your grandparents live, beyond that they are in England. Jeannette says you don't know either."

Camilla shook her head, her grey eyes still fixed earnestly on him.

"Eh bien. I would have to find out. But that might take me many weeks—many months. Would you be afraid to trust yourself to me all that time?"

For answer her hand again alighted on his and remained there. Pierre half smiled to see it, and Camilla, looking at him, caught the flash of the white teeth which had so attracted her on the vessel when she first saw him.

"You—you looked like that on the ship," she faltered; "and—and daddy was with me and saw you."

Tears seemed very near the verge again, so Pierre said hastily—

"But, mademoiselle, I must tell you first how we shall travel—you and I, in search of your grandparents. You may not like it. If you don't, you must say so at once, and perhaps I might find out some other way that you may like better. I am master of a small troupe. That is," he added hastily, seeing she looked bewildered, "I own three dogs——"

"Besides Jacques?" interrupted Camilla.

"Counting Jacques," said Pierre, his white teeth showing again; "also a performing monkey and a performing goat. I go round the country traveling with these, and that is how I make my living. If you and I go in search of your grandparents, that is the way we shall travel. What say you to it?"

Camilla lifted her hand off his and brought her other to meet it. A soft clapping of little hands together met his ears.

The Frenchman laughed outright at the musical sound. "Then the plan does not frighten you, mademoiselle? You would not mind going with me that way?" he asked well pleased.

"I should love it, next to—next to going with daddy."

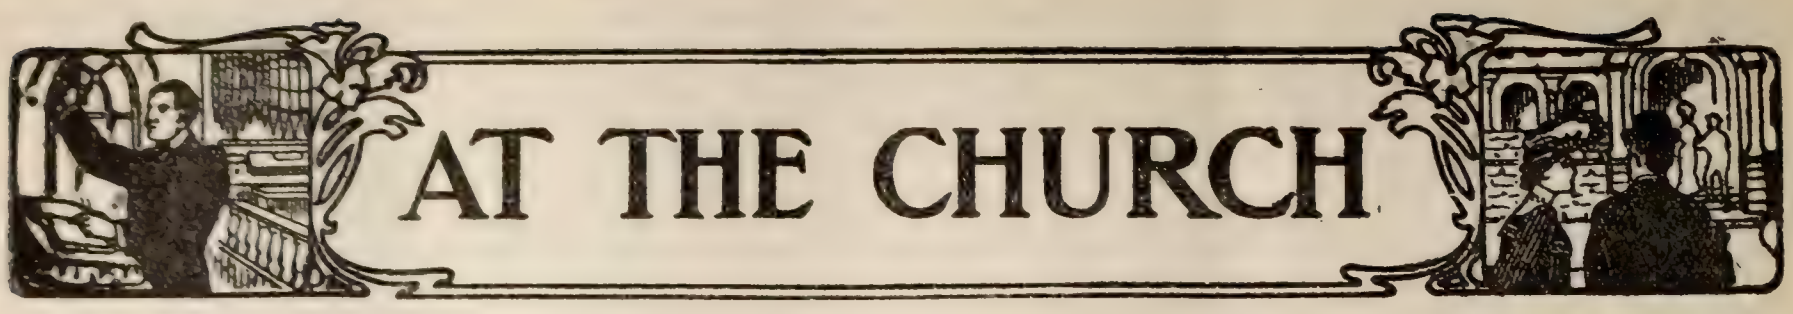
"Bah! it is not what I like at all," said Jeannette's voice behind them. "Mademoiselle is but a baby, and does not know what is before her. Would'st thou not like rather to stay beside Jeannette, petite, while Pierre goes round with the troupe and finds out the grandparents?"

Camilla's face looked grave. Her heart was very warm to this good Frenchwoman, but she felt Pierre was the first friend, and something appealed to her in the life he had just pictured. Moreover, had not her father chosen him as her protector? This last decided it.

She got out of her chair, and going up to Jeannette held out her two hands with an apologetic expression of face. She looked no baby as she did so, and Jeannette was fain to acknowledge this to herself.

"I do love you for all your kindness to me," she said with a wistful tremor in her voice; "please, if you do not mind, I would rather go with him and the dogs. Daddy put me into his care——" She burst into tears, and the little Frenchwoman folded her to her heart.

"Thou shalt do what thou likest best, mon enfant, and Jeanette will pray the bon Dieu to guard you both."



Pierre's face meanwhile revealed perfect satisfaction. Once let him get away from Deal, and from the neighborhood of the man with the black cloak, and he would not be backward in inquiring for a family of the name of Falconer. That they were of some importance, people high in the social scale, the Frenchman had not the slightest doubt The fine features of the dead father were before his mind, and no one glancing once at Camilla would have said that she came of even middle-class origin. That patrician little face, that stately little turn of the head, gave the clue to the class to which she belonged.

All this, Pierre argued, would enable him to find out these Falconers quickly, and thus to discharge faithfully the trust reposed in him. No thought of self-seeking lay behind all this; Pierre was above such. He never once thought of himself, nor of the gain that might accrue to him from his search. The service he was rendering was wholly unalloyed in its idea of faithfulness. And he hugged in thought that purse of gold that would enable him to give to his charge the extra comforts that his usual mode of traveling could not procure for her. Every penny would be kept strictly for her use, and inwardly he blessed the dead father for having forced him to take that money.

The roll of papers? Well, he had puzzled his head as to where they had gone. He had an indistinct idea of having unbuttoned his coat, when the preserver of his dog had been dragged into the boat in an unconscious state. Could the roll of papers have fallen out at that time?

They may have been valuable. Doubtless they were, and a peep into them would assuredly have led to his going by a direct route to the home of the Falconers with his

Wild Beasts at Ephesus*

As was noticed in our last study, Ephesus was the most important city of western Asia. It was the capital of the Roman province of Asia and was situated on the Cayster River in the ancient division of Lydia. It was the center of the worship of Diana, whose temple was some three centuries old at the time Paul was there. It had a very mixed population, a large section of which was Jewish. It was the home of sorceries and magic arts.

Paul's Ministry in Ephesus.

In this city Paul labored with success for more than two years; in fact, in his own reference to the matter (Acts 20:31) he speaks of it as three years. This period of Paul's life was characteristic of his policy of spending his time at the great centers of the Roman Empire. It is customary to speak of Paul as a traveler and such he was to a special degree. But in reality most of his life was spent in residences in important cities where he felt it was a strategic work to plant the gospel. Of these Ephesus was one of the most important. It became the center of Christian influence throughout Asia Minor. From it Paul's helpers went out to plant the churches which afterward became famous in early Christian history. In the later years it was the residence of the apostle John, and all the later period of that great apostle's work centers here.

I. Corinthians.

Paul had come to Ephesus in the company of his two friends, Aquila and Priscilla. Later, after his visit to Jerusalem and Antioch, he had returned and settled to the task of evangelism, which he continued in this city for many months. It was some time during these months that our first Epistle to the Corinthians was written. In it Paul refers to the work of Apollos in Corinth, and the reasons why it seemed inexpedient for the young preacher to return to that devisive church.

The Messengers.

The time drew near when Paul thought he ought to go back to Jerusalem to make report of his work. He felt that he had spent as long a time at Ephesus as the occasion demanded, and he could well leave the work in that city in the hands of others while he pushed on to new regions. It was always his hope to go soon or late to Rome. That was the imperial capital, and to strengthen Christianity there was one of the great ambitions of the apostle. Therefore, he prepared to leave Ephesus. But before returning to Jerusalem he wished to visit Philippi, Thessalonica, and Corinth again. So he sent forward two of his friends, Timothy and Erastus. The former was Paul's child in the faith whom he had brought with him from Lystra. The latter Paul mentions again in the Epistle to the Romans (16:23). Sending these men forward to prepare the churches for his coming, he remained a little longer in Ephesus.

The Craftsmen.

This period was marked by one of the most trying scenes in Paul's experiences. He had passed through many dangers and was destined to pass through others of even more desperate nature, but the riot at Ephesus was a painful experience and one of those which show the continued danger in which the Christian community and its leaders stood. It is not unlikely that it was to this very incident that Paul refers when he mentions having fought with wild beasts at Ephesus (I. Cor. 15:32). The occasion was the uprising of the guild of silversmiths and other craftsmen who made their living by the manufacture and sale of small images of the goddess Diana and little models of the temple of the goddess which were sold to the pilgrims coming up at the great heathen feast-times to pay homage at the shrine.

Into the Theatre.

The success of Paul's work had caused a rapid diffusion of Christian interest in the community. The devotees of the temple and especially the craftsmen, who derived their wealth from the traffic, realized that the new religion was destroying their hope of profit with a considerable class of the people. This roused them to anger, and under the leadership of Demetrius, a silversmith, they gathered in an impromptu assembly and were harangued by their leader with the statement of the danger in which Christianity had placed their business. This gathering of artisans speedily grew into a mob of excited and angry worshipers of the goddess. From the narrow streets of the city they gathered a mass of excited or curious people and poured their numbers into the great theatre whose vast ruins still constitute one of the most interesting features of the site of ancient Ephesus.

Paul Saved.

In the meantime they had discovered two of Paul's friends, Gaius and Aristarchus. The latter is mentioned in Acts 20:4 and 27:2. These men they probably beat and otherwise mistreated. It only remained for them to find Paul himself to complete their vengeance upon the new religion. The apostle, with a courage which seems almost unaccountable, was on the point of rushing in among these infuriated heathen. To have done so would undoubtedly have been instant death for him. Who it was that persuaded him to the wiser course of secrecy, we do not know. But the interesting reference to Aquila and Priscilla in Paul's Epistle to the Romans (16:3, 4), as those who "had laid down their own necks" for his safety, hints, at least, that they now secreted him and at peril of their own lives protected him from the fury of the mob.

The Jews Protest.

Meantime the Jews of the city were stirred to action likewise. They were sufficiently unpopular already, but they were fearful that the maddened artisans would believe that Paul was a representative of the Jewish people and would thus class the entire community of Jews with the Christian disturber of the peace. This they most of all wished to avoid and, therefore, put forward one of their number, Alexander, to explain that they had nothing to do with Paul's work. But their champion met short grace at the hands of the mob. It was enough that he was a Jew, a hater of their gods, and they silenced him with contempt.

Paul's Friends.

Meanwhile the mob increased in numbers and in disorder. It was a serious public crisis. The authorities of the city must have been not a little troubled at the riot. Among the public officers, called Asiarchs, the leaders of the political life of the city past and present, it seems that Paul had friends. Yet these men could apparently do nothing in the presence of the mad fury of the mob. They could only add their influence to keep Paul from jeopardizing his life.

The Town Clerk.

But the matter was finally quieted by the wisdom and courage of the town clerk, an officer apparently of great dignity and wisdom. He secured the attention of the crowd and explained to them the serious nature of their action. If the Roman government should make inquiry into the proceedings of that day, it would be difficult for Ephesus to explain the incident. If there were cause of complaint against Paul or any of his companions, the clerk said, the courts would hear the matter. But it was a serious thing to invite the punishment of Rome by popular disorder. Such language turned the excitement of the crowd into apprehension, and very soon it broke up and melted away. The wisdom of one man had curbed the frenzy of a multitude.

Paul's Departure.

Almost immediately Paul left the city. He knew that it was impossible for him to remain longer with profit. His appearance in any public place would have been a signal for a fresh outburst of public fury. He, therefore, departed, leaving his good friends, Aquila and Priscilla, and the members of the church which had grown up about them, and made his way to the north, where further perils and triumphs awaited him.

The Place of Prayer

I need not wait until the busy day
At length has sped away,
To find at eve an angel waiting there
Beside my place of prayer.
I need not tarry till the night shall fall
To seek this shrine beside the city wall.

Each hour of toil and self-denying grace
Is an appointed place,
A sanctuary where my soul may kneel
With its devout appeal.
There, too, I know the presence of the King,
His "Peace, be still," the shadow of His wing.

PHASES OF GOD'S GUIDANCE.

Topic, Aug. 18. Ex. 33:12-17; 13:20-22; Rom. 8:1-15; John 14:1-7.

The Christian believes in some sort of divine guidance. One may have great confidence in himself, but he will have experiences which cause him to exclaim with the prophet Jeremiah: "O Jehovah, I know that the way of man is not in himself; it is not in man that walketh to direct his steps." The manner in which God guides men is variously understood by them and doubtless ought to be, for their experiences differ. We smile at the naive beliefs that are still held, but we must respect an imperfect understanding of God's ways if it aids in the building of worthy character. Not long ago a good man whose barn had burned told me that he thought the strange and perverse conduct of his hay fork the day before the disaster was a prophecy of the fire. His belief that God is daily guiding his steps strengthens his devotion to his family and his integrity in all his dealings with men in spite of the fact that his religion has in it an element of superstition. He comes closer to the secret of things than the wise man who sees God in nothing.

God in the Natural Order.

The pious man's trust in the pronouncements of his hay fork is an inheritance from a time when men did not understand the orderly ways of God. Then every strange event was attributed to some unusual activity of spirits or the gods. It was not known that the heavens above and the earth beneath are governed by laws which the mind of man may trace. So firmly fixed was the primitive belief in the capriciousness of things that the first suggestions of natural law were regarded as impious and the daring thinkers were called to account for their sin. Now that the reign of law has been accepted as a fact, some would banish God entirely from the universe and others would think of him as far away and having nothing to do directly with the ongoing of nature. Either view leaves us without the presence of God in his material creation. We need for the complete life to feel his presence and goodness in the order and beauty of the world. The psalmist saw the glory of God in the heavens and in the aspects of nature about him. We are not denied a privilege which he enjoyed.

Guidance Through Human Society.

The movements of nations and peoples have meaning. The prophets have shown us that conquering armies may be the instruments of God. What are the questions that new situations raise? What is the meaning of the present industrial order? Why should there be such a thing as Socialism to trouble rulers and voters? One way to answer these questions is to say that the world is going to the devil; that men are losing the sentiments which make life significant, and that the best course for the godly man is to withdraw from the scene of unholy strife and call as many after him as can be influenced, in the hope that at some future day the world will come to its senses. Another and a better way is to look for signs that God is calling the world to a more Christian way of living. The rebellion of character against unjust conditions may be accompanied by excesses on the part of many, but does not it give to the disciple of Jesus an opportunity to lead men to him? Conditions in non-Christian lands are the call of God to missionary activity. The courageous and the intelligent can see in every time of stress and change opportunities for emphasizing neglected elements of the gospel message.

The Inner Light.

It is for every man to examine his own experience and discover its meaning. The plainest word of God means nothing to a moral idiot. But without doubt those whom God holds accountable for any sort of work can know what he means when he speaks to them. The Bible and the church are given to men that they may develop their power to see spiritual facts and to interpret them. Fellowship with Christ awakens intelligence and quickens the sympathies. It is an abuse of language to call ourselves disciples of Christ if we have no appreciation of spiritual values. We are Christians when we have the mind of Christ and judge ourselves and society by the standards of Christ. Looking back over the past, we see what this friend has done for our higher life and how that one has saved us from making shipwreck of the faith; we gladly acknowledge the purifying power of work, even of drudgery; we humbly give thanks for the ministry of disappointment and pain; we can say, "Truly God has been our guide."

THE QUALITY AND LIMITATION OF PRAYER.

Topic, Aug. 22. Matt. 6:5, 6; 18:19, 20.

In the scriptures from which we take our lesson Jesus sets forth the essential quality and limitation of every Christian prayer. On the one hand, it must be a sincere longing of the soul; and on the other, it must be limited to the life-ideals of Jesus himself.

In prayer as in everything else Jesus encountered the formalism of this day, but he strikes through it and insists that the effective prayer must be vital. He reveals a God who is spiritual and ethical, and he who attempts to worship Him with lifeless forms and empty ceremonies is an abomination.

Within the Closed Door.

When Jesus told his disciples not to pray on the busy thoroughfare, nor in the assembly of public worship; but rather to enter the closet and there offer their prayers in secret, we must remember that it was not the place of prayer to which he was making objection. Prayer may be just as genuine in the market-place as in the "inner chamber." Again, it may be just as false and lifeless in the secret room as on the street corner. The real prayer must be a sincere longing of the soul, whether it be uttered from the house-tops, or from the bed-chamber. Jesus told his disciples to avoid the former and seek the latter, because, in the one there are more distractions and appeals to vain-glory, while in the other, these things are shut out; and hence it is more conducive to the heartfelt expression of the soul to God.

Nor does the validity of prayer depend upon the quality of phrase. The publican who in humility and agony of soul, asked the Lord to have mercy on him because he was a sinner; or the New York sailor who, crouched in form and bewildered in soul, said, "Lord, I didn't know much about this business, but I would like to be a better man," are just as cogent prayers as those which are prefaced with a long list of rhetorical phrases, declaring the wisdom and glory, the dominion and power of the infinite God. Does the petitioner speak forth from the innerness of his soul, whether in choice or untutored language, is the thing of vital concern.

Prayer and Conduct.

Moreover, if the prayer be genuine, the ideals and standards of life set forth in the petition must be made regulative in the life of the petitioner. If we pray for the conversion of men, we, in the activities of our lives, must seek to bring it about. Do we pray that the kingdoms of this world may become the kingdom of our Lord and his Christ? Then we must give of our substance for the conversion of the heathen. When we pray that justice and integrity prevail in business, by these principles we must live, lest our prayers become mockeries.

Limitations of Prayer.

We must never forget the limitations of prayer. The words, "anything they shall ask, it shall be done for them of my Father who is in Heaven," and similar sayings from our Lord, have often been taken as absolutely universal promises and hence been made the occasion of many foolish and selfish prayers. Food ready for the table, clothing ready to wear, wealth, and power, all have been sought on this ground. In the summer of 1901 there was a severe drought in Illinois, Missouri, and Kansas. For lack of water and crops the farmers had to sell their stock—"at a sacrifice." Governor Dockery was besieged with letters which asked him to appoint a day on which the people might pray for rain. Why? Everybody had enough to eat and drink, clothes to wear, and houses in which to live. Why then this piety and devotion? It was not in behalf of the kingdom of righteousness, for they were praying for rain, which in this case meant an increased bank account. The day was appointed and doubtless these "pious" (?) people wore their clothes into holes at the knees that day, praying fervently for rain, but the rain didn't come until the summer was passed—too late to help the bank accounts. Only a puny god would listen to such a prayer, much less be moved by it. The "anything they shall ask" is limited by that other phrase which is always expressed or implied, "in my name." That is to say, we, as Christians, pray, and pray only, for those things which, according to our best knowledge and judgment harmonize with the spirit and life ideal of our Lord.

A Child's Prayer

I.

Oh! keep me in Thy love and fear,
And every hour, dear Lord, be near.
And terrors from my spirit take,
For Jesus' sake! for Jesus' sake!

II.

Oh! keep me pure and true within,
Nor let me, Lord, lie down in sin.
Be near me when I sleep or wake,
For Jesus' sake! for Jesus' sake!

III.

Oh! keep me in Thy constant care,
And may I fell Thee everywhere,
And let my life of Thee partake,
For Jesus' sake! for Jesus' sake!

Church Life

R. R. Hamlin has received a call to the church at Wichita Falls, Texas.

Eugene Holmes has accepted a call to the church at Dalhart, Texas.

E. L. Ely will close his work at Lebanon, Mo., September 1.

Thos. L. Cooksey closes his work at Joplin, Mo., September 1, to enter the evangelistic field.

C. M. Marlow, after one year with the church at Stanford. Ill., has received a unanimous call to remain with the church.

W. C. Crider closes his work at Fortuna, Cal., August 1, and will be succeeded by W. G. Clark of Wyoming.

G. K. Berry, formerly editor of the Pacific Christian, has accepted a call to the pastorate of the church at Ashland, Oregon.

T. L. Read reports frequent additions to the church at Chapin, Ill. Nine have been added in the last few weeks.

With the close of this month comes the Illinois State convention at Eureka. Don't fail to read the full program on another page.

H. A. Morgan has been called to remain indefinitely with the church at Fowler, Cal., where he has wrought a good work.

In all departments the church at Danville Ill., is making fine progress. There have been twenty-one additions in the last few weeks. W. E. Adams is the pastor.

A good live preacher is needed at Seymour, Texas. This is a growing little city of about 2,500 inhabitants, and the church will pay $900 or $1,000.

E. W. Darst, state evangelist for California, has recently dedicated a new church at Woody, Kern Co., Cal. J. H. Stevens is pastor of the church.

On account of poor health, W. A. Wherry has resigned the pastorate of First Church, Norman, Okla. He will take an extended vacation.

M. L. Pontius, who has done two years excellent service at Taylorville, has resigned and will enter Yale Divinity School in the autumn.

G. E. Roberts, who has ministered two years successfully to the Main Street Church, Mason City, Ia., has resigned and will close his work September 1.

G. H. Sims, Findlay, Ohio, has been engaged as provincial Evangelist for Ontario, and will begin work about the first of September.

Dan Trundle, pastor of the church at Rialto, Cal., was recently married to Miss Lelia McGarvey, of St. Louis, Mo. The bride is a cousin of J. W. McGarvey.

President Crossfield, of Transylvania University, will sail for Europe on the fourth of August, and will visit the Universities of Glasgow, Edinburgh, Cambridge, and Oxford.

The new St. Clarens, Church of Christ, Toronto, Canada, is to be dedicated the first Lord's Day in September. President M. L. Bates of Hiram College has been invited to have charge of the services.

A "Centennial" meeting will be held by the church at Deland, Ill., during September. They will have the assistance of Chas. Bloom, Newman, Ill., and Mrs. J. E. Powell, of Pekin, Ill. W. T. McConnell is the pastor.

The great church at Warrensburg, Mo., has called to its service as pastor, S. B. Moore, of Mayfield, Ky. Geo. B. Stewart now of Colorado Springs, Colo., was formerly the pastor at Warrensburg.

At Ladonia, Texas, where A. L. Clinkenbeard is minister, they are bidding defiance to the heat of summer and are engaging in an evangelistic meeting with Parnell and Holmes assisting.

J. N. Lester, Denair, Cal., with his family are spending their vacation in a trip through the East. They will visit Portland, Oregon, Seattle, several places in Canada, and return via Chicago and Eureka, Ill.

J. M. VanHorn, formerly pastor of the First Church, Warren, supplied the pulpit of this church the first Sunday in August. It was a mutual pleasure for pastor and people to thus renew for a time the old relationship.

J. E. Lynn, pastor of the First Church, Warren, Ohio, is spending a few weeks at Sandy Lake, Pa., and will on his return spend a few days in attendance at the Bible Conference at Winona Lake, Ind.

A very unusual service was held in the Hyde Park Church, Kansas City, Mo., July 25, when the three sons of R. H. Fife—Clyde Lee, Robert S. and Earl H.—were ordained to the Christian ministry.

W. S. Lowe, Paolo, Kans., has been called to the pastorate of the Central Church, Kansas City, Kans., where he succeeds S. W. May. Mr. Lowe is already at work in his new field.

Geo. H. Combs, after an extended trip through Palestine, on which he was accompanied by his wife, is again in the pulpit of the Independance Ave. Church, Kansas City, Mo.

Anticipation of the good time to be had at the Centennial Convention should not cause us to forget the interests of our own state. The Illinois workers will meet at Eureka August 30 to September 2.

The Central Church, Kansas City, Kan., loses its pastor, S. W. May, who has resigned after five years of successful work. During this time 850 members have been received into the membership of the church. Mr. May will enter the evangelistic field.

The Linnwood Ave. Church, Kansas City, will, it is confidently expected, be comfortably located in their new church building in early autumn. Few men are doing better than Burris A. Jenkins, who is pastor of this church.

Among the speakers for the Nebraska State convention from outside the state are: Olliver W. Stewart, Chicago; P. C. MacFarlane, Kansas City; E. W. Allen, Wichita, Kansas; W. C. Pearce, Chicago; and G. W. Muckley, Kansas City, Mo.

Austin Hunter, Who Begins Work as Pastor of the Jackson Boulevard Church, Chicago, Aug. 15.

Lucius L. Higgins, who has been the minister of one of the churches in Philadelphia, Pa., for the past two years, is now in Europe enjoying the historic scenes and will include Palestine in his itinerary before returning to America.

J. S. Hyde completes his second year of service with the church at Homer, Ill., October 1. Next year his wife will also give her time to the ministry, and they would like two churches near together where such a plan can be pursued.

J. H. Young is leading the church at Hollister, Cal., forward to larger and larger service. They are now planning for a new church building which will doubtless be erected in the near future. The church is perfectly harmonious and devoted to their pastor.

Thad. Tinsley, Pastor of the Third Church, Louisville, Ky., is keeping things moving in that great old church during the month of August, by well announced special sermons for both morning and evening. He purposes to make these meetings a preparation for the Centennial celebration.

A church, estimated to cost about $80,000.00 will be erected by the congregation of the Central Church, Terre Haute, Ind., in the near future. This church has adopted the tithing system, and are delighted with the experience. The tithers increase in umber from week to week, and there is no trouble about finance.

The South Prospect Church, Kansas City, has sold its property at Twenty-second and Prospect, and purchased a new location at Twenty-seventh and Wabash avenue. A tabernacle will be constructed to serve the church until a commodious new building can be erected. D. Y. Donaldson is pastor of this aggressive church.

The Men's Bible class at Blandinsville, "is an example of what a little, well-directed effort will accomplish," says a member of this church. The class was organized by the pastor, C. R. Wolford, soon after he began his work with the church about a year ago. It now has a membership of fifty-three, and is pushing hard for 100. The pastor is the teacher of the class; Guy Huston, president, and Chas. Blandin, Cor. Sec'y.

A workers' conference will be held August 17 at the First Church, Springfield, Mo., for the purpose of determining the best plan of procedure in the missionary and educational work in southwest Missouri. Every preacher and county secretary of the district is urged to attend. It will be an all day session, and every one will be urged to speak his mind. The call for the meeting is signed by F. L. Moffett and Joseph Gaylor.

The following professors of Transylvania University are studying at the University of Chicago this summer: Dean T. B. MacCartney, Professor of Greek; Henry Lloyd, Professor of Mathematics; Chas. A. Shull, Professor of Biology; W. F. Wyatt, Assistant in English. Dr. Chas. B. Newcomer of the Department of Latin; and Prof. R. E. Monroe, of the department of Modern Languages are studying at the University of Michigan.

Two missionaries have recently been sent out by the First Church, St. Louis, Mo. They both came from its own membership. Dr. M. E. Tolan goes to Nantung, China, under the direction of the Foreign Society, and Chu Loy, a convert in the Chinese Sunday-school of the First Church, goes to open a new mission in Quang Tung Province. The latter has been studying for some years at Drake University in preparation for his work, being supported while there by the First Church.

A contemporary contains the announcement of a church with a large membership, with four or five hundred men among this number. Their pastor has resigned and they are looking for another. In the announcement men interested are asked to write to the elders of the church. Following this invitation is the statement that this great church with four or five hundred men in its membership will pay a salary of $1,000 per year. One wonders if they have thought of the tithing system as a good way to get and keep a minister.

Dr. John Thomas, M. A., of Liverpool, England, who is to lecture at noon in Association Hall, 153 La Salle Street, Chicago, September 20-24, under the auspices of The Moody Bible Institute, is the pastor of the most famous Baptist chapel in his home city, and also the lecturer on Momiletics at the Manchester Baptist College.

He is described by one of his ministerial contemporaries as "an intellectual giant with a curiosly long lawyer's head;" and by another, as "one of the greatest preachers of the evangelical school in Liverpool, who gets large and enthusiastic audiences whenever he goes abroad."

COLUMBUS, O.

"Two confessions and baptisms at Broad Street yesterday. All our congregation in Columbus are doing well. Wilson Ave. will dedicate their fine new home in September. Chicago Ave. is remodeling their building. Bro. Strickler, minister at our newest congregation on the south side is getting the work in fine shape. W. 4th Ave. and Linden Heights are growing very fast. Columbus pastors are arranging for a special train to Pittsburg for the great convention. Particulars later."—Walter Scott Priest.

A Congratulation and a Centennial Litany

Editors Christian Century: Accept my heartiest congratulation on your article in current issue of the Christian Century on "The Revivalist as a Preacher." It is the best thing I have seen yet on "Centennial Aims," or on the subject of evangelism. I have thought for some time modern evangelism was sacrificing "soul winning" to the god of success. May heaven deliver us from this sort.

I am constrained to think that we ought to halt long enough before going up to Pittsburg, the Mecca of the Disciples this year, to pray that in the dying of the first century of our history the following may perish with the years and that we may face the future unhampered by their weight and impediment. Let us earnestly pray to be delivered:

First—From a base ingratitude that accepts all the advantages resultant from others' labor, but which steadfastly refuses to give a penny in return.

Second—From a sordid selfishness which closes our eyes and ears to all missionary enterprise.

Third—From an evil mind which fattens upon the tongue of slander or views with envy the triumphs of another.

Fourth—From allowing our personal prejudices to set at naught the good that others are accomplishing for the Kingdom of Christ.

Fifth—From a provincialism that reduces

Chicago Headquarters at Pittsburg

The Hotel Henry has been chosen as Headquarters for Chicago people at the Centennial Convention. This is one of the best hotels in the city. Rates for the convention are $1.50 per day European plan, and $2.50 with two in a room. Prices range higher for rooms with bath. The hotel has a beautiful lobby where convention fellowship will be in full sway. It is new and modern and the manager is determined that nothing shall be left undone to make us quite at home during our stay in Pittsburg.

Chicago will be glad to be host to friends from all parts of the country who wish to stop at this hotel.

It is not one day too soon to make your reservation. We predict that hotel accommodations will soon be exhausted.

Government Opening of Irrigated Lands

Arrangements have been completed for the opening of 70,000 acres of choice irrigated lands on the Valier (Montana) tract October 7, 1909. The days set for registering claims are October 1, 2, 4, 5 and 6. Everything is being planned for handling the crowds comfortably and for conducting the drawing without delay or discomfort. This Carey segregation is to be thrown open to the public at reasonable terms. The price and terms set by the State Land Board is $40.50 per acre, including land and perpetual water rights, which are the oldest and best established in the state. The first payment required is $3.50 per acre; fifteen years are allowed in which to complete the payments. The land will grow as good crops as the best $200 an acre soils of the corn belt, without their uncertainty of seasons, and homeseekers will doubtless gobble up the 70,000 acres of irrigated land very quickly.

little charge in his hand, without subjecting her to any rough traveling. But there! What could he do other than what he proposed doing? And if the papers had fallen into the water, or—disagreeable thought—been robbed from him, all he must do on finding the grandparents was to confess to his loss, trusting that it would not be an irreparable one.

As to the thought of the papers having been robbed from him—why, only one person could have done that, could have had the interest to do it. And the Frenchman put his white teeth together, and whispered to himself the name that Rexington Falconer had bade him to remember.

"And if he has attempted one robbery, and that has proved a successful one, why should he not attempt to rob me of a greater prize still?" said Pierre, still cogitating. "But"—the determined look deepening on his face—"I shall guard this treasure as her father would have guarded it, and my hand alone will discharge this trust, as Heaven above is witness."

July Another Good Month

The receipts of the Foreign Society for the month of July amounted to $42,894.85, a gain over the corresponding month, 1908, of $3,018.69. This is an encouraging gain, but we had hoped for a larger one.

The total receipts for ten months of the missionary year, that is, from October 1st, 1908, to August 1st, 1909, amounted to $233,234; a gain of $44,114.34.

There has been a gain every month of the current missionary year. There has also been a gain from every source of receipts except the Sunday Schools and bequests. The churches as churches have gained over $14,000, and the annuities show a gain of $19,764.

Only two more months before the year closes. Let us make August and September record breaking months. We can gain $50,000 in these months if we will.

STICK TO IT
Until Coffee Hits You Hard.

It is about as well to advise people to stick to coffee until they get hit hard enough, so that they will never forget their experience, although it is rather unpleasant to look back to a half dozen years of invalidism, money and opportunity thrown away, which is really the terrible price paid for the weakest kind of a "mess of pottage."

A woman writes and her letter is condensed to give the facts in a short space:

"I was a coffee slave and stuck to it like a toper to his 'cups,' notwithstanding I had headaches every day, and frequently severe attacks of sick headaches, then I used more coffee to relieve the headaches, and this was well enough until the coffee effect wore off, then I would have sick spells.

"Finally my digestion was ruined, severe attacks of rheumatism began to appear, and ultimately the whole nervous system began to break down and I was fast becoming a wreck.

"After a time I was induced to quit coffee and take up Postum. This was half a year ago. The result has been most satisfactory.

"The rheumatism is gone entirely, blood is pure, nerves practically well and steady, digestion almost perfect, never have any more sick headaches and am gaining steadily in weight and strength."

"There's a Reason."

the methods of the higher criticism by insisting that the Bible should be interpreted as any other ancient book. They originated the spirit of good fellowship among Christians of different names. They pioneered the way with a church that required no credal test of membership save the Bible one. They were hospitable to all new truth, however it led to persecution and misunderstanding. If we do not hold all the details of the "Campbellite" theology, we yet hold all that they would regard as essentials. The wonder is that after a hundred years of sifting there is still so much of Campbellism that we regard as true. Walking in the footsteps of the fathers has linked up our message more definitely and completely with the great historic contentions of the brotherhood.

Electricity for Jerusalem

Two notables of Jerusalem have applied for the concession for furnishing Jerusalem with electric light and building an electric tramway between Jerusalem and Jaffa. The daily receipts of the electric tramway in Damascus average 40 Turkish liras ($176). At present only one line is in operation, but a considerable expansion of the system is under preparation. Electric light has been introduced into 450 places of residence and business in Damascus. The streets of the city are lighted with 1,000 electric lamps, while the Serail, the city hall, and the Grand Mosque are served gratis with electric arc lights.

Notes from the Foreign Field

E. W. Pease, missionary of the Foreign Society in Norway, will return to America with his family in the near future. He will be at the Centennial Convention.

Mr. King, our Chinese brother at Nankin, China, gives another $1,000 to the work in that city. He gave $1,000 a few months ago.

Two friends in Kentucky sent $500 each to aid in the building of the Bibles Colleges at Vigan, Philippine Islands, and Bolenge, Africa.

Miss Pearle B. Miller, missionary of the Foreign Society in Wuhu, China, was married to Mr. Spencer P. Gracy, June 9. Their future home will be in Wuhu.

Dr. W. N. Lemmon, Texas, has been appointed a medical missionary at Laoag, Philippine Islands, and will sail in the early autumn.

The church at Milton, Oregon, C. H. Hilton, minister, reaches the Living-link rank by giving $650 this year for Foreign Missions. Oregon is rapidly coming to the front.

During the month of July a direct personal gift to the Foreign Society amounted to $4,212. It is hoped that an army of personal friends will grow up to support the work. We are hoping for still larger personal gifts.

F. E. Meigs, President of Drake College, Nankin, China, with his wife, has just reached America and will be at the Centennial Convention. The First Church, at St. Joseph, Mo., supports President Meigs as their living-link.

Dr. C. L. Pickett, missionary of the Foreign Society at Laoag, Philippine Islands, reports 869 medical treatments during the month of May and thirty-one converts. He married five couples during the month. His total receipts for medical services for the month amounted to $198.56.

The news of a sad accident comes from Damoh, India. Two of our boys in the orphanage were accidently drowned in the river nearby. Their names were Chhablal and Ghasita. Mr. Benlehr, the missionary, was nearby but he could do nothing. They were both Christians and were to be married in the near future.

Centennial Bulletin

Church Extension Offering.

The first Lord's Day in September is the time appointed for the taking of the offering for the work of the Church Extension Board. This Centennial year it should be an offering worthy of the time, the occasion and the work. It should be the greatest offering in all of history. This year, by a peculiar coincidence, the Church Extension Board reaches its majority just a few days before the opening of our great Centennial Convention, and starts out as a society separate and apart from all others. What a blessed thing it will be if this Centennial year the noble board can come to its 21st anniversary with the proud statement, "we have a round million dollars in our treasury with which to begin and continue our manhood's work."

At the age of 21 years the United States government says to a young man, "you are now ready for manhood's estate and work. You have received your education, your training has been such that you are now qualified to administer upon your own affairs." In like manner, we ought to say in substance and in spirit to the Church Extension Board, "you are now 21 years of age. Your education has been begun, has continued, you have had increasing responsibilities placed upon your shoulders until now we give you your substance, $1,000,000, with which to begin your manhood's work.

It does not require that a great amount of money be raised to give to the Church Extension Board a realization of its Centennial aim. $300,000 will do it! "What are these among so many!" An average of twenty-four cents apiece and the work is done! Who would have thought that so little from so many would accomplish so much!

The Church Extension Society deserves the support, sympathy and prayers of every member of the Brotherhood. The money given is the holiest money of all, for it cares for houseless congregations all over the country who, but for the assistance of this society, must perish. The money given fulfils the old proverb, "Charity begins at home." For this is essentially a home work. It realizes, too, the proverb, "Cast thy bread upon the waters for thou shalt find it after many days." All money given the Church Extension Society doubles itself every sixteen years, even at the simple rate of six per cent interest.

Think of it, this $300,000, if we give it now, so that the centennial aim shall be be realized, will, in less than 45 years become a million dollars.

Unless one has carefully studied the increasing power of money when it is as wisely handled as the Church Extension Society handles it, he cannot realize how money grows. Literally and truly, such is the earning power of money, one million dollars placed in the hands of the Society at its majority, will, by the time it is 100 years old, be worth ten million dollars. A dollar today is worth ten dollars a hundred years from now.

When you put your money into Church Extension you are not alone saving America for Christ, but you are saving the world for Christ, for, "as goes America, so goes the world."

Brethren, we ought to realize the Centennial Aim. A million dollars for Church Extension in 1909. We can do it if we will. We will if we try. Do you remember the sterling motto of the City of Chicago, "I Can and I Will." Let us make that motto ours for September 1, "we can and we will make up our Church Extension Society Fund up to $1,000,000.

We can do it! Will we do it?
I believe we will!

The Veteran's Camp Fire.

Many things are striking fire relative to the Convention. In all probability, however, more sparks are flying from the thought-flint of the Veteran's Camp Fire than anything else. It will be in charge of the venerable in years, yet youthful in spirit, Bro. L. L. Carpenter. What a record this great man of God has! 4,000 persons immersed into the name of Jesus Christ! 752 church edifices dedicated! $2,000,000.00 raised for the uplift of the standard of the primitive Gospel of our Lord and Saviour, Jesus Christ! Think for a moment what that 752 churches dedicated means in the way of service. Allow one church for the one Lord's Day in each week. It means, brethren, almost fourteen years and a half of service spent in this great work. Think of the number of miles traveled, the lives influenced, the souls saved! The work cannot be measured by the standards of time! Only eternity's standards can measure it! Not until the work is all finished and the laborers called home, and God has said "it is good" will we know the results, will we know the results.

Brother Carpenter proposes to have one good brother give a 20 minute address at the Camp Fire, then a free for all five minute recitation of work accomplished by the old veterans themselves.

What a gathering it will be!
What Others Are Saying About us!

The following is an editorial taken from the United Presbyterian, a paper published in this city. It tells something of what other people think of us, and gives us an opportunity of seeing ourselves as others see us. Read it! Don't neglect it!

Elaborate preparations are being made by the Disciples of Christ for the celebration of their centennial this year in Pittsburg. It is expected that at least 50,000 delegates will be in attendance. The date fixed is October 11-19. As in some other cases, it is difficult to fix an exact date for the organization, for the movement was at first without formal organization as we commonly use the word. The Disciples Church has had a remarkable growth from the small beginning of a case of discipline in connection with the

ON FOOD

The Right Foundation of Health.

Proper food is the foundation of health. People can eat improper food for a time until there is a sudden collapse of the digestive organs, then all kinds of trouble follows.

The proper way out of the difficulty is to shift to the pure, scientific food, Grape-Nuts, for it rebuilds from the foundation up. A New Hampshire woman says:

"Last summer I was suddenly taken with indigestion and severe stomach trouble and could not eat food without great pain, my stomach was so sore I could hardly move about. This kept up until I was so miserable life was not worth living.

"Then a friend finally, after much argument, induced me to quit my former diet and try Grape-Nuts.

"Although I had but little faith I commenced to use it and great was my surprise to find that I could eat it without the usual pain and distress in my stomach.

"So I kept on using Grape-Nuts and soon a marked improvement was shown, for my stomach was performing its regular work in a normal way without pain or distress.

"Very soon the yellow coating disappeared from my tongue, the dull, heavy feeling in my head disappeared and my mind left light and clear; the languid, tired feeling left, and altogether I felt as if I had been rebuilt. Strength and weight came back rapidly and I went back to my work with renewed ambition.

"Today I am a new woman in mind as well as body and I owe it all to this natural food, Grape-Nuts." "There's a Reason."

Look in pkgs. for the famous little book, "The Road to Wellville."

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true, and full of human interest.

teaching of a Rev. Thomas Campbell, a minister of the Associate Church of Ireland, who came to this country in 1807, and was appointed to the Buffalo congregation in Chartiers Presbytery. The errors charged against him, as we would now regard them, were not serious and fundamental. Special zeal in discipline, peculiar to the time, resulted in his withdrawal from the Church. In 1809, Mr. Campbell appealed to the pious of all parties by a printed "declaration and address," inviting them to join him upon the simple platform of the Bible. A considerable number responded and "the Christian Association of Washington, Pa.," was formed.

The first church was organized in 1811 at Brush Run, Washington county, Pa. Mr. Campbell was joined by his son, the afterwards famous Alexander Campbell, the long recognized leader of the Disciples Church. The question of baptism arose and the Baptist position was adopted. For a time the Campbells were connected with the Baptists, but eventually withdrew and formally organized the body known as the Disciples of Christ. For a long time their popular designation was the Campbellite Baptists." A so-called creedless Church, they are intensely denominational.

The Disciples have grown Westward with the progress of the nation. In the United States they rank sixth numerically among religious bodies. In Missouri they are first, and nearly or quite so in Kentucky, Indiana and Oklahoma. Throughout the upper Mississippi valley their influence is proportionate to their membership and they are enlisted aggressively in the cause of Prohibition and other reforms. At the present time the body is very earnest and active in missionary work as well as in numerical strength. They are endeavoring to raise a million dollar loan fund for Church Extension by the time of their meeting.

We give them a cordial welcome to our city, for their evangelizing spirit, for the work they have done, and for what they propose in the future.

The Centennial Song.

The centennial song will appear in the prospectus which is being sent out this week. The words are by Gilbert A. Harney, of Boston, Mass., while the music is by Professor H. J. Storer of the same city. Both music and words harmonize perfectly. The song has a step, swing and sweep that is inspirational, imperial, international. You will like it. It will be published in our church papers weeks before the convention so that all may be ready to sing it with the spirit and the understanding through all the musical programmes of the convention.

Brethren, pray for the Centennial and all workers connected with it.

W. R. Warren, Centennial Secretary.

Church Extension Notes

Statement of Receipts from October 1, 1908, to August 2, 1909, as Compared with Same Time Previous Year.

Churches.

Last year	$ 8,881.99
This year	11,552.09
Gain	$2,670.10

Individuals.

Last year	$18,672.34
This year	25,299.68
Gain	$6,627.34
Total Gain	$9,297.44

The above statement is very encouraging in view of the fact that the Annual Offering for Church Extension has not yet begun. The gain from the churches is $2,670.10, and from individuals $6,627.34, making a total gain of $9,297.44.

The Annual Offering.

And now comes the Annual Offering beginning Sunday, September 5. This is the last of the Centennial Offerings. Let us make it the best that has ever been given to Church Extension. Never more than 1,700 congregations have ever had fellowship in the Annual Offering for Church Extension. Order supplies at once, and LET US MAKE IT UNANIMOUS THIS YEAR.

Annuity Funds.

The Board has just received an Annuity of $3,000 from a brother in Illinois. There are many people who can help swell the Annuity Fund before the Centennial. Remember that when you give Annuity money you administer upon your own estate. There are several good features about this Fund:

1. You can see your money work while you live.
2. You have no trouble or losses in making investments.
3. You have no taxes nor attorney's fees to pay on an Annuity Bond.
4. The Church Extension Society is perpetual, and is incorporated. Its Fund now amounts to over $725,000, is perpetual, is increasing every year, sustains no losses except what excess interest will make up, and the money is loaned only on first mortgages where titles are absolutely good.
5. The Board will receive sums of $100 or more.
6. While your money is earning you an income, it is helping to build houses for the Lord's people.

Collections from Churches.

Last year only 1,193 churches took the Annual Offering, and the offerings from churches as churches amounted to $24,002.63. This was a falling off from the previous year, when 1,416 congregations contributed $30,863. The falling off last September was no doubt due to the drouth and the financial stringency. We have started in well this year with a gain of $2,670.10 from the churches. LET US MAKE IT UNANIMOUS THIS YEAR, every church sending an offering in the Centennial Year.

Church Extension and the Sunday-schools.

Our Sunday-schools have a work before them in creating a Named Fund. All the offerings from the Sunday-schools are placed in a separate account called "The Sunday-school Fund." The Board does not ask for a separate day on which an extended effort is made for an offering by a special program, but asks that one Sunday morning's offering be sent some Sunday in September from each Sunday-school. The Sunday before this offering is devoted to Church Extension, the superintendent ought to give a simple explanation of Church Extension to the children. Will the superintendent please see that an offering is sent from the Sunday-schools, making it as large as possible.

The Y. P. S. C. E. Fund.

The Board has also created a "Y. P. S. C. E. Fund" into which all the contributions from our Endeavor Societies go. Already this Fund amounts to over $2,000, and four churches have been built. All Endeavor Societies are urged to contribute to this Fund during the month of September.

Books You Need

We offer some of the most timely and vital books now appearing among the Disciples of Christ. You need every one of this splendid list.

OUR CENTENNIAL BOOK.

"Historical Documents Advocating Christian Union."--Edited by C. A. Young.

This book is the classic for this our Centennial year. It contains Thomas Campbell's "Declaration and Address"; Alexander Campbell's "Sermon on the Law"; Barton W. Stone's "Last Will and Testament of the Springfield Presbytery"; Isaac Errett's "Our Position"; J. H. Garrison's "The World's Need of Our Plea." Beautifully illustrated. Retail price, $1.00. No one should allow the Centennial to pass without possessing this book.

Z. T. Sweeney, Columbus, Ind., a preacher of national reputation, writes:

"I congratulate you on the happy thought of collecting and editing these documents. They ought to be in the home of every Disciple of Christ in the Land, and I believe they should have a large and increasing sale in years to come."

Basic Truths of the Christian Faith, by Herbert L. Willett, author of The Ruling Quality, Teaching of the Books, Prophets of Israel, etc., etc. Post 8vo., cloth, 127 pages. Front cover stamped in gold, gilt top, illustrated, 75 cents, paper 25 cents.

A powerful and masterful presentation of the great truths for the attainment of the life of the spirit. Written in a charming and scholarly style. It holds the reader's fascinated attention so closely that it is a disappointment if the book has to be laid aside before it is finished.

J. E. Chase writes:

"It is the voice of a soul in touch with the Divine life, and breathes throughout its pages the high ideals and noblest conception of truer life, possible only to him who has tarried prayerfully, studiously at the feet of the world's greatest teachers."

Our Plea for Union and the Present Crisis, by Herbert L. Willett, author of "The Life and Teachings of Jesus," etc., etc. 12mo., cloth, 140 pages, gold stamped, postpaid 50 cents.

Written in the belief that the Disciples of Christ are passing through an important, and in many respects, transitional period.

The author says:

"It is with the hope that * * * present forces and opportunities may be wisely estimated by us; that doors now open may be entered; that hopes only partially real now may come to fruition that these chapters are given their present form."

Every Disciple of Christ will be interested in getting from his own pen the teachings of Professor Willett. No fair man will consent to judge him on the basis of newspaper reports. These books should be in every one's possession just now.

ERRETT GATES' ILLUMINATING WORK.

"The Early Relation and Separation of Baptists and Disciples."

This is the theme of the hour. Dr. Gates has put into our hand the historic facts with a grace and charm that makes them read like a novel. In cloth, 75c. Paper binding, 25c.

"We owe a debt of gratitude to the writer of this book, and could only wish that it might be read not only by our people all over the land, but scattered among the Baptists. It is a most meritorious and splendid contribution to our literature."—THE CHRISTIAN WORKER, PITTSBURG, PA.

"The dominant personality of Alexander Campbell is so brought out as to give to what might be regarded as the dry details of ecclesiastical history and controversy almost the interest of a story. A valuable contribution to the history of the American churches."—THE CONGREGATIONALIST, BOSTON, MASS.

The Plea of the Disciples of Christ, by W. T. Moore. Small 16mo., cloth, 140 pages, net postpaid, thirty-five cents, won immediate success.

George Hamilton Combs, pastor of the Independence Boulevard Christian Church, Kansas City, Mo., one of the great churches of the brotherhood, writes:

"I cannot thank Dr. W. T. Moore enough for having written his little book on "Our Plea." It is more than a statement; it is a philosophy. Irenic, catholic, steel-tone, it is just the handbook I shall like to put into the hands of the thinking man on the outside. In all of his useful and honored life Mr. Moore has rendered no greater service to a great cause."

JUDGE SCOFIELD'S FASCINATING TALE.

"Altar Stairs."

Our Named Loan Funds.

A Named Fund in Church Extension work is $5,000 or more, of which a separate account is kept and a report made each year to the donor. The interest is kept in the Fund and practically compounds itself semi-annually. The Fund is named after the donor or anyone he may designate. A Named Fund is created by an individual giving $500 annually or by a church giving $300 annually. We now have thirty Named Funds, and we want to reach fifty by the Centennial. Scores of men and women in our churches could create these Funds. The Drake Fund started in 1889, has built sixty-eight churches, has earned $3,882 interest, and by the money going and coming has done the work of over $28,000. Let us hear from some of our wealthy people.

THE GREAT CENTENNIAL BOOK

"Historical Documents Advocating Christian Union"

This volume is the classic for this our Centennial year.
Probably more copies of it have been sold than of any other book published by the Disciples in the last Decade.
Its popularity is due partly to its beautiful make-up—the printer's and binder's art has done its best—but mainly to its contents. This is what it contains:

ALEXANDER CAMPBELL'S "SERMON ON THE LAW."
BARTON W. STONE'S "LAST WILL AND TESTAMENT OF THE SPRINGFIELD PRESBYTERY."
THOMAS CAMPBELL'S "DECLARATION AND ADDRESS."
ISAAC ERRETT'S "OUR POSITION."

CENTENNIAL OFFERING FOR CHURCH EXTENSION

It begins the First Sunday of September and should actively continue every Sunday of September and October until every missionary church has sent a liberal Centennial Offering.

PUT UP THAT MAP AND ORDER THOSE SUPPLIES

A poster-map and a post-card have been sent to every pastor or correspondent. Give the Map a Conspicuous place in your Auditorium and call attention to it. It shows a great work done by the Board of Church Extension. Fill out the post-card, ordering your supplies for the Annual Offering and send the post-card to G. W. Muckley, Kansas City, Mo. He will furnish up-to-date literature. It is attractive and the people will need it if you give it to them with a word of commendation.

IF INFORMATION IS GIVEN, MONEY IS GIVEN

People want the facts. We are criminally neglectful if we fail to give glowing facts to the brethren and thus fail to get money for the Extension of the Kingdom. The Church Extension Board has stirred up great activity in mission church building this Centennial Year by promising nearly $200,000 to 153 congregations to help them build. Let us help our Church Extension Board to pay these loans by rolling up a great offering for that work in the month of September.

LISTEN TO THIS: THINK HARD ABOUT IT

1.—1,248 churches have been helped to their buildings by the Church Extension Fund in 44 states.
2.—684 of these have paid their loans in full.
3.—Over $864,000 has been returned on loans, showing that the Church Extension Plan of having the money go out and, returning, go out again and again, is working beyond our fondest hopes.
4.—The Pity is that

ONLY 1,700 CONGREGATIONS

of our stronger churches have ever had fellowship in the annual Offering for Church Extension. Let us make it Unanimous This Year!

CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON AND HERBERT L. WILLETT, EDITORS

Some Minor Ideals for the Centennial

The Music; The Communion Service; The Preaching

As at no other moment in their history the Disciples of Christ will be scrutinized by the world at their Centennial convention next October.

During the five years in which the brotherhood has been preparing for the Centennial celebration certain aims have been kept before it which it was hoped would be realized ere the convention assembled, thus making the hundredth year the crowning year of the century. These Centennial goals have in some cases been attained, in others nearly so, and in all cases the endeavor has been rewarded by achievements for which the proudest need not blush.

So engrossed have our minds been in these substantial and primary matters that we have perhaps not given sufficient heed to the making of the Centennial itself. Charge of the great celebration has been given to a representative committee, whose wisdom, foresight, taste and tact can not be excelled by an equal number of men and women found anywhere.

The intricate problems of program making have been solved. And such a program! Such vast themes! Such men of mighty brain and heart to speak upon them!

Through these men and these themes the great, major and supreme ideals of our history will be voiced. On these paramount considerations we shall speak out our heart next week.

For the present we will be content to point out certain minor ideals which, we feel, should be embodied in the program and in the deportment of the multitude.

Among many we shall choose only three.

Of these the first in importance is the character of the music.

The representative churches of our brotherhood sing the great hymns. With the marvelous development of church architecture among us there has gone an equal development of taste and reverence in the service of worship. Great organs assist in carrying the people's praises up to God. While there is much yet to be criticised, justice requires the critic to acknowledge that our churches love the master-music of the spirit more than the sentimental and crude ditties which abide but for a day.

Yet in the matter of song it cannot be said that the best ideals of our churches have projected themselves into our conventions. Too often it has seemed that the singing was not integral to the spirit of the convention, but a mere means of resting the tired audience, a diversion from the essential business for which the people came together.

The great hymns of the deeper Christian exprience are shoved one side in our conventions by the inferior melodies of present day revivalism. And the manner in which our convention music is conducted too often partakes of the revivalistic model with its forced effects and bizarre features.

A convention like our Centennial should express the highest ideals of the brotherhood in taste and devotion, as well as in doctrine. Not only so, but its character should be such as to become typical for our whole brotherhood to follow, thus raising the standard of taste and devotion and spirituality among all the churches.

Upon no single item of the week's celebration should more time and intelligence be expended than upon the music. The hymns should be the great hymns, set to the great harmonies. The writing of clever "poetry" and the composition of puerile melodies for use at the Centennial should not be encouraged by the committee. An excellent plan would be for the committee to send throughout the brotherhood a list of the hymns that have been selected, or, better still, advance sheets of the program containing the words and music of the hymns, so that congregations everywhere might be familiarized with them.

Another ideal for the Centennial celebration concerns itself with the great communion service to be held on Sunday afternoon.

This has become the most conspicious feature of our national convocations in recent years. It always receives the most respectful attention of the newspapers and proves a blessing and an uplift to the thousands who participate in it.

Our democratic way of administering the communion, broadly opening the door for any who follow the Lord Jesus to eat at his table, is typical of our plea and program of Christian union. In that solemn hour differences are blotted out, conservative and liberal theologians melt their hearts together, problems of higher criticism and philosophy and creed are forgotten and all find their unity at the cross of Christ.

It is a wondrous beautiful service. What foresight in our Master to give it us! And its administration at our conventions has been singularly well conceived and executed, with but few exceptions. Taking into account the fact that the multitude is so great, the building often ill-adapted for such a service and many of the accessories such as would be found in a church building not at hand, it is remarkable with what decency and good order our conventions keep the sacred feast.

No in a vein of criticism, but of kindliest monition, would we call the attention of the committee in charge of this service to the great importance of its being given that distinction and dignity that are its due.

Our ideal for it would consecrate that Sunday afternoon to the communion service and that alone. We would check every proposal to utilize that hour in exploiting any cause, however sacred.

The custom of raising money for ministerial relief after the Lord's Supper has much practical beauty in it to commend it, but we believe that the prevailing methods of raising money at a public service tend to eclipse and erase the inner value of the hour spent at the cross.

Our modern Christianity is pragmatic enough. There is enough of the bee-hive characteristic in our church life, and our conventions are palpitating with practical energy. In the midst of the strain of mind and of heart, let us have one hour for the soul to be quiet, to take anew the measure of its need and possibilities in the light of Christ's cross.

The communion service should be that hour. When the meditation is done, let the people thoughtfully disperse, carrying with them the memory of the sacred feast undistracted by announcements and money begging or any other thing. In the long run such a service will enter into character and bring forth more money than if its quiet is broken in upon by hawking the needs of any cause, however holy.

As a third minor ideal for the convention we are hoping that our pastors who speak in the pulpits of Pittsburg and vicinity on Sunday morning will conceive their message and mission with due delicacy and dignity.

We are told that as many as five hundred pulpits will be offered to our ministers on that day. How stupendous an opportunity!

What will our ministers say?

It has been reported that a leading pastor of Pittsburg put forth an objection to this wholesale welcome of Disciple ministers on the ground that they would utilize tne occasion to exploit their proselytizing genius and so make trouble!

Whereupon it has been suggested that our ministers consistently refrain from speaking upon the things commonly believed among us distinctively, and speak only upon some phase of the gospel about which there could be no conceivable controversy.

Our ideal for this occasion involves the choice of a more difficult task.

To us the supreme achievement of that October Sunday morning would be for five hundred Disciple ministers to proclaim the great plea that has grown more reasonable with the growth of the just completed century,

And to proclaim it in such phrases and with such deep-sourced earnestness and such unimpeachable love as that every ill-informed or prejudiced soul that hears it will see that it is not a trouble-making plea, but a peace-making plea, not a divisive and sectarian plea but a unifying plea, not a program for proselytizing but a program for catholicizing, not the mocking call of the wolf who would steal the sheep but the aching-hearted call of the good Shepherd who is abroad today gathering together his "other sheep," that there may be one fold and one Shepherd.

This is a task worthy the finest soul-mettle of the sons of the fathers.

The Trend of Events

By Alva W. Taylor

THE YOUNG TURKS AND ARMENIA.

It looks like the Young Turks would be the salvation of poor Armenia. Their courts martial on the Adana massacres report that 95,800 deserve punishment, that 800 deserve death and 15,000 hard labor. They offer to cordon the city and go at the heroic task with a vim if it is so ordered, but recommend that, in view of present reconciliation, amnesty be proclaimed. Several of the leaders have already been hanged. The native Armenian may not be the most admirable of citizens, but he does not deserve massacreing. Whatever his faults, they are largely the result of age-long tyranny. The Turk is more to blame for his errors than he is himself. It is hoped the Young Turks will recompense for the sins of their fathers.

THE COST OF ACCIDENT INSURANCE.

Insurance may be considered a gamble wherein the policy holder considers he is betting so much per year against the stock company that promises to pay a certain amount if he loses, or it may be considered a mutual benefit affair wherein he offers to divide losses with his fellows. If he never loses, he is the gainer, and if he does lose he is yet the gainer. If he never loses he is the gainer because his total premiums are less than his loss would be and if he loses he is the gainer because his loss is reduced by so much as he draws on his policy. This is true if the insurance broker, the company, is not getting rich off his efforts at mutual protection. Forty-one Stock Accident companies show by their sworn statements that for every dollar paid in claims, $2.37 was spent for management and profits. It may well be asked whether the policy holder is not bound to lose here.

WINNING THEIR WAY.

The University of Cincinnati has for some years been giving technical students part time in the actual work of the shops, by an arrangement with machine and engineering firms. It is now proposed to apply the plan to the High Schools of the city. The boys would spend the first year in the school and thereafter one-half time in the shop. During the first year in the shop he would receive 10c per hour, the second year 11c, and the last year 12½c per hour. The plan is to have the boys work in pairs, taking turns of a week each in shop and school This plan of alternating will give the shop steady work and make the plan feasible from the factory standpoint. In the three years the student will have earned $552.75, and have a technical education embodying both the best theory and an actual application of it. Even if he did not desire to follow the mechanical or engineering profession learned, he would have a trained mind and could turn to his preferred vocation. He has meanwhile received an opportunity to work his way to a High School diploma.

ADMIRAL URIU ON UNDIVIDED CHRISTIANITY.

In an address in New York City, while in this country recently, Admiral Uriu of the Japanese navy, said: "Christianity produces civilization. I mean Christianity, not Congregational, Presbyterian, Episcopalian or any denomination, but Christianity itself. * * * I covet for Japan the power of Christianity." Japan cannot be divided by our traditions and prejudices. Missionaries cannot but lead in the quest for Christian union in face of the tremendous tasks in paganism. Last year the Congregationalists of America honored their annual convention by making one of their venerated missionaries moderator. This year the Presbyterians of England did likewise by electing J. Campbell Gibson of Swatow as their moderator. His address accepting the honor was a passionate appeal for Christian union, saying: "the churches across the seas have not been won by your watchwords of division." He pointed out that the Chinese martyrs of the Boxer rebellion did not die for the Westminster Confession, but for the cross, and plead that we "make real to ourselves and visible to the world the unity of the body of Christ."

PRESBYTERIAN STATISTICS.

The Presbyterian statistical report for the year is out. It shows a decided gain all along the line for that body of Christians. There was an increase of ministers from 8,951 last year to 9,023 this year, though there is a loss of twenty church organizations. There was an increase of 82,053 in membership as against less than 75,000 last year, and an average of 74,000 for the five preceding years. The net increase over all losses is reported as 21,657, a slight decrease from the average of the past several years. Their net increase six years ago was over 27,000, and four years ago 43,000. In this item of course accuracy is not quite possible. They have 1,206,000 in their Sunday-schools, as against 1,084,000 six years ago.

In the matter of stewardship they make even a better accounting. Every purely missionary enterprise shows an increase. Foreign missions receives more than a million and a half. Temperance received $133,000 against an average of $50,000 for the five preceding years. Education has received more than $3,000,000 during the past six years. The care of the churches has grown from $13,000,000 in 1904 to $15,700,000 in 1909, and the total for all purposes from $17,700,000 to $21,700,000 in the same period. The membership is now given as 1,321,386. It was 1,094,908 six years ago.

THE BAPTISTS AND SOCIAL SERVICE.

At the recent Portland Convention the Baptists appointed a permanent Commission on Social Service, five members to be elected each year. Such well known names as those of Profs. Rauschenbusch, C. R. Henderson and Shailer Mathews are among those elected. A temporary commission had been at work for a year preparing a report on what the Baptists were doing in the way of social service apart from the conventional religious work. They were compelled to report that they found little being done at all. Like most other denominations, Baptists have been content to preach to individuals in their congregations, support their missionary societies, hold evangelistic meetings, teach the Bible and the denominational tradition to the children and build churches wherever enough of like faith could be found to support it. All this is good and commendable, but it leaves, outside missionary work, the vast field of social endeavor pretty largely untouched. The great questions of labor, the family, the unchurched masses, the slums, etc., have been passed by with notice only here and there by individuals. It is recommended by the commission that classes be formed for the study of the social problems and to unite the members for actual coping with social conditions. A series of Social Service tracts will be issued following the general lines of the church and—the family—the community—wealth and industry—politics—social waste, etc. Prof. Henderson has already issued one under the title of "A Reasonable Social Policy for Christian People," and Prof. Dealy of Brown University, another on "The Ethical and Religious Significance of the State."

UNTAXED BILLIONS.

The Cook County Board of Review was asked by the Tax Reform Association of Illinois to assess $1,000,000,000 capital stock of certain Chicago corporations. The Board decided they had no legal powers to do so, but have made up a case to be passed upon by the supreme court of the state.

Mulhall reports that in Britain tax inequality runs as follows:

Class.	No. Persons.	Wealth.	Taxes Paid.	Taxes Due Under Equitable Arrangement.
Rich	680,000	$60,000,000,000	$190,000,000	$450,000,000
Middle	5,100,000	15,000,000,000	210,000,000	112,500,000
Working	38,220,000	5,000,000,000	200,000,000	37,500,000

It will thus be seen that the 75 per cent of the entire wealth of the nation that is in the hands of the rich pays less actual tax than do the working people on 6¼ per cent, their part of the national wealth. But in Britain practically all taxation is direct and with the income tax the propertied classes are more adequately assessed. In U. S. the indirect taxation bears most heavily on the common consumer and the ratio will be even more against him.

"Coin" Harvey gave figures a number of years ago to prove that the fringe of market gardeners around the city of Chicago paid more actual tax than the great corporations, trust companies, and big businesses within the "loop."

Ex-Pres. Benj. Harrison gave the Washington Day address at the Auditorium under the auspices of the Union League Club in 1898. He told the rich men of that millionaires' club in that public address that the fact that they were not paying their share of the taxes made more anarchists in Chicago than did all other forces combined.

TEMPERANCE NOTES.

The Frick steel mills will hereafter hire no drinking men. The order affects 6,000 workmen.

The Illinois Traction Co. operates cars through communities both "wet" and "dry." As a result, the thirsty from the "dry" find them a great boon as conveyances to the "wet." But the decent patrons do not agree and the company promises such treatment of drunken passengers that the cars will be as "quiet as a Sunday-school."

Prohibition now claims fifty-three cities of 20,000 or over, with a population totalling 2,350,000—all industrial centers. The workingman does not need his beer.

Some 3,000 members of the glass blowers union lost their jobs last year on account of prohibition. Dennis Hayes, their national president, says it will all be adjusted in the long run. It will require more milk and soda bottles.

Bonfort's Wine and Spirit Circular charges prohibition with $5,000,000 of the current treasury deficit. We could stand $246,330,000 more. It would save $1,500,000,000 to the pockets of the people for necessities and for harmless pleasure.

Alabama has passed a bill to make its state prohibition law a part of the constitution. Thus the "wave" recedes.

Great Britain is investigating the evils of drink in its East Africa Protectorate.

Six hundred fraternal orders in America debar saloonkeepers from their membership.

IS IT REVISION DOWNWARDS?

The Payne-Aldrich tariff bill is a law. The question is, "Is it revision downwards?" The sponsors for the bill tell the country that it is. The President says it is not all desired, but the best obtainable, and on the whole he thinks it is for the benefit of the consumer though he says it by no means reduces the taxes to the difference between the cost of manufacture abroad and at home. Champ Clark, the minority leader, produces figures to show that the average is a raise in rates of 1.7 per cent, with the worst discriminations against the commonest necessities and in favor of steel. There was a considerable republican vote against it in the House and seven Republican senators, including the old party war horse, Dolliver, voted against it as a violation of party pledges made before the election. Several others denounced the schedules, but voted for the bill. Senator Johnson, ardent champion of the bill, says it will not lower prices on commodities, but will bring an unprecedented wave of prosperity, while others predict it will bring no prosperity more than will come from the factories concerned resuming activities now with full knowledge of just what basis business can be done on. Others predict a democratic congress at the next election and point to the fact that every tariff-making party of recent years has suffered a reverse in the House at the succeeding election. It would appear to the layman that there have been a number of specific changes but practically nothing effected as to any general lowering of tariff rates. A better analysis can be made after maturer opportunity to analyze the new rates is afforded. It may prove that the appointment of a commission to aid the President in applying the maximum and minimum rates will prove the feature of the bill of permanent worth in that it will convince the country of the desirability of a permanent tariff commission of experts and in the end take the administrative features of tariff taxation out of the hands of the legislative body and of political consideration.

THE MORAVIAN PIONEERS.

The Moravians have been the pioneers in the mission field from the beginning. Since the days of Count Zinzendorf they have sought the most difficult and hopeless peoples and blazed the way for Christianity and civilization among them. From the arctic cold of Greenland to the torrid heat of Guiana they have braved every peril of climate and savagery to preach the good tidings to those that sit in great darkness. More than 2,200 missionaries have gone out from their ranks and they are but a small people. Today one out of every sixty-eight of their number is on the mission field. They were the first Protestant church to obey the great commission, and they have more than all others gone unto the uttermost.

Their General Synod has just adjourned at Herrnhut in Saxony. It was here that Zinzendorf established the Unitas Fratrum in the troublous days of the early eighteenth century. There the Brethren lived the simple Christian life and sent the best of their children to the regions beyond. One-half their membership is in the United States now, but their missionary spirit has outrun even their increased prosperity and they find their enterprise burdened with such a debt that they must retrench and deny some their commissions to go. They have been ever ready to turn fields they have opened to the stronger forces of other churches when they were ready to enter in while their missioners went to more difficult places, feeling it was their part to blaze the way. Would it not be Christian reciprocity for other churches to come to their rescue now?

This little body of 30,000 Christians give more than $400,000 annually for foreign missions. They support nearly 400 missionaries and over 2,000 native helpers on the field, and there are 100,000 professing Christians at their mission stations. Labrador, The Mosquito Coast, Inner Australia, Guiana, Africa, Alaska, and the borders of Thibet are among their fields. For a generation they have waited on the Thibetan frontier and are now rewarded with a small church of Thibetan Christians, the only one there is in existence.

Editorial

THE BIBLE today is the most popular book printed. More copies of it are sold each year than of any one hundred other books combined. The British and Foreign Bible Society alone, issued more than 5,000,000 copies of the Bible last year, and the American Bible Society more than 1,500,000. The total number of Bibles in English, produced each year is nearly 10,000,000 copies. And it was Robert Ingersoll who declared ten years ago that the Bible was an exploded book and within ten years would be an unread book.

THE Laymen's Missionary Movement is planning the greatest campaign of education that has ever been undertaken by the forces of Christendom. Sixty men's missionary conventions within six months is the plan. The conventions are to begin in the fall and will be held in half a hundred principal cities of America. This campaign will culminate in a National Missionary Congress in Chicago in April, 1910. This is the most marked sign of the world's conquest since the apostolic age. Leaders and missionaries of all Protestant boards will participate in this great campaign.

AMONG the many favorable comments which have come to our desk on Dr. Frederick D. Power's Christian Endeavor address at the St. Paul convention, the Advocate of Peace (Boston) calls it a "notable sermon." Dr. Power's subject was "War Against War." He showed that war is inhuman, unchristian and irrational. "The work of throwing the resources of nations and mighty forces of nature into engines of torture and destruction, to be used against creatures of our own flesh and blood, belongs to the malignity of demons, not to the spirit of man."

FROM the British Weekly we learn that Prof. George Adam Smith has been called to the principalship of the University of Aberdeen, Scotland, and that he will likely accept. "His academic tastes, his acknowledged position in literature, his oratorical power and his winning and genial manner should make him an ideal head of a great university." Dr. Smith has been lecturing at the University of Chicago and is now in Northwestern Canada. He will return to Scotland next month.

PRESBYTERIANS of the North have recently given their statistics for the past year, ending March 31. The present membership of the denomination is 1,321,386, a net increase of 21,057 for the year. The net increase in number of ministers is seventy-two. A loss of thirty-nine in the number of candidates for the ministry is reported. The total number of additions to the churches by confession of faith was 82,000, the largest in the history of the denomination. The comment is suggested that these additions register exceptional activity in steady pastoral evangelism inasmuch as the year showed no extraordinary activity of professional evangelism. All the missionary and benevolent societies report increased collections over last year, except the Church Erection Society and the cause of education, each of which showed a slight decrease. Over $5,000,000 was spent in regions beyond local congregations, and over $15,000,000 for congregational purposes. With a membership about equal to that of the Disciples of Christ, it will be interesting and instructive to compare the statistics of the two bodies when the figures for the Disciples are cast up next fall.

THE present writer wishes he might share with those readers of The Christian Century who were with him in Drake University a dozen years ago, the unstinted praises being heaped upon our friend Miss Susan Glaspell, whose first novel, "The Glory of the Conquered" was reviewed in our columns some weeks since. Undoubtedly Miss Glaspell has leaped at a bound into the circle of the best writers of modern fiction. From the day when William Dean Howells praised her for the originality of her type of short story her friends have been expecting great things from her. In this they have not been disappointed. The reviewers on the leading magazines have called the book one of the greatest novels of the year. The Interior in a lengthy appreciation of Miss Glaspell and her book says she "has produced one of the most noteworthy novels of the year. It is the kind of fiction that ought to be encouraged from the housetops! In a single phrase the book may be summarized as 'the story of a great love'—the kind of love that is deathless. Miss Glaspell has written powerfully and deeply, and her first novel bears promise of remarkable work from her pen in the future."

LAST September an interesting experiment in religious education was undertaken at the State University of Iowa. The pastors of Iowa City had requested that the demand for instruction in religion be met, offering their services, free of charge, as lecturers if suitable arrangements could be made. The request was favorably considered by the faculty of Liberal Arts, a committee of three was appointed to direct the work, and ministers were invited to submit courses, which, after approval by the committee were offered as electives in Liberal Arts. During the year six semester courses were offered by the various pastors, each course requiring two lectures or class periods weekly. For these courses there were seventy-four enrollments, most of the students completeing the work and receiving full university credit for it. A course that attracted much attention both locally and outside the university was that given by Rev. Carlos C. Rowlison of the Disciples' Church, on the broad subject, "Present-Day Religious Problems." This course was continued throughout the year, the only one carried for more than a single semester. A group of earnest students representing not the Church of Disciples alone, but various creeds and religious faiths, pursued the work with interest and profit. Mr. Rowlison's training and experience as educator as well as minister served him well in this work, absolutely new in a state institution. His zeal and intelligent enthusiasm are largely responsible for the inauguration of this phase of religious instruction in the university, and to him all friends of the movement feel deeply indebted. For the current year he will be assisted by the Rev. G. B. Van Arsdell of the First Christian Church of Cedar Rapids and a joint course will be given under the caption, Old Testament History and Literature.

A LETTER that goes straight to the editor's heart lies before us. It is written by a good woman in a far-distant state. She commends The Christian Century's "broad-minded, aggressive and progressive policy and its clear insight into the heart of things." Then she adds, "We have often been and are now forced into a church life so narrow, so far from touching the needs of the great struggling world today, that had not the new Century come into life as it did I doubt if we had been able to stay in the ranks. I hope and pray for its success, and if only my wearisomely delayed ship would come in I would heartily help to answer my own prayers. Most of the members here tremble in their boots when the names of our more scholarly and able men are mentioned, but both my husband and I have adult classes and hope to help some to saner thinking." This letter is typical of a large correspondence we receive. Disillusionment concerning the unreality and sectarianism of much conventional church life is more widely prevalent than many suppose. The pathos of the situation rests in the fact that some whose eyes are opened to the larger light grow indifferent to the church, cease to work with their brethren and even to attend the services. How much wiser and more Christian is the course chosen by our correspondent and her husband! Their deeper insight carries with it a graver obligation of service. They are precisely the ones needed in a "narrow" church. Their heart should be bigger than a sectarian's heart, their patience and tact exhaustless, until the leaven of their Christian temper and view shall leaven the whole lump. We are gratified to know that The Christian Century, while it speaks with utter frankness in criticism of much that has conventionalized itself in the present-day church, does, nevertheless tend to quicken the conscience of its readers as to their plain duty toward this institution in whose destiny are borne the hopes of the world.

ROMAN Catholicism impresses everybody with a sense of its power. Its vast organization, every part of which responds with amazing sensitiveness to its superior authority, is capable of doing almost anything to which it sets its hand. Beside it, Protestantism with its individualistic temper and divided forces seems puny. The world takes notice, therefore, of any sign which discloses the attitude of the Roman hierarchy on any public question. Slow to take up arms against any institutionalized moral evil, the Catholic church has allowed Protestantism to fight the Temperance battle alone. But signs which indicate that the Catholic church is awakening to its duty on the liquor question are appearing. That its vast power will be flung against the saloon in the end there is now little doubt. Already the vanguard of reinforcements has appeared upon the battlefield. The convention of the Catholic Total Abstinence Union of America held in Chicago recently proves that the Church does not intend to leave her Protestant brethren to win the victory without her aid. Nearly five thousand men, women and children marched down Michigan avenue in a splendid parade, answering the statement of Mayor Rose of Milwaukee that the church of Rome is not opposed to drink. The parade was reviewed by Auxiliary Bishop Rhode of Chicago with other ecclesiastical dignitaries. The speech-making in the Auditorium was as intense and uncompromising as the most vigorous enemy of the saloon could desire. Bishop Canevin of Pittsburg was one of the chief speakers. Before a vast throng he declared that "the Catholic church is unalterably opposed to the liquor industry, and the Sunday saloon looms up as one of the most menacing evils with which the American citizen is confronted." The effect of the Sunday saloon is the same as that of the Monday saloon—"to enrich the proprietor and to make millionaires out of the brewers and distillers." Judging from the Bishop's address, the place where the saloon business rubbed most acutely was in its natural tendency to nullify the sacredness of Sunday. Rev. P. J. O'Callaghan, head of the Paulist order and pastor of St. Mary's Church in this city, was elected president of the Union for the ensuing year. Father O'Callaghan has been prominent in Chicago affairs as an aggressive and militant priest.

INDIANA offers two superb combinations of Christian culture and physical recreation each summer. Our own Bethany Assembly held at Bethany Park is this year proving to be especially rich in spiritual and cultural inspirations. It probably approaches nearer to a national institution for our brotherhood than any enterprise of the sort yet attempted. A marked contrast between the program of last year and this will be observed in the matter of breadth and seriousness of theme and discussion—much to the advantage of the present year. We rejoice to hear of the gratifying attendance straight through the Assembly. The other summer gathering is that at Winona Lake, Ind.,—Presbyterian in its auspices, but interdenominational both in its program and the source of its attendants. The Bible Conference to be held at Winona beginning August 22 and continuing ten days offers a feast of the richest things for the soul. Many ministers of the Disciples of Christ "take in" this conference annually. This year England and Scotland send some of their famous preachers to the conference. The opening sermon will be preached by Rev. J. H. Jowett, D. D., of Birmingham, England. This sermon will be on "The Socialism of Prayer" and those who have heard this great English teacher are expecting a magnificent sermon. Dr. Jowett is next year's president of the National Free Church Council of Great Britain, and is probably the most influential Non-conformist minister in England today. Another Englishman will assist in making the first day of the conference a success—the pastor of one of the largest Wesleyan churches in Liverpool, the Rev. John Thomas, D. D., who will preach the evening sermon. The first day is but a type of the great days of the conference. Americans vie with English and Scotch in giving the program the stamp of worth. Among the well-known Americans who will speak are Dr. Frank W. Gunsaulus, Dr. Moorehead, Rev. William A. Sunday, Rev. Ira Landrith, D. D., Rev. E. Y. Mullins, Rev. W. E. Biederwolf, and Rev. Francis McConnell. The Disciples of Christ are represented on the program by our most successful evangelist C. R. Scoville, Mr. Herbert Moninger, Rev. P. H. Welshimer and Mr. W. C. Pearce.

Flora's Wedding Fees

Interpreting Some Experiences of a Minister's Wife

By Edgar DeWitt Jones

Flora is a very pretty girl and the wife of a Baptist minister. I am that lucky minister. Flora and I are young people,—"just kids" as good old John Walton, our modern Enoch, loves to call us. According to our college friends, Flora and I have "made good." At any rate, this is the phrase they use the oftenest when referring to my call at the age of twenty-seven to the Cincinnati pastorate of the Union Avenue Church.

To be frank, however, there are others whose comments on our coming here don't tally with the above. These others refer to me as "up against it," "too young to swing a city pulpit" and similar expressions.

I guess I do well not to forget any of these comments. Taken all together, they serve me as a sort of balancing pole as I try to walk the tight rope of a complex city pastorate.

But what I set out to write about was wedding fees—Flora's wedding fees. When I read to Flora the letter inviting me to the Union Avenue Church, the first thing she did was to clap her hands and exclaim:

"Oh, Rob, how nice! Just think of the wedding fees! Alice Rogers' amounted to $400 last year. (Alice is the wife of Sidney Rogers, one of our Buffalo pastors. They were in the university with us and we still keep up a chummy correspondence with them.) "I'll start a savings account and we'll have a nest egg for a trip; a cottage at Chautauqua, or most anything we want!" Thus Flora's tongue ran on enthusiastically.

"Well," commented I, "the fees in a city ought to beat our record in this place," (referring to the little village where we had been since my graduation). "How much have they totaled the three years we've been here, Flora? About fifty dollars?"

"Forty-two exactly, Rob, and I can tell you to a cent where I put it all. Why, I suspect we'll get more than that in a single fee sometimes in Cincinnati."

"Maybe so, but, Flora, remember the old adage: 'Don't count your chickens before they are hatched,'" and then I kissed her with all the ardor of a young parson who has been most graciously blest both as to wife and church.

We had been in our new field six weeks to a day when I had my first wedding.

A carriage drove up in front of the house and a flashily dressed couple got out and came up the porch steps. The bride was beribboned and fitted out like a bird of paradise and the groom was a veritable fashion plate model. They wanted the Episcopal ceremony and I read the service in the library with Flora and our maid acting as witnesses. When I had finished the groom, —I mean when I had finished the ceremony— the groom with a very grand flourish, handed me a long envelope of the size known as "legal." Murmuring my thanks and with all the Chesterfieldian grace I could muster, I bowed the couple out and then turned to Flora.

"Here," I said, handing her the envelope, "here's your fee; you open this, I'm afraid to."

Flora took it and started to tear the envelope open after her usual fashion of opening mail, then she stopped that process short off and picking up the scissors from the library table, very carefully pared off the end,—the way she says she used to open my letters before we were married.

"Rob, guess!" she cried, as her fingers felt their way into the opening. "Ten dollars," I ventured.

"Too low; I guess 'twenty,'" and then Flora pulled out—a one dollar bill.

"Well, of all the cheap couples, Rob," she exclaimed, "this one takes the prize. If this is a fair sample of city weddings I don't think my bank account will grow very fast."

I attempted to console her. "Remember, Flora," said I, "that a bad beginning makes a good ending."

"There you go again, with your old proverbs," she interrupted, "but honestly, Rob, think of it. One dollar for a wedding where the couple were arrayed like Solomon in all his glory. Oh my!" The humor of the thing was irresistible, and we laughed abandonedly.

Our first year at Union Avenue Church was not a big success in so far as Flora's wedding fees were concerned. Her bank book told the story in a few small figures. Just $68.00 to her credit and that represented twelve weddings, or an average fee of less than six dollars. Flora was disappointed.

"Rob," she inquired one day, "are city pastorates what they are cracked up to be? Honestly, now, are they; I mean as to fees, salaries and the like?" I thought for half a minute before replying, then said: "Well, Flora, they ought to be cracked all right enough, considering how much hammering we have to do to make them go up. But as to your fees, don't be discouraged. Be patient! All things come to them who"—— but I didn't finish it, for Flora's hand was over my lips and she kissed me on the nose as I turned away to answer the telephone.

When we were well into our second year with Union Avenue, I came home one day and immediately hunted up Flora, whom I found working on some doilies for the Ladies' League Bazaar.

"Flora," I said, "you are in line for a big fee at last. Alice Wheaton is to marry J. R. Ingraham, and, of course, I am to officiate." The Wheatons, I should explain, are the wealthiest members in Union Avenue Church. They have a fine house out in Avondale; come to services in a big automobile and are reputed to be millionaires many times over.

"Goody! Goody!" cried Flora, "when and where is it to be?"

"June tenth, and at the house. It will be swell all right."

"Yes, and what will I wear?" Flora frowned and looked troubled.

"You shall have a new gown for the occasion, that's what," I declared with much earnestness. "One doesn't get to attend millionaire weddings every week, much less officiate."

"You're the best boy ever!" spoke up Flora, as she patted my cheeks and tugged at the struggling lock of hair that hung over my forehead. "But you do need a hair cut bad," she added.

I got Flora the new gown and a new hat and gloves besides. Then I felt the need of a few things for the occasion also, so I bought a pair of gloves for myself and invested in a glistening pair of patent leathers. Getting ready for the Wheaton wedding cost us $87.00, according to the figures I read out to Flora a few nights before the great event came off.

"My, that's a pretty expensive preparation we are making," Flora observed, "and how much do you think the fee will be?"

"I am sure I don't know, Flora," I replied, "I never officiated in a millionaire's family before,—I can figure better on the proposition this time next week."

Flora was a long time making any further comment, but by and by she spoke. "Rob, if that man pays you less than $100.00, I hope he won't ever take membership with our church. I'll find it hard to be civil to him."

"Hush, Flora," I admonished, "don't talk that way. It will be a good sized fee, I am sure, but whether it is or not, it isn't right for you to take such a view of the matter."

"Isn't it?" Flora regarded me reprovingly. "Well, perhaps not, but I think a wedding fee should correspond with the pocket book, style of living and social rank of the—what is the term I want? O, yes, 'contracting parties,' so there!"

Yes "there," I agreed with Flora then and I do now, for however heretical Flora may be as to some things, I don't think any minister would question her orthodoxy on this particular and very practical question.

The Wheaton-Ingraham wedding was one of the social events of that season, society was out en masse. The elegant brown stone mansion was beautifully decorated for the occasion. The affair was brilliant and complete to the smallest detail. And mid that beautiful setting, Flora moved radiant in her new gown.

With a number of the men, I was upstairs putting on my overcoat, preparatory to leaving, when the best man sought me out,— "Here, doctor," he said, pressing a coin into my hand, "I almost forgot to give you this."

I dropped the money without so much as glancing at it into my waistcoat pocket, conscious at the time, however, that it could not possibly be more than a $20.00 gold piece.

It was not until we were rolling homeward in our carriage that Flora thought of the fee. She had been busy telling me of the many beautiful and costly presents.

"Why, Rob," she cried, "the bride got one check for $5,000.00. Just think of it! And, O yes, Rob,—the fee, what did he give you?"

"Don't expect much, and you will save yourself disappointment, my girl, I am sure it is not more than twenty dollars, and I am not certain it is that."

We were just passing beneath an arc light as I put the coin in Flora's hand and under the bright glow, the gold piece showed us its full value,—ten dollars.

Leaning her head on my shoulder, Flora burst into tears, "Why, Rob," she sobbed, "you gave that much to the preacher that married us and you had nothing, nor did you marry anything."

"Flora," I broke in, "Flora, I married a girl who is worth her weight in gold, that's what I did. Don't cry, girl, why all this is part of our experience."

"But, Rob, think of all the expense we've been to. Why, this won't quite pay for my hat, to say nothing about the rest. Oh Rob! Rob! Rob!"

I kissed her and comforted her as best I could, assuring her over and over again that the clothes we bought were necessary anyway. Then I think we went on as far as two blocks without either of us saying a word. It was I who broke the silence.

"Flora, this young Ingraham is coming into our church just as soon as they come back from their honeymoon. He has never been a member of any church."

Flora lifted her head from my shoulder. "And you will have to baptize him?"

"Certainly, Flora."

We rode a full block before Flora made further comment, then raising her tear-moist face to mine, she said quite demurely,

"It would never, never do for me to be a Baptist preacher, Rob. I'm not good enough. I'm too wicked. Why, if I were in your place when Mr. Ingraham comes to be baptized, I'd hold him under the water a long time, a mighty long time, that's what I'd do, Rob!"

Flora's inning came at last, came too, when we were not expecting it. One Monday morning about two months after the Wheaton-Ingraham wedding, I answered a call at the telephone.

"Is this Rev. Bradley's residence?"

"It is," I replied.

"Is this Rev. Bradley talking?"

"Yes!"

"Well, will you come over to the parlors of the Emery Hotel right away and marry a couple?"

"I will." I answered. "I'll come at once."

In less than half an hour I was in the parlors of the Emery Hotel, where I found waiting me an elderly couple from across the river in Kentucky. According to the license, the groom was fifty-six and a bachelor. The minute I saw him I was struck with his resemblance to the familiar cartoons of Uncle Sam. He had the same good-natured cast of countenance; the chin whiskers were perfect and only the patriotic habiliments were needed to make the impersonation complete. As it was, he wore a new black suit, a Prince Albert coat, and no necktie.

The bride was forty-seven, comely and a widow. She had on a black silk dress. Both were superlatively happy and extremely nervous.

No sooner was the ceremony said, than the groom hastily fished out of his inside coat pocket a bulky envelope which he thrust into my hands, thanking me at the same time profusely.

"Silver dollars," I thought as I felt the bulk and weight of the package, "four or five of them, too." "Thank you, sir," I said, "and best wishes to you both," and with this I left the parlor, took the elevator for the office and started to leave the building. On my way across the lobby, I took a good look at the envelope I was carrying, and my curiosity got the upper hand. I stepped into a convenient telephone booth and opened the envelope. It contained five twenty dollar gold pieces.

I spread out the big yellow discs on the phone desk and stared at them for some seconds. It was a new experience and I enjoyed it. Then gathering them up, I put them carefully in an inner pocket. Next I took the receiver down.

"Central," I said, "Please give me South 248."

"Is that you, Flora?"

"Yes, what is it, Rob?"

"Flora," I cried excitedly, "I've just received a one hundred dollar wedding fee."

"Rob, you are joking."

"No, I'm not, I'm coming home to prove it, too."

"You'd better," advised Flora, as she hung up the receiver.

After I had described minutely for the second time that couple, and Flora had stacked up the double eagles for the tenth, she inquired of me quite coyly,

"Rob, appearances are deceitful isn't scripture, is it?"

"Not exactly, Flora."

"Well, isn't there something in the Old Testament about men looking on the outward appearance?"

"Yes, Flora, that's there, all right, 'man looketh on the outward appearance, but the Lord looketh on the heart.' But why do you ask?"

"Because, Rob, I want you to get up a sermon from that text and preach it about once every year," replied Flora, still playing with the shining coins.

going to try it again. Our big machine would stop at a corner. We would stand up and sing some good old hymn and then one of us would preach. Hundreds of just the kind of men we wanted to reach swarmed up around us. They listened. They were respectful. They applauded a telling point. They were the men who never go to church. You should have seen how they drank in the story of the Prodigal Son, or listened to the story of a father's search for his lost daughter in a great city as God the Father searches for us now. There were about seven men in our auto; ministers and laymen, and we spoke a number of times. I believe 2,000 different men and women heard us in one evening. I shall not soon forget how, in a narrow street with great brick walls rising on either side, the volume of our song rolled out and up. "Look ever to Jesus. He'll carry you through," we sang, and the windows opened and the streets filled. If the churches are empty during the conventional sermon and service, remember that the streets and parks are full. Why should you not go where the people are? In Cleveland, Dr. Eaton, during his pastorate, spoke from a stone pulpit in the public square at noontime. Other men like E. W. Allen rent theaters and preach there to hundreds of people. Others may be able to attract people in crowds to their churches all the year round. It depends upon the community. Certainly not all the people are away at once, and in many places as many come as go to spend the vacation. At least we should be very sure that the motive that inspires summer laxity is not laziness and carelessness.

In another church laymen are preaching while the pastor is away. These men have some big ideas and they are launching them very acceptably at this time. These laymen either have returned from their outing or have not yet gone and are very glad to voice their convictions.

Thus in park, street and pulpit the layman's voice may be acceptably heard during these summer months.

One other phase of midsummer work remains to be mentioned. In almost countless places this summer our Men's Clubs are rallying the men for fellowship. A stag dinner in the park, a stag trip down the river, a gathering on some great lawn, are some of the ways. Other clubs are trying to interest the fellow without a home, the boarding house chap, most pitiable of men.

Thus there is plenty of work for the summer. Laymen in all our churches, rural and urban, small town and great city, have great opportunity for service during these warm weeks, when the Devil is at work and the average Christian says, "Goodbye God, I'll be back in September."

Our Church Men

By John Ray Ewers

The Church and Vacations

It is now strictly the mid-summer. People are away on vacation. Churches are in most instances all but empty, while the cottages, tents and hotels at lake, seashore, mountain and cool resort are filled. There are some of the Russell Sage type who do not believe in vacations and who go on piling up meaningless gold—for their wives or someone less interested to spend. There are many others who take to the vacation idea because it is the popular thing and who spend the earnings of a year in two weeks of extravagant living. Somewhere between is the safe and sane vacation, planned with just two ideas in view, first to secure much needed rest, and, second, to see something new and thus to gain new impressions. Many Americans take their vacations as they do their work and come home completely worn out.

Meanwhile, what of the church? Expecting a slump, advertising a slump, it usually gets a good one. Is this needful? W. F. Rothenberger of the Franklin Circle Church in Cleveland seems to think not, if the papers are to be trusted. He insists that the summer slump is unnecessary and he has accordingly planned a strenuous and attractive program for his congregation and seems to be successful in demonstrating that the church does not need to go to pieces every summer.

This experiment of Rothenberger's ought to set us to thinking. People need religion in the summer fully as much as in winter. In fact we are told by criminologists that crime increases in the hot weather. Certainly we would all agree that temptations are never so strong as in summer. Parks, beer gardens, bathing beaches, dance pavilions, cheap theaters, and many other resorts both good and bad are crowded with pleasure seekers. Liberty many times gives way to license. Many do not know where to draw the line in pleasure seeking and the Devil gets in his work.

"But people simply will not go to church during the heated term," you say. Ask Rothenberger. But even if you cannot get them to come, why not take the church to them? Too long we have said "come." Now it is time for us to "Go." For several years we have followed the custom here in Youngstown of following the band concerts in the parks with ten-minute sermons intensely biblical and evangelistic. The results have been good. An evangelist, who was very sane, and who succeeded in attracting to himself the wealthy people of the town, talked under the trees in the park to hundreds of people. His meeting was wonderful in its results.

I had my first experience in preaching from an automobile one evening recently. I am

Truth

Truth is the quest of all honest men; and even when honest men are mistaken in the main errand, the sacred toil through which they pass to their error, gives them character out of the eternal spirit. The Civil War is a symbol of the nineteenth-century. The South fought the North on a mistake; it fought with complete honesty and with unsurpassed valor and sacrifice; it was defeated; the cause was a lost cause; but the tremendous toil, the sacred sacrifice through which it passed conferred upon our brothers in defeat a character that has become part of the strength and treasure of the nation.

Chicago

Summer Outings for the Poor at Camp Good-Will

By O. F. Jordan

In the suburbs of Chicago the greatest social extremes live side by side. Here the rich retire to live upon their money. Here many of the poor must needs follow to wait upon the rich. In the suburbs, the class distinctions of a great city are closest drawn. We find not only the genuine blue-blooded aristocrat with many generations of worthy family history behind him, but also the new-rich, the parvenue and the snob.

In beautiful Evanston we find no exception to this general status of suburban life. Hence the story we are about to tell of a social work that is being carried on is the more remarkable as indicating the inroads that democratic ideas are making even in sections where we might expect least progress.

Seeking Air and Sunshine.

We went up to Camp Good-will the other day with the ladies of the local church. It is located in a vacant block at the extreme north end of the suburb. There were about twenty family tents and a number of larger tents that we learned were used for the commissary department and one tent for an assembly tent. On entering the grounds we met children everywhere. They literally swarmed about us. We did not need to be told they were not Evanston children. They were foreign, poorly fed and shabbily clothed. Their manners were not better than their clothing. As we proceeded farther we met sad-eyed mothers carrying infants that were blue and scrawny. One might well ask where all of these strange folk came from.

Mother and Children Enjoying Health-giving Conditions.

On consulting the card index, we found that these people were gathered from the congested districts of Chicago. Most of them came from the stock-yards district, where there is hardly a blade of grass or any of the comforts that seem essential to us. Because of poverty, the ice and pure food supplies that are essential to the life of growing children were not to be procured. The children in these districts die like flies in the summer time, and as mothers fight the ineffectual fight for their children's lives, they lay the foundation for their own future illness and death. Camp Good-will is furnishing to such as these country air, clean, wholesome food, and, above all, some lessons in domestic hygiene that these ignorant people so much need.

How Cared For.

As we examined the card index farther we learned that there were at the camp this week a hundred and twenty-four people and the week before there had been more. Who fed this company of people, and at what expense? We had given money for years to the fund of Camp Good-will, but never before did we realize how economically it was expended. The camp is conducted for eight weeks each summer. It costs about three hundred dollars a week. This means that the total cost of keeping these people in the camp is about two dollars a week per person. Many of us would like to know how to introduce such economy in our own household administration.

Mr. O'Farrell, the superintendent, is a resourceful young man. In the grounds of the camp are a group of boys who are what the novice would call "bad." On this particular day, they were developing fights much like those that occur in their native habitat. The superintendent remarked to us, "We will have to get these boys busy." Down to the lake women and children went and for an hour they sported in the water and enjoyed themselves to the full. Most of them live too far from the lake at home to use it. This solved the boy problem for some hours. Then trouble began to brew again. The superintendent organized two rival ball teams. He himself was the umpire. Young Chicago tried to deceive him in the game, but he was quick to hand adverse decisions to the wrong-doer. The game was hotly contested, with much applause from the side lines. The hot, panting boys went off to lie under the shade trees till supper. The "bad" boy was taken care of for one day. Perhaps the remedy would fit some boys not reared in the slums.

A Fine Service.

At noon and at evening, the ladies of the church waited tables. The table manners of our Chicago guests were a revelation to all of us. Our own children have seemed like dolls ever since. But it was good to see those hungry people eat a meal that seemed quite frugal to us, though so much better than these visitors have been having. We remembered the Man of Galilee girded about with a towel, as we saw these Christian women of the church with their refinement waiting upon the poor denizens of the slum. A democrat could weep for joy at the sight. After being a servant to such as these, can these women ever again treat their own servants as of a different flesh and nature?

That evening we gave a literary and musical program for the camp dwellers. All turned out to the assembly tent and our church members were mingled in the congregation with the visitors. The crowd was a free and easy one. Approval was expressed audibly in word with no sense of impropriety. If a number was not right, it was promptly hissed. Those who were pleasing, however, received the most fulsome compliments of their kind. These unspoiled children were not blasé. They could feel and as music played upon their emotions they could laugh or cry without shame. Some of us envied them that night the power to feel as they felt.

Significance of the Enterprise.

As we went home, we seemed to see the larger significance of the whole enterprise. Here was another illustration for our badly worn sermon on Christian Union. The movement was started by the little Unitarian church, not half so large as ours. They had to turn it over to the larger forces, though they still co-operate. Now every church has proper representation on the board. The Catholics elect delegates to sit with the Christian Science delegate, and the Baptists elect a man to take counsel with the Unitarian representative. Here was Christian union on a bigger scale than we had ever preached it. Had our sermon been too conservative? Have we preached less than the Spirit of God is bringing to pass?

A Lesson in Democracy.

Here again was a lesson in democracy. In a town where the "maid" has long been an object of secret or even expressed contempt on the part of many, the best people of the town are ministering with their hands to those who are in every way inferior to the servant class of our town. It was thus that the Master intended it and no sermon could speak so eloquently Christ's ideal of human brotherhood as this demonstration of it for ever so little a time.

Again, we meditated, those who say the church is doing nothing for the poor have an answer here. Christian people have long done their charity through secular organizations, only to hear the sneer, "The lodge does more good than the church." In Evanston the church no longer hands all of her money over to secular organizations to do good with. It is learning that a united church can administer even more economically its own funds and secure the appreciation of the unchurched masses who have never understood or appreciated the secret charities of the church.

Our joy was tempered for this evening, however, by reflecting how little after all we were doing. We were treating some symtoms and not the disease. These people were ignorant. Their children must not be

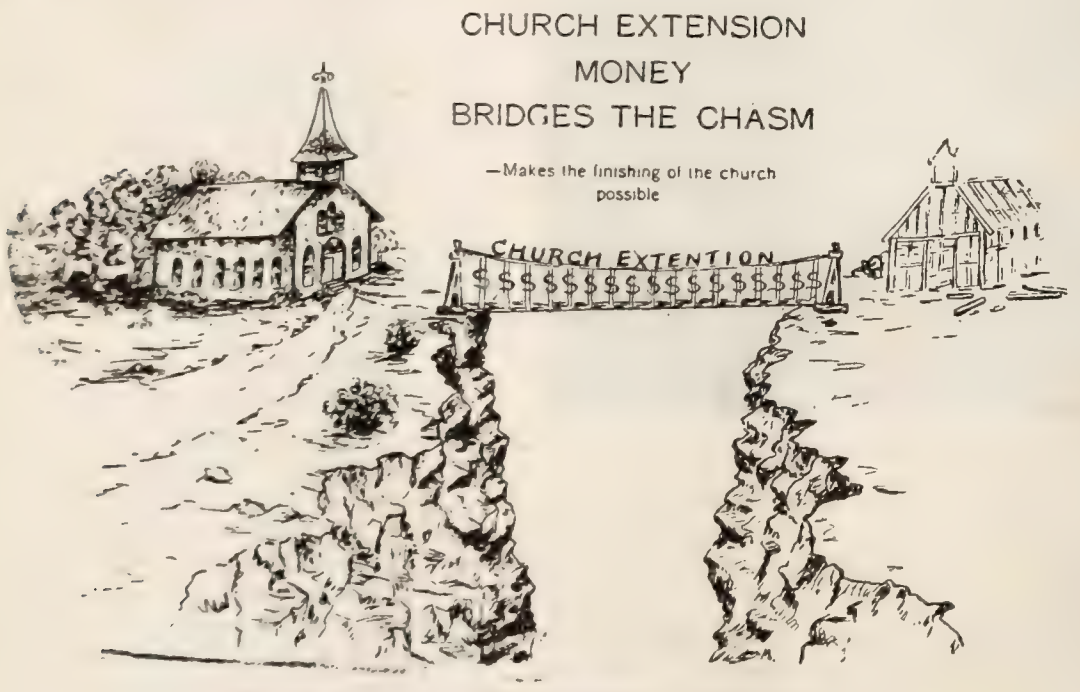
A Symposium

Bridged the Chasm at Blackwell, Oklahoma



By G. M. Weimer

The Church of Christ in Blackwell, Okla., has had a hard struggle through all the years, since its organization shortly after the opening of the strip. It has been very fortunate, however, in selecting preachers. Too much cannot be said of the blessed service of the Church Extension work. I am reminded also how Brother Muckley came to Huntington, W. Va., when it seemed that we were doomed and no day-light appeared. The loan there, too, saved the church. God bless the Church Extension as led by Brother Muckley.

Blackwell, Oklahoma, Helped by $2,000 Loan.

A time came about two years ago when to succeed there had to be made a strenuous effort. Noble sacrifices were made, and still something had to be done. The Church Extension Board came to our relief and the loan thus secured bridged the chasm, and we now have a beautiful structure and are having the greatest success in the history of the church. Lately a meeting was held in which 250 new members were added. We now have about 450 members. The building gave us a place in the community and was very largely the cause of our success.

Service

That man is great, and he alone,
Who serves a greatness not his own,
For service and delight,
Content to know, and be unknown;
Whole in himself.

Strong is that man, he only strong,
To whose well-ordered will belong,
For service and delight,
All powers that in the face of wrong
Establish right.

—Owen Meredith.

If, for the fall of man, science comes to substitute the rise of man, it means the utter disintegration of all the spiritual pessimisms which have been like a spasm in the heart and a cramp in the intellect of man.—Oliver Wendell Holmes.

It is to you, who are grown men, noble and honorable, that the whole world calls for new work and nobleness. Oh, it is great, and there is no other greatness,—to make human hearts a little wiser, manfuller, happier and more blessed.—Thomas Carlyle.

The Little Sod Church on the Prairie

Away out on the prairie,
In fair Oklahoma land,
Where the sunshine beams so brightly,
And the outlook is so grand,

'Mid quiet scenes of beauty
A Christian temple stands,
Whose walls have been erected
By willing hearts and hands.

It has no "storied arches,"
Or nicely frescoed walls;
No lofty marble columns,
Or dimly lighted halls;

No nicely painted windows,
No chandeliers swung high;
No lofty tower or steeple
Points upward to the sky;

But all is plain and simple—
The walls are built of sod—
And thither come the people
To meet and worship God.

'Mid scorching heat in summer
And wintry winds of strife,
They come, the hungry-hearted,
To hear the words of life.

When winter's winds are fiercest,
They keep the cold at bay,
And warm their shivering bodies
With fire of twisted hay.

While fires within the soul are fed
In flames that do not falter,
With fuel laid by unseen hands
Upon an unseen altar.

God meets His chosen people here,
In this, His temple lowly,
And human hearts are made to feel
That every place is holy.

The Spirit from on high descends
Upon His glorious mission,
To work in unregen'rate hearts
Repentance and contrition.

And when the Judge shall re-appear,
In majesty and glory,
How many souls will love to tell
The plain and simple story,

How first they found the Lamb of God,
And felt their sins forgiven,
Within this temple built of sod,
This very gate of heaven.

—J. R. B., in Prairie Pioneer.

Everywhere, O Truth, dost thou give audience to all who ask counsel of thee, and at once answerest all, though on manifold matters they ask thy counsel. Clearly dost thou answer, though all do not clearly hear. All consult thee on what they will, though they hear not always what they wish. He is thy best servant, who looks not so much to hear from thee that which he himself desireth, as rather to will that which from thee he heareth.—Augustine.

Every gift that declines to serve is no inspiration of God, but has lent itself to some Satan promising it all the kingdoms of the world and the glory of them.—Martineau.

No Growth in Court Houses and Opera Houses

By I. W. Lowman

It gives me pleasure to give you a short sketch of the history of the Christian Church in Arkadelphia, Ark.

This church has had a hard struggle for an existence for over twenty years, for want of a house in which to worship. The home of the church during these years has been in private houses, the court house, the opera house and a small chapel in a disastrously poor location. Recently the Church Extension Society came to the rescue of the church in a loan of $1,200, which enabled the congregation to purchase the house of worship vacated by the Baptist Church when they went in their new building. This house is a brick structure with a seating capacity of 700 people. It is centrally located, being only a block from the postoffice. It cost the congregation $2,500 and is now worth three times that amount. With a few hundred dollars improvements we will have as good and convenient a house of worship as any church in the city. This great victory for our cause could not have been possible but for the timely aid of the Board of Church Extension. With the advantage of a good house the substantial growth of the church is guaranteed. Opposition to the Christian Church is strong and comes from a class of people that persists in calling us "Campbellites." We have tried to correct this, but it is almost as difficult as converting sinners. This opposition is not due to ignorance, nor is it a retort courteous, but a malignant form of religious persecution.

Church at Arkadelphia, Ark., Helped by Loan of $1,200.

The above cut gives a very good view of our house. The entire congregation and its friends are very grateful to the Board of Church Extension for this timely help.

The Real Work of Church Extension

By Lillian Bird

Less than two years ago the Cristian Church of Anderson, Mo., was organized with a membership of thirty, but with a zeal that would do credit to several times that number.

A bitter opposition was everywhere encountered and it was with the greatest difficulty that land was secured for a building site when it became known for what purpose it was to be used—no lots were for sale. At first no property owners were numbered among the members, especially no business men, and no building was open to members of the Christian Church for meeting purposes. A Bible-school was organized and sessions were held at private houses, in the open air or in any old building to which we could gain an entrance for a month or more.

It finally became absolutely necessary that we have a place of our own in which to meet or give up entirely. In the meantime all the money possible had been collected, a building site secured and a concrete building begun. At this time, W. S. Hood, of Clinton, held a two weeks' meeting for us, during which our membership was nearly doubled, but our financial condition remained practically the same.

Anderson, Mo., Aided by a Loan of $1,200.

While situated in one of the most productive regions of the Ozarks, it has been but a short time since the natural resources of the country have been considered and a systematic course of development begun. Our hope lay in the fact that a majority of the progressive people that were buying homes here, were members of the Christian Church, and would, as soon as they had time to market a crop, be of great financial assistance.

Yet for the time being the church was at a stand-still, as the few who had borne the burden from the beginning felt that they could go no further.

At this juncture, Brother Joseph Gaylor, came to us for a few days and after making careful inquiries as to our needs and hopes, suggested that we apply to the Board of Church Extension for aid.

We did so, and after a short delay, were informed that our loan had been granted. This was, indeed, good news, as we felt that we could now clear our church of all the small debts that had been such an annoyance.

The help extended meant much more to us than just the number of dollars received as it has greatly encouraged us and so lightened our financial burden that it enables us to give the necessary time to the spiritual side of our work; and thanks to the Extension Fund, we now have a church home, which, though small and plain, yet meets our immediate wants. We hope to enlarge and beautify it as occasion demands.

allowed to grow up ignorant. They lacked the knowledge of many common decencies which can only be imparted by personal touch as in the social settlement. They were poor. If part of the poverty was due to mismanagement the wages in the district explain the rest. A few dollars to Camp Good-will may ease some Pharisee's conscience to continue to pay starvation wages. If he is not altogether at ease, he will after a while build us a public building. Not thus can we stop a slaughter of infants in the slums worse than that of Herod. Not thus can sad-faced women be made to smile again. Our social remedies must go deeper than Camp Goodwill, excellent as that is to meet an emergency.

Chicago Church Notes

E. W. Darst, former Superintendent of Missions in Chicago is visiting the city and was to preach for the Irving Park church on August 15. He was the founder of several of our good churches.

Austin Hunter began his ministry at Jackson Boulevard on August 15. It is understood that he will move to the city soon and from this on lead this great church in its enterprises.

The Evanston church will have Virgil Burch teach the shorthand and typewriting in their night school this coming winter. He is a graduate of the Tri-State normal of Angola.

Nearly every church in Chicago will be represented at the Centennial convention in October. The largest number of delegates reported from a single church is from Englewood, twenty-three.

Summer Time

BY EMMA A. LENTE.

All the land is full of laughter:
  And the children follow after
Bees and butterflies and birds,—
  Singing songs that need no words—
Carrollings of joy and glee
  For the desk and book set free:
Filled with jubilance of living,
  All their loving hearts out-giving
Thanks to Summer for its pleasures,
  And its fruits, and flower treasures.

All her wealth dear Mother Nature
  Spreads for every living creature;—
From the insects in the grass,
  To the wayfarers who pass,
Giving without stint or measure
  Food and drink and warmth and leisure:
From the glory of the hills,
  To the little crooning rills,—
Life and joy and charm and sweetness,
  Summer in its full completeness!

Capturing a Kitten

BY FRANK SWEET.

One bright day in May, when I was about thirteen years old, and my brother Charley was a year older, we started out together to visit the children on a farm about four miles distant. Charley walked, his gun on his shoulder, and I rode our old white horse, Bob.

I did little more than keep pace with my brother. I had been his companion ever since he had been allowed to have a gun. I had gone with him on his hunting expeditions to carry the game, and the old horse was often with us on our wanderings through the woods.

We lived on a large farm high up among the mountains of the coast range of California. The country was very sparcely settled, and a visit to a neighbor meant a jaunt of several miles. I had learned to shoot well, but as we had but one gun, and Charley was a boy, he usually claimed the right to the gun when we went hunting.

The mountains were full of deer, wildcats and "coons." California lions and panthers were occasionally seen, to say nothing of rabbits, quail and such small game.

On this day we left the house at about nine o'clock. We trudged and jogged pleasantly along, but Charley did not kill even a squirrel, and I took pains to tease him about his bad luck.

We spent the day with our young friends, and started on our return at about four o'clock in the afternoon.

After we had left the main road and taken the trail toward home, Charley turned off into the woods to try to redeem his reputation as a hunter. I might have followed him, but I was in haste to get home. So I touched up old Bob with my whip, and jogged along down the lonely bridle-path.

Just as I was following a bend in the road, a mile and a half beyond the place where Charley and I had parted, something attracted my attention in what appeared to be a pile of leaves bedded in the hollow roots of a great oak. The object appeared to shine.

I turned my horse toward it to get a closer view, and then discovered that the shining came from the bright eyes of several beautiful little creatures which I at first took to be large kittens; but when I dismounted I found that they were the cubs of a mountain lion!

I was delighted. I had always had a fondness for kittens, and these little animals were much prettier than any kitten. They were plump and most beautifully marked. They got up and began to gambol and play with each other in the most innocent and engaging manner.

What ideal pets! Instantly the thought came to me, "Why not capture them and take them home?" Here would be glory for me, to be sure. How I would triumph over Charley!

I stooped over and picked up two of them; there were four in all.

I had much difficulty in mounting my horse with the baby lions in my arms, for they wriggled and scratched and did everything in their power to prevent me from carrying them off; but at last I was in the saddle, and started off. Fortunately my horse knew the road and was perfectly safe; so I merely threw the bridle over my arm, and held a crying kitten in each hand.

How they did meow and squall! First one and then the other, and then a duet!

All at once, in the midst of all this yelling of the cubs, the thought flashed across my mind that the mother would probably come home, and finding two of her babies gone, go in quest of them; and here I was, creeping along on a slow old horse, three miles from home, with two young lions. It was about time to wake up old Bob!

I looked for my whip. It was gone. Probably I had dropped it in my attempts to mount.

Here was a new difficulty. It was impossible for me to get off and on again with the big kittens in my arms, and the old horse would trot along for only a few steps, and then subside into his usual slow walk. It was only by dint of hard kicking and fierce jerking of the bridle that I contrived to get him into an occasional fair trot.

We had gone about a mile farther, and I was cuffing one of my kittens into submission, when I heard what I fancied was a growl behind me.

I turned, but could see nothing. Nevertheless, I felt a little nervous, and kicked my feet against the horse's sides more vigorously than ever.

We went on about two rods, when I heard the same noise again. This time I thought I could not be mistaken, and I was not. Turning, I saw, to my horror, that a large California lioness was coming at a dead run not one hundred yards behind me.

Every few steps she uttered a horrid growl, and she looked really fiendish. My heart stood still, but I did not give up. Old Bob, too, heard the noise, and increased his speed to the best pace he had.

Of course the little lions has caught the sound. They meowed and cried louder than ever. This excited the mother the more, and she redoubled her growls.

I dared not look around, but very soon it was not necessary for me to turn in order to see her. She was right by my side, and glaring at me in the most frightful manner.

There was nothing else to do; I took one of the kittens and threw it at the mother lion; and I threw it very hard, hitting her full in the face.

I fully believed that the old lioness would keep on and compel me to give up the other young one also, and I was astonished to see her seize this one in her mouth and make off as fast as possible toward her lair.

This was very pleasing, but I was perfectly certain that the old lioness would come back after the remaining one. And unless I could get home, which was not probable, or should meet some one who had a gun, which was not probable, either, she would get it away from me.

I shouted louder still at old Bob, and almost stood up in the saddle in my excitement; but the poor old horse was already going about as fast as he could go. He seemed to appreciate the emergency, but he was getting badly winded.

We went on about three-quarters of a mile more. It occurred to me that I might keep the kitten from continually announcing our whereabouts to its mother, so I propped its mouth open wide with my fingers, and this stopped its crying.

We were making pretty good time, and I was beginning to feel a little reassured, when I heard the leaves crackling behind me. I knew what was coming, and did not look around. I kept on, determined to hold the kitten at all hazards.

Very soon, however, I heard the old lioness much closer than I had expected, and turned around just at the moment that my horse made a violent plunge forward. The lioness had dug her forefeet into the horse's thighs, preparatory to leaping upon his back.

With a terrified scream, I flung the kitten away with all my might. The lioness released her hold on the horse, and taking this kitten in her mouth as she had taken the other, uttered a growl, and with a savage glare at me, disappeared in the thick underbrush.

Trembling with fright, and chocked with indignation to think that after all my efforts I could not keep even one of the pretty little creatures, I continued my ride home.

I reached the gate soon, and in a few moments related my adventure at the supper table. Before I had finished Charley burst into the room, holding aloft a young lion!

My heart bounded. He had captured my kitten! In great excitement he began to tell his story. He was just returning to the trail from his hunt in the woods, when he met face to face the mountain lioness, bearing her young one in her mouth. Both were very much startled, lioness and boy: but Charley recovered his presence of mind first, and raising his gun, fired, killing the she-lion instantly.

He then picked up the little one, and also succeeded in dragging the mother a short distance. He left her just at the edge of the woods and ran home with the living cub to get help.

Charley magnanimously gave me the baby. Of course I was a little crestfallen, feeling that I had lost my share of the glory, but I was commended and complimented, after all.

I kept the little lion three years. We fed him on bread and milk, and as he grew he showed no signs of his wild nature. He played amicably with the dog, and was on good terms with all the family.

One day, however, I unfastened his chain to give him exercise, and one of the first things he did was to kill a chicken. It was his first taste of blood. After that he committed some depredation whenever he was let loose. He grew sullen and morose.

At last he bit a little girl who came to visit us, drawing blood, which he lapped eagerly. She was alone with him; and when we heard her cry and ran out, we found that the cub had thrown the child down, and was resting his paws on her body.

He was killed at once. I felt a few severe pangs at his death, but we saved his skin. Charley had already tanned the skin of the mother. We had the cub's skin treated the same way; and now, when my mother tells the story of our youthful experience, as she often does, she points proudly to the two beautiful robes—the spoil of her children's lion hunt.

The Drummer Boy of Shiloh

An interesting story is told of the way Colonel John L. Clem, the famous "drummer boy of Shiloh" and now assistant quartermaster general, got into the regular army. In the early days of General Grant's first term as President, Clem, without aid, secured an audience.

The President said, "What can I do for you?"

Clem said, "Mr. President, I wish to ask you for an order to admit me to West Point."

"But why," said the President, "do you not take the examination?"

"I did, Mr. President, but I failed to pass."

"That was unfortunate," said the President. "How was that?"

"Why, Mr. President, you see, I was in the war, and while I was there, those other boys of my age were in school."

"What!" said the President, amazed. "You were in the war."

Clem was then scarcely eighteen and boyish looking.

"Yes, Mr. President, I was in the war four years." And he related his experience.

The President then wrote something, sealed it, and, handing it to Clem, said:

"Take this to the Secretary of War. I guess it will fix you all right."

Clem went to the Secretary, to whom he had already applied, and was received somewhat coldly. He delivered the note. The Secretary read it and said:

"Do you know what this is?"

"No," said Clem, "but I suppose it was an order to admit me to West Point."

"Well, it isn't," said the secretary, "It's an order to commission you second lieutenant in the regular army."—Leslie's Weekly.

The Angel Boy

[From the Atchison Globe.]

Not many weeks ago an Atchison woman gave a party for grown-ups, and one fond mother took her Angel Boy. There was ice-cream, and the Angel Boy put his dish on the parlor floor and smattered it on the carpet, and then when it was reduced to a liquid, he dabbed his fingers in it, and got it over the women's dresses. But the mother only sat and smiled. On another occasion, when there was a dinner party, the Angel Child, who was an uninvited guest, was a girl, and this Angel Girl seized a cut-glass tumbler and began hammering the highly-polished parlor table with it. And the mother looked at it with a fond, proud smile, and said nothing. These, and many other instances of a similar nature, will explain something about to happen: A number of women have vowed that the next time something like this happens, they will catch the mother by the neck and shake all the dreamy, fond pride out of her, and will then spank the Angel Boy or Angel Girl till its howls awaken Leavenworth. "We have stood all of this fond mother indulgence that we intend to stand," said one woman, who recently had a mirror broken by an Angel Child pounding its foot in it, while its mother looked on with a proud smile that said, "Isn't it a dear!"

Escaping In An Airship

BY MISS D. V. FARLEY.

You have doubtless heard and read stories about the spider's wonderful perseverance. I want to tell you something about his perseverance and ingenuity when he finds himself surrounded by water. We anchored a pole in a small lake, just a few feet from the shore, and left a portion of the pole above the water's surface. On the pole we placed a spider that we had captured for that very purpose. We had been told that the spider surely would interest us by the persevering, intelligent way he would get back to dry land. When the spider had crawled over the pole, and found out that there was "water, water everywhere," he produced a web that was several inches long, hung to one end of it, and allowed the other to float out in the wind. Evidently he did this, hoping that it would come in contact with some object, fasten itself, and thus afford him a bridge over which to get back to land. This plan failed. He spun another web, and then in a like manner sent it in another direction. Of course, he again met with failure; but, to all appearances, not one bit discouraged, he tried again and again to build a silken bridge until all of the points of the compass had been tried. He surely did sustain the reputation that soldiers have for that admirable thing called "perseverance."

Finding it quite out of the question to build a bridge, the spider turned his attention to the making of what, we believe, may fittingly be called an airship. He climbed to the top of the pole and worked with a will until the airship was ready for use. We were not able to find out how he made his wonderful ship, but it surely was as buoyant as any balloon anybody ever saw. We observed that he secured the ship to the pole on which he was a prisoner by means of a web that we were pleased to call a "guy rope." He got into the finished ship to test it and found it was too small to safely carry his weight. He took it down, constructed a larger one, and found it too small also. "The third time is the charm," you know; so our persevering spider made a third airship. This third one must have been all right; for the spider got into it, broke the guy rope, and took a truly graceful aerial trip back to dry land.

Escaping in an airship appealed to us to be fine fun indeed. The persevering little airship builder had surely impressed upon us anew the old, old lesson:

"If at first you don't succeed,
Try, try again."

THE FINDING OF CAMILLA

CHAPTER IX.

Disguised.

"And now to start on our journey," said Pierre suddenly.

"What! Now?" exclaimed his sister. "But what is the use of such hurry when la petite has scarcely recovered from the effects of that terrible night?"

"This use," said Pierre, dropping his English to speak in rapid French, "that we go away before le vilain monsieur gets knowledge that we are here. He is in this town, so we must leave it. We must disappear as suddenly as we have appeared, my good Jeannette."

"And how?" queried his sister, still doubtful of the need of such haste and half vexed at the thought of so soon losing sight of her little guest. "Suppose that you meet with monsieur but a few yards from the door of this house? Suppose that he demand this child of you? Will he not have the power of claiming her before yourself? Will he not be regarded by the police as a better protector for la petite than just a strolling showman?"

Pierre smiled, his white teeth again showing, much to the satisfaction of Camilla, who was listening half distressed at being unable to follow what was being said.

"I was not on the stage for nothing, ma soeur," he said still smiling. "Can I not transform myself into some one quite unlike Pierre Gascon? And can I not do the same equally as well for la petite mademoiselle? Ma foi! we can but try. Where is the box of effects that I left with you? Have you it yet?"

"Yes," returned Jeannette, still inclined to be rather cross. "It is in the loft."

"Well, I shall go and look through it all. But before doing that I shall take mademoiselle here to see the troupe."

Then, turning to Camilla with his bright flashing smile, he said gaily in English—

"Will you come with me, mademoiselle, to see your traveling companions?"

Camilla left her chair willingly enough to follow him through the back premises of the inn into a garden, where, on a small plot of grass, there was tethered a handsome goat with long silky hair. He looked up on hearing footsteps, and then tugged furiously at his rope.

Camilla drew her breath with a little gasp of fear as, with a sudden wrench, the goat dragged the stake to which he was tied from the ground, and sprang towards them.

"Hey then! Ah! would you be in such a hurry?" cried Pierre, swinging Camilla suddenly up on his shoulder, from which vantage ground she looked tremblingly down on the fine animal.

The goat halted in front of them and began to rub his cheek affectionately against his master's hand, making queer little sounds as if expressing his pleasure at meeting Pierre again.

The Frenchman patted him as if he were a large dog, and, lowering Camilla gently to the ground, said gravely—

"Shake hands, Chicot. This little mademoiselle is likely to see much of you for some time, therefore you must both be friends."

Gravely the goat responded, first lifting up a big front leg, which he offered to Camilla, who hung back.

"Take it mademoiselle, and shake it. Chicot will feel hurt if you refuse."

So Camilla took it timidly, and shook it so softly that the Frenchman smiled.

"Now give three of your best bows," commanded he.

And Chicot bowed his head three times, until his beard swept the grass. Then, suddenly, a loud chattering was heard, and from the doorway of a loft at the end of the garden a small monkey sprang.

"This is Taras," said Pierre, laughing as the monkey leapt to his shoulder and, putting both arms round his neck, kissed him with loud smacking sounds repeatedly on both cheeks. "You will grow very fond of Taras, mademoiselle. He is a young rascal, but there! he is an affectionate one, as you will soon find out. Now for Bebe and Jules, and you will have seen the whole troupe."

A pretty little female dog with light brown hair and soft brown eyes responded to his call of "Bebe." And Jules, a cunning-looking terrier of big build, with a black patch over one eye, came running from behind a shed with a bone in his mouth, which Taras immediately sprang from his master's shoulder to seize.

"Here, mademoiselle, are the remainder of your traveling companions; Jacques and I complete the whole. Do they please you? If not, you have but to say the word and Jeannette will keep you comfortably here whilst I seek out your grandparents."

But in spite of his words, Pierre looked anxiously at her. Would she stay behind? And dare he allow her to, after passing his word to her father not to let her out of his sight?

Camilla's soft voice broke in on his thoughts.

"Thank you, but I will go with you. I would much, much rather.

"Then, mademoiselle, it is decided. In two hours we shall start. I will lead you back now to Jeannette's parlor, where you must rest quietly whilst I get ready to depart."

It was a little over an hour before Camilla saw Pierre again; and when he appeared she did not know him. He had transformed himself into an old man with a wig of white hair which fell over his shoulders in patriarchal fashion. Instead of the trim black moustache, a white one hid his mouth, and a long white beard swept his chest. Camilla gazed at him in dismay, whilst Jeannette and the innkeeper burst into a laugh.

"Dost thou recognize Pierre, mon enfant?" cried Jeannette bending over her. "But," she continued in rapid French, "It will take a cunning monsieur to discover you, Pierre. You have made yourself safe, but what now about the little mademoiselle?"

"If mademoiselle will allow me, I will attempt to transform her too," said Pierre, speaking in English and coming to Camilla's side. "You will wonder, mademoiselle, why I have changed myself so, but when I tell you that I consider it right to do so from something that monsieur your father told me, something which concerns you, mademoiselle, then I am sure you will agree to it, feeling sure, as I do, that monsieur your father would approve."

Camilla clasped her hands together nervously and looked at him with quivering lips.

"Something that daddy told you?" she repeated with a little sob.

"Something that monsieur your father told me" repeated Pierre in grave tones. "I am not at liberty to tell you what it was, mademoiselle, and I know you will not ask it. But it forces me to change myself into an old man for the time that it will take me to deliver you up to your grandparents; and the same reason obliges me to change you somewhat, mademoiselle, so that it will be a little difficult to recognize you also."

And so he took her away with him, and brought her back in a very short while with a beautiful dark brown curly wig covering her own golden hair, and instead of the scarlet cloak and hood a dark blue cloak with trimmings of fur now covered her.

Jeannette clapped her hands at the disguise. "But, Pierre, you are as handy as a maid," she exclaimed. "Where did you get the cloak from?"

"From the other trunk that lay alongside mine, answered Pierre. "You know Fanchon left the stage the same time that I did, and begged me to put some of her effects away with mine. I have never opened her box, but today I thought I might do so to see if she had anything that might suit mademoiselle. And see, it has answered admirably."

"Admirably," echoed the innkeeper with approval. "You are a man of resource, Pierre."

"And Jacques," said Pierre, "poor Jacques; since he, too, was recognized on board, he has had to undergo a similar disguise. Jacques!" he called.

And into the room skipped Jacques, not the white poodle they all knew but as a tawny colored one, which somehow did not look like the old Jacques they were so fond of.

"Helas! what have you done to the poor dog?" cried Jeannette, holding up her hands in dismay.

"I have but dyed him. He was too well noticed on the ship for me to dare to take him as he was. And now, Jeannette, we must start at once."

But here Jeannette made herself heard. No, once for all, they should not start that day. The next morning—yes, the next morning they should go, but the child must have another night's rest.

"After that," said Jeannette shrugging her shoulders, "thou canst do as thou thinkest best."

So it was arranged. Camilla went to bed shortly after her tea, and the inn was closed early that night. If Pierre had not been so sound asleep in his room, however, he would have heard some strange noises going on in one of the old outhouses devoted to lumber of all sorts. But whilst he slept the innkeeper worked, for he, too, had taken a fancy to Camilla's pathetic little face.

After an early breakfast the next morning—as early as six o'clock, for the Frenchman was determined to make a good start—

Pierre donned his own and Camilla's disguises once again.

"See here," said Jeannette, coming into the room with a big package in her hands, "this is for food on the way, something that mademoiselle and you will like if you are far away from a village."

"Thou art a good sister, Jeannette," returned Pierre affectionately.

"Ah, bah! But I do not like to own such an old brother. Thou lookest a hundred, Pierre."

Pierre laughed genially, and was sallying out when the innkeeper said quietly—

"I, too, have thought of you, Pierre, and the little lady. Last night and part of this morning I have been cleaning up and brightening the little carriage that the lame boy down the hill yonder used to drive in and which I bought when the sale took place of the old gentlemen's things. It used to be drawn by a goat, and I was thinking that Chicot could not do better than make himself useful to the little lady. There is harness and everything complete."

"Well thought of, Robert!" exclaimed Pierre, whilst Jeannette clapped her hands with delight. "The idea of mademoiselle on foot has troubled me, I assure you."

To the back garden the innkeeper led them, and there stood Chicot in shining harness, with the goat-carriage behind him fitted up spotlessly.

Chicot stood shaking his head with pride, and pawing the ground as if impatient to be gone. Camilla was assisted in and made comfortable by cushions and a rug thrown over her feet.

And so the procession started, after many embracings from Jeannette, and bowings and handshakings from the innkeeper.

First, Pierre with his patriarchal appearance, clad in a leathern coat and gaiters, with Taras mounted on his shoulder, a wallet of food at his side and his violin strapped across his back; for besides his other talents the Frenchman had a wonderful gift for music. Chicot followed after, drawing the goat-carriage with a peculiarly majestic air, as if fully conscious of the little figure ensconced within. And last of all came the three dogs, frisking about with delight at finding their master on the move again.

CHAPTER X.

Where Was Camilla?

A delicate-looking lad was seated in Mrs. Falconer's boudoir at Rosslyn Towers. It was Guy Falconer, whom we last saw leaping off the deck of The Fair Nancy with the Frenchman's dog in his arms.

The same lad, and yet not quite the same, for the expression in the boyish face had changed since the night that death had been so near to him. There was less laughter and more thoughtfulness in the eyes that had looked with such frank pity into his Uncle Rexington's face for the last time.

The blow he had received from the floating spar had done him some mischief, and for weeks Guy had lain delirious in the hospital at Deal, attended to by careful nurses and watched over by his distracted father.

He was now considered convalescent, and had come to stay at Rosslyn Towers in company with his brother Algy.

It was two months since Squire Falconer and his wife had learned of the tragic death of their eldest son. To the poor mother, in whom a strange presentiment had ever lingered that she should not again meet her son, the fatal news had been accepted as something foretold. But to the Squire the blow had been heavy. He had cherished within his heart the glad feeling that the wanderer would not leave his home again, and that now he might die in peace, knowing that a younger hand than his would hold the reins. But in one night his hopes had been shattered; and, stranger still, the child to whom all these broad acres now belonged could nowhere be found.

The conversation today had turned, as indeed every conversation at Rosslyn Towers now turned, upon this unaccountable loss.

"I cannot believe for one instant," Guy was saying, "that that Frenchman was not an honest fellow. Why, grannie, I would stake my life that he rang true."

"Your grandfather has lost hope," faltered the old lady. "I—I—try not to feel the same, but it is hard."

"It seems as if she had been spirited away," struck in Algy, who was lying on the rug with his head resting against his grandmother's knee. "Fancy, it is two months! Quite enough time for that French Johnny to clear off if he has not got the straight tip."

"But that is just what he has got," returned Guy. "One day you'll see that I am right. Yes, I know what you're going to say, Algy—that grandfather has offered big rewards for her recovery, and that the police have been acquainted with her loss. There is something behind it all that I cannot understand, but one thing I am perfectly sure of is that the Frenchman is as honest as the day. Tell me what object would he have in retaining Camilla."

"To see if a still bigger reward will be offered," growled Algy.

"Bosh! you talk rot, Algy. I beg your pardon, grannie, but he distinctly does talk rubbish when he says such things."

Mrs. Falconer sighed as she laid her hand on Algy's head. "It is beyond me to understand it" she said. "If—oh! Guy dear, if it had been only you to whom your uncle had entrusted the child all might have been well."

The color rose into Guy's pale cheek. He stood up, and began to walk about the room.

"It is just that, grannie, that makes me feel it my bounden duty to search for Camilla when I am quite strong again. Father has promised me permission to do so when I am out of the doctor's hands. Don't you think with me that had Uncle Rexington known that I, his own nephew, was on board that boat, he would rather have given his child into my care rather than into that of a complete stranger's?"

"Surely yes," she replied.

"If I could have saved him I would have done so," he went on with some excitement. "I always see him so distinctly before me—his poor sunken face, with eyes staring so yearningly after Camilla as the Frenchman lifted her into his arms. What I couldn't do then I can surely remedy now by finding his child. And this I will do, grannie dear, God helping me."

He stooped to kiss her, and she clung to him with the tears rolling down her cheeks.

"Mr. Bartoletti won't thank you if you succeed," struck in Algy in a lighter vein. "Heavens, grannie, what a foxey-like face the fellow is going to have. He distinctly thinks he sees the hand of providence working for his own and Anita's benefit."

"And Anita?" questioned Guy. "You know I have seen neither of them since I came back."

"She has just got that same proud, same selfish air that she always had, only now it is more proud, more selfish than before," replied Algy, half Angrily.

The door of the boudoir opened suddenly, and the Squire appeared with a flushed, eager look on his face. He held in his hand a small brown-paper packet which he had evidently just opened. He came hurriedly to his wife's side and laid the packet on her lap, spreading it open as he did so.

It contained two or three papers, slightly discolored, as if from age.

"The second post has just come in and brought me this," said the Squire in a voice trembling with excitement. "Who sent it I cannot tell. My name and address was clearly written. Inside the outer cover was this parchment-like envelope, evidently unopened by the person who sent it to me, for Rexington's crest and seal was on it. On breaking it open I found these papers inside. They are of value, for they relate to Rexington's marriage and to Camilla's birth."

Mrs. Falconer turned the papers over with a hand that trembled. "Who can have sent they?" she exclaimed.

"Look at the post-mark on the outer cover," cried both lads together, and Guy laid hold of it with eager hands.

"I have looked, but can make nothing of it," returned the squire. "But your eyes, boys, your young eyes may be able to decipher it."

But no; examine it as they would and as closely as they could, the post-mark was illegible. It had been stamped so imperfectly that it was now almost, if not entirely, obliterated.

"Another mystery to contend against," groaned the Squire; "and I am wearying of them."

The papers were the same that had been entrusted to Pierre, but which he had searched for in vain.

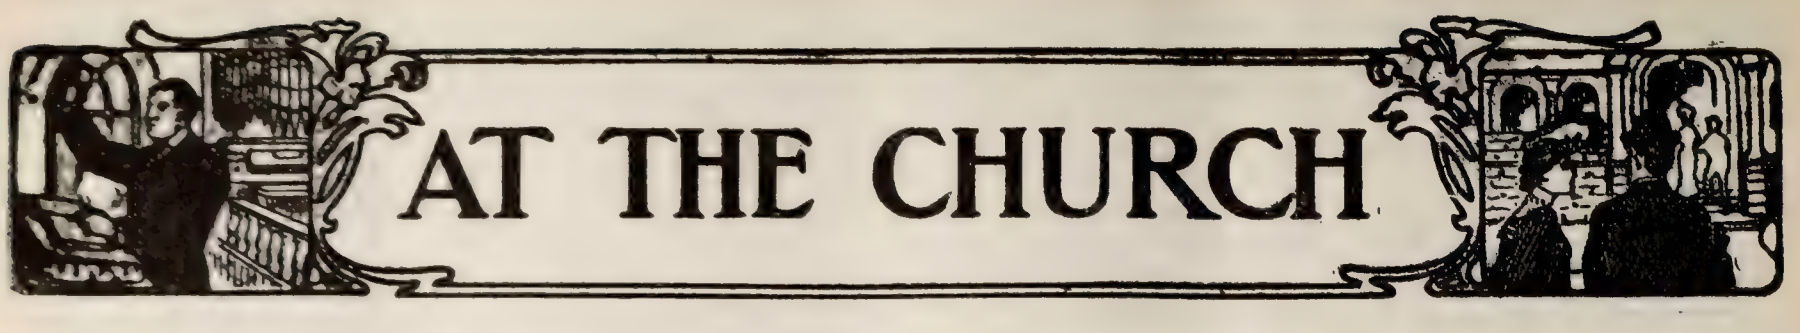
People of Importance

—The French government will decorate Paderewski, the pianist, with the cross of the Legion of Honor. He played recently at a charity concert. Following the precedent in the case of Rubinstein, he will be named an officer without first being made a chevalier of the order.



—Gonzales Valencia has been elected president of the Republic of Colombia by the national congress to fulfil the unexpired term of General Rafael Reyes, resigned. This means that he will occupy the post of chief executive for about one year.

—Robert J. Burdette, humorist and Baptist preacher, who is seriously ill from an injury to the spine sustained in a fall last March, was placed in a plaster cast last week in Los Angeles. His spinal cord has become affected, and the physician in attendance says that his body must be held rigid for several months.

—William P. Hepburn, former representative from Iowa, desires an appointment as a judge on the new court of customs appeals which is created by the tariff bill. A petition plentifully signed by members of the house and asking that the member of the court from the middle west be Mr. Hepburn has been forwarded to the president. Mr. Hepburn has remained in Washington since his retirement from Congress in March. An announcement has been made by Mr. Hepburn that he does not propose to attempt to regain his seat in congress.

—E. H. Harriman's health is said to be greatly improved, his condition being better than for several years. Mr. Harriman will arrive at New York from his trip abroad about Sept. 10.

—Baron Takahira, Japanese ambassador to the United States, left Washington on August 10 for Tokio in response to the summons of his government, which desires to consult him in connection with the proposed revision of the treaties of commerce and navigation about to be undertaken by Japan with the Powers of the world. Reports have been current that Mr. Takahira would be replaced by some other member of the Japanese diplomatic corps, but the ambassador has declared that he expects to return to Washington.

Sunday School Lesson

By Herbert L. Willett

The Greatest of These Is Love*

Henry Drummond once asked the students of the University of Edinburgh to read with him the Thirteenth Chapter of I. Corinthians once a week as long as they lived. It is a request that any teacher or preacher might well wish to lay upon the conscience of his people, for, in many regards, this is the greatest chapter in the Bible. In it the apostle of faith rises to his highest level in his outpouring praise of Christian love, just as John, the apostle of love, reached his highest word in his wonderful utterance, "This is the victory that overcometh the world, even our faith."

The Number Thirteen.

If any one still labors under the delusion that thirteen is an ill-omened number, he should correct his error by the study of this chapter. It is the thirteenth in the book; there are thirteen verses in the chapter; the enumeration of the qualities of love reaches just thirteen. This is, of course, merely accidental, but it ought to allay any uneasiness regarding the nature of that number.

News from Corinth.

The chapter arises out of a serious discussion of the whole theme of gifts of the Spirit. The First Epistle to the Corinthians was written from Ephesus during Paul's three years of residence there. The circumstances under which it was written are suggested in the closing chapter, where the apostle refers to a recent visit of three brethren from Corinth, who had brought reports of the condition of the church there and perhaps a written communication. Paul discovered from their reports that while there was a feeling of satisfaction on the part of the Corinthian disciples, there were grave disorders in the church. Faction was rife. Four parties were at odds with each other in that little community. Scenes of disorder occurred at the communion and, worst of all, there were serious moral offenses on the part of the members which were openly condoned.

Gifts of the Spirit.

But Paul discovered also from the reports that the Corinthians, with their love of show, were eager to secure those external manifestations of spiritual power to which they attached the chief importance. In the church there were men who were gifted as teachers; others were prophets, or preachers as the term implies; others, still, had the ability to heal the sick, and many prided themselves on the gift of tongues. This latter did not signify the use of foreign languages, but rather that ecstatic outbursting of enthusiasm which not infrequently has manifested itself in highly emotional religious assemblies. The danger at Corinth was that the Christians would regard these different elements of their Christian experience in the inverse ratio of their value, chiefly coveting those gifts of miracle and ecstatic utterances in the public assembly which were really of very small moment in determining or producing the Christian life.

Differing Values.

Paul's treatment of this question is delicate and considerate. It is contained in the whole of the section, including Chapters 12-14. He tells the Corinthians that he understood they spoke with tongues; in this he rejoices; he does the same himself at times. Yet he warns them that moderation should be shown in the use of this and every other gift. They are bestowments of the Spirit, to be sure, but they have only a relative and limited value. The real value of language in the church is not to astonish by mysteries, but to instruct and warn. He would rather have a man speak ten words intelligently than a multitude in some ecstatic, emotional and unintelligible manner. Therefore, he would have them covet not these mere lower gifts of a showy sort, but the genuine graces of the Christian life, and of these faith and hope and love are the chief.

The Supremacy of Love.

The wonderful thirteenth chapter is divided into three sections. The first contrasts love, the essential and dominating element of the Christian life, with those gifts upon which they had prided themselves. In comparison with love, tongues are as nothing. The tongues of men and angels, if actually possessed by the Christians, would be of no value as compared with love in the heart. Even prophecies or preaching would be only a relative good, because a man might preach the truth from motives far from pure. Love only could determine the value of his message. But further than this, generosity, usually a mark of Christian life, could not always determine the genuineness of character, for a man might give his property away out of mere ostentation. He might even suffer martyrdom in a wrong cause or from an unholy motive. But love can never go wrong.

The Nature of Love.

The second section deals with qualities of love. Love is considerate; it is disinterested; it is humble-minded; it is modest; it is decorous; it is unselfish; it is incapable of taking offense; it is single-minded; it is optimistic; it is patient; it is expectant of good; it is confident; it is all-enduring. In this wonderful list the characteristics that make a triumphant life are set forth.

The Permanence of Love.

And the last of these suggests the final section of the chapter—the stability of love. Other things pass, but love abides. All experiences are successions of events or states of being, but love continues. Other things give place in an everchanging order, but love never fails. Types of preaching pass away. Emotional speech comes to an early end. Knowledge gives place to larger knowledge. We know but little; around every circle a larger circle may be drawn. Our preaching must be always modest and reticent because we know only in part. From childhood to maturity we are evermore changing our opinions and convictions, not because these are worthless, but because the less yields to the greater, the half truth to larger knowledge. The man puts away his childish ideas. It is only he who remains ever a child who regards his views as final. The truth can only be partially discerned with the weak instruments of understanding he possesses. We are like those who look into metal mirrors, whose polished surfaces can only reflect an imperfect likeness of the beholder. But there will come a time when we shall know in fuller measure.

Christian Certainties.

It is this wonder of love's stability through all the changes of knowledge that the apostle impresses. Opinions vary; theories are altered; new truth comes; but character, which is controlled by love, keeps ever its true place and never fails. Knowledge is imperfect, and yet there are great truths which Paul can assert with dogmatism and conviction. There are some things which he knows. The fact of sin, the reality of Christ's atonement, the safety and sweetness of the Christian life, and the certainty of the Christian's hope are realities which Paul can insist upon with the utmost confidence. And while these are sufficient for life and godliness, they are only a part of that vast universe of knowledge after which the soul is groping, not without conviction that it shall one day enter into fuller possession of the universal truth. But meantime love controls and love continues.

"Ay, and when prophecy her tale hath finished,
Knowledge hath faded from the trembling tongue,
Love shall survive and love be undiminished,
Love be imperishable, love be young."

The Greatest of These.

To such convictions the Corinthians and the Christians of every age are exhorted by the apostle to anchor their Christian lives. There are things that pass and things that endure. From the tragedy of attachment to the unsubstantial and superficial he would save his readers. To the great qualities which last forever, as long as joy endures and long after sorrow has ceased, he would bind them. These enduring qualities are faith and hope and love; and of the three, by far the greatest is love.

Faith

Enriched by thy certain love
I rest, O Father, in thy arms,—
And naught on earth, below, above,
Can fright me with alarms.

Though Death walk daily at my side,
With pleasant face or visage grim,
I smile, assured thou wilt provide
The light when eyes grow dim.

Serenely, then, I wait the call,—
And ask not haste nor yet delay,—
Content, since nothing can befall
To lead thy love astray.

Prayer Meeting

WORRY AND CONTENT.

Topic, Aug. 25. Matt. 6:24-34; Luke 10:38-42; I. Kings 19:11-18; Phil. 4:11-13.

In spite of all the remedies proposed people will continue to worry to the end of time. One cause for dissatisfaction is the advice of the man who is always ready with his exhortation, "Don't worry." His advice only increases care. What the world needs is reason for hope. The defeated man needs some one to show him the way to victory, not some one to preach to him on the uselessness and damage of the habit of worry. Jesus enabled his disciples to see the grounds of faith in God and in themselves. If men have confidence in us that we know how to guide them through their difficulties, they will be comforted by our words of cheer even if we do not have time to state the reasons for expecting success. Having met our own difficulties with courage, we are prepared to strengthen the heart of another. It turns out then that the exhortation which only adds to life's misery comes from men whose conduct has no message of good cheer.

Singleness of Purpose.

The attempt to serve God and mammon is as disastrous for happiness as it is for morals. The conflict into which we are brought when we turn from a lower to a higher ideal warns us that the conversion has not been complete. The old motives still have power with us and we sometimes yield to them. Then comes the feeling that we have not lived up to the high resolve with which we began the new life, and we are miserable. There is no way of escape until conduct appropriate to the new ideal has become habitual and pleasant. The return to the lower way of living would not end the conflict, for the better nature would be in revolt against its evil master. Hence singleness of purpose is the mark of the good life. But it does not end all perplexities. We must appeal to the experience of the race and to science for a decision as to what is the right thing to do. We do not have in the Bible specific directions for every condition that may confront us. We have no doubt that we ought to help our sick friends to health, but we are not always sure what physician knows the latest and best word of science respecting the disease to be treated. We know that people ought to do the will of God by loving him and one another, but when we find that they are filled with hate we do not always know how to win their attention to the gospel of love. Still, the worry which comes to us when we are in doubt as to the best means of displaying the mind of Christ is something quite different from that which accompanies the attempt to serve God and mammon.

Co-Workers Overlooked.

Elijah's feeling that he was the only faithful man was natural. He had his method of destroying false worship. Because he had not accomplished the whole task in his way he concluded that the task would never be accomplished. He therefore ran away from the fight. For his encouragement the Lord told him that he did not stand alone in his loyalty. The good man who bears the burden of the church often believes that he has no one to help him until he announces his discouragement and his determination to retire from the service. Then he is astonished, it may be, at the number of capable men and women who come forward to assume the responsibility. He is so intent on doing things his own way that he overlooks the possibilities of his associates. He has to meet defeat before he will give them a chance, and unfortunately he does not always know when he has been beaten. His wisdom may be very great, but it is misused when it discredits the wisdom of others.

Work and Content.

The Lord put Elijah to work. The overwrought spirit needs relief from strain. But complete satisfaction is not the gift of a vacation. The contented man is doing a work that is worth while. Yesterday's defeat loses its bitterness after the victory of today. Ease and rest away from the field of contest cannot cause forgetfulness of the weakness and indecision that lost us a fight. Do we dread the task of the day? We have another feeling as soon as we witness the skill of our hands in performing it. Delay in undertaking what is hard only increases our difficulties. Faith and energy are lost if we delay one moment after the time for action has come. Mole hills become mountains while we wait and mountains become mole hills to the worker.

Christian Endeavor Lesson

HOME MISSIONS: OUR COSMOPOLITAN POPULATION.

Topic, Aug. 20. Luke 13:22-30.

It is a natural and therefore an easy step for the Christian Jew to reach out to the other members of his race to win them to his new religious faith. But to ask him to include the Gentile in his program of evangelization was to throw a stumblingblock in his way. For him, to be born a Jew was to be born a child of God. His nationalism was ingrained. He had an exaggerated race prejudice. To cast off this error was a great and difficult problem for him. A deliberative council was necessary even for the Apostles to settle the matter correctly. Then it took the extraordinary experience in the house of Simon the tanner for Peter to settle the matter in his own mind. This controversy threatened the division of the Christian movement in its very inception. But the teachings of Jesus do not leave us in doubt on this point. Not only are the "workers of iniquity" who belong to the "chosen people" to be rejected but the saved "shall come from the east and west, from the north and south, and shall sit down in the kingdom of God."

Our Prejudices.

But if this was a great truth for the Jew, it is equally important for Christians now. We also acknowledge without difficulty our obligation to evangelize the unchurched districts of our own people; but when it comes to extending that obligation in our own thought and activities to those of other races and nationalities, especially when they differ widely in color, habits, and standards of life, we have the same difficulty as did the Jew. This has been one of the greatest obsticles to the progress of foreign missions. Hence that very familiar phrase, "I believe in home, but not in foreign missions."

The Foreigner at Home.

But the increasingly cosmopolitan character of our population in this country forces the exercise of this principle even in the work of home missions. This stands out all the more when we remember that in the future the work of home missions will be done in the cities principally the rural districts being fairly well churched now. During the last three years prior to the panic of '07 there were in '05, 1,059,755; in '06, 1,166,353; in '07, 1,438,469 immigrants who came to the United States. More than two-thirds of these are Russian Jews and Southern Europeans.

In the Cities.

Immigrants are settling more and more in the cities. In 1900, there were 160 cities which had a population of 25,000 or more, and in '87, the inhabitants were predominantly foreign. Twenty-six of our largest cities—including such cities as Boston, New York, Chicago and San Francisco—over seventy per cent of the population is foreign. In Chicago alone there are enough Germans to make a city the size of St. Louis. Besides, there are the Swedes and the Norwegians, the Poles and the Persians, the Chinese and the Syrians, the Russians and the Roumanians and others "too numerous to mention."

The immigrant and some serious problems arrive on the same train. In many instances their standard of morals is low. Again the breaking of home ties has freed them from their restraint. Then they swarm into the tenements here where moral lapse is easy. They are also ignorant of our laws and institutions. The result is, there are 50 per cent more criminals among foreigners than native whites; and the criminal record is 50 per cent higher among the children of foreigners than among the foreigners themselves.

More than 25 per cent of the immigrants are illiterate. Among the southern European immigrants illiteracy runs up to 42 per cent. The general percentage of illiteracy will go higher because the greater portion of immigrants are coming from southern Europe. Thus, to the removal of moral restraint and vicious environment must be added, ignorance. We cannot take up the complications which arise in the commercial and industrial fields because of the coming of the immigrant.

The Religion of the Immigrant.

Religiously, 56 per cent are Greek and Roman Catholics; 10 per cent are Jews; 18 percent Protestant; and 15 per cent miscellaneous. But Roman Catholics tell us that they lose 73 per cent of the Catholic immigrants. Protestants and Jews perhaps lose even more while the remainder have what is equal to, or worse than no religion in a Christian land. Great, therefore, is both the responsibility and the opportunity.

The immigrants are coming a million strong and upwards every year to this land where a majority will make future homes for themselves and their families. They are effecting our industry and our commerce; our ideas of culture and our standards of morals—in a word, they are helping to give direction to our common life and to fix the destiny of our people. To this situation the home mission enterprise must address itself if it would be practicable and efficient. More and more the life of the immigrant is bound up with our own and that which saves the one must work the salvation of the other.

Not until you make men self-reliant, intelligent, and fond of struggle—fonder of struggle than of help—not till then have you relieved poverty.—Phillips Brooks.

The Book World

QUIET TALKS WITH WORLD WINNERS, by S. D. Gordon. This is a continuation of the series of books by Dr. Gordon, of which the others have been, "Quiet Talks About Jesus;" "Quiet Talks on Power;" "Quiet Talks on Personal Problems." This volume consists of a series of brief addresses dealing with the subject of Christian missions. To the author the missionary interest is the master passion, and the master plan of the church, it is her great opportunity for life. He points out the part the church, the individual, prayer, money, and sacrifice have in this greatest of enterprises. (A. C. Armstrong and Son: N. Y., 75 cents net.)

THE GOSPEL IN LATIN LANDS, Francis E. Clark and Harriet A. Clark. Dr. Clark, in his many travels in the interest of Christian Endeavor, has had wide opportunity to study the different types of religious theory and practise, throughout Christendom as well as in heathen lands. In this volume, which is one of the mission study books, Dr. Clark and his wife have described the character and status of Christian work in Italy, France, Spain, Austria, Portugal, Mexico, Central America, the West Indies, and South America. In addition to the descriptive features, each chapter is supplied with helpful dates, summaries of missionary work in the regions considered, and a competent bibliography. (New York: Macmillan, 1909. 50 cents, net.)

THE SOCIAL APPLICATION OF RELIGION. The Merrick Lectures for 1907-09. This is a series of lectures, delivered by men and women directly interested in social redemption. The lectures were delivered at Ohio Wesleyan University in April of last year and they include the following topics and speakers: The Spirit of Social Unrest, Charles Stelzle; Woman's Conscience and Social Amelioration, Jane Addams; Some Ethical Aspects of the Labor Movement, Commissioner Charles Neill; Industry and Religion, Professor Graham Taylor; Christianity and the Social Situation, Charles P. Eckmann. These are for the most part well known names in the field of social activity and the combined message has unity and value for all who have any interest in the application of Christianity to the social life of our time. (Cincinnati: Jennings & Graham. 75 cents, net.)

THE RELIGIOUS ATTITUDE AND LIFE IN ISLAM. Duncan Black MacDonald. Professor MacDonald, of Hartford Theological Seminary, is the author of an earlier volume on "The Development of Moslem Theology, Jurisprudence, and Constitutional Theory." In the present book the attempt is made to interpret somewhat more intimately the religious ideas of the Semitic world and especially the Mohammedan races. The author discusses such questions as the attitude of the Semites toward the unseen world, their conception of prophecies and soothsaying, their idea of intercourse with the unseen world in sleep and through spirits, demons, and ghosts. The life of saints and ecstatics, such as the Dervishes, is then treated of and the mysteries of life and the inner sources of knowledge are considered. The author displays wide acquaintance with Mohammedan writings, and the beliefs which are interpreted in this volume throw not a little light upon Old Testament ideas of the unseen world. (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1909. $1.75 net.)

THE LAWS OF FRIENDSHIP, HUMAN AND DIVINE, by Henry Churchill King. The many readers of President King's helpful books will welcome the appearance in this volume, the expression of his thought on this great subject. President King's thought of the Christian life under the analogy of friendship, has been a distinct contribution to the religious life of our day, and has led many to clearer vision of the meaning of that life. Some of the things said in this little volume have appeared in other works by President King, but most of the material is new, and it is all here under a different arrangement. The first part of the book has to do with "Establishing the Friendship;" by integrity, breadth, and depth of personality; by deep community of interest; by mutual self-manifestation and answering trust; by mutual, self-giving. The second division treats of "Deepening the Friendship;" "The Christian Standard;" "Friendship's Moods;" and "Friendship's Ways." The book will prove of especial interest to young people, and to all who are seeking to realize the best in their personal relationships. (The MacMillan Co., N. Y.)

CHRISTIANITY; ITS NATURE AND ITS TRUTH, by Arthur S. Peake, is a series of essays in which the author undertakes to deal with the vital problems of the Christian faith. He does this as he says in belief that only thus can many be held to allegiance to the faith. The chapter headings are inviting; among them are these, "What is Religion?"; "Has Theology had its Day?"; "Is There a God?"; "The Miracles of Jesus"; "The Supernatural Birth of Jesus"; "Which is the Best Religion?"; "The Trinity in Unity"; "Sin"; "Does It matter if the Gospel History is Untrue?"; "Can We Trust the Gospel Portrait of Jesus?"; "The Resurrection of Jesus"; "The Divinity of Christ"; "The Problem of Incarnation." These are certainly vital questions of the faith. Mr. Peake discusses them in a simple manner, trying as he says to meet the needs not only of the reader who is familiar with theological problems, but of young people who do not feel assured of the grounds of their faith. The book is readable and suggestive. Such problems are destined to be more generally dealt with by the pulpit of the future. One feels, however, as he follows the argument of Mr. Peake that he hardly makes his case; and is trying hard to hold much of the form of the old statement as well as the religious truth back of it. The book will, however, be found valuable by ministers and laymen. (Thomas Y. Crowell and Co., N. Y.; $1.25 net.)

A DICTIONARY OF THE BIBLE, by James Hastings and others. Dr. James Hastings of Scotland is one of the most prolific editors of our generation. He is not only the editor of the Expository Times, but has been for many years engaged in the preparation of numerous reference works on biblical and theological subjects. His monumental four volume Dictionary of the Bible, supplemented by the fifth volume, his four volume Dictionary of Christ and the Gospels, and his forthcoming Dictionary of Religion and Ethics have made his name familiar to all students of religion. It has long been felt, however, that a single volume dictionary was one of the necessities of the time. Most works of this character, like Smith's Bible Dictionary, have been outgrown; and others have been, for the most part, mere reprints, slightly changed, of older works like Kitto's and Schaff-Herzog. Dr. Hastings has now issued a single volume Dictionary of the Bible, which will probably meet the requirements of biblical students in a most satisfactory way. The articles are, of course, not nearly so elaborate as those of the five volume work, but they cover the same range of topics and deal, for the most part, adequately with their themes. The volume is not a condensation of the larger work. Its material has been freshly prepared. In its attitude it accepts the same general critical views of the moderate type as those presented in the earlier work. It has combined in comparatively brief compass the contributions of a very large list of distinguished scholars in Europe and America. The articles have the merit of being signed, in each case, and though they lack the bibliography which the four volume work presents, they meet the general needs of Bible students. For Sunday-school teachers and ministers, who desire a single volume dictionary of the Bible, this work is to be commended as quite the best now obtainable. (New York: Scribner's Sons, 1909. 1 vol. $5.00.)

An Indian Boy's Ambition

A young Indian, a lad of sixteen or seventeen years, died the other day at the Hampton Institute. His "papers" showed him to have some sensible conception of things. On a sheet of paper he had written his reasons for coming to the institute. He hoped for an education; he wanted to help his people; but the last reason was the most striking: "That I may learn the art of self-control." Perhaps he did not know it, but therein lay the foundation of a real life. The crowning fruit of the Spirit is self-control. It is the one great fruit that will make a life full-rounded and complete. There are many useful people; their usefulness is often marred by this one lack—self-control. He that ruleth his own spirit is greater than he that taketh a city. There are masters of others who are slaves to themselves; there are rulers of kingdoms who are slaves of a tyrant temper. Had that lad grown to years, and learned the fine art of self-control, he would have become one of the greatest men among his people.—Intelligencer.

Church Life

A $12,000 church is being erected at Plainview, in the Panhandle District of Texas.

The Martin family are in a tent meeting at Humbolt, Kansas.

Dean Cowper, of Drake University, is spending the month in Michigan.

J. N. Crutcher has accepted a call to the church at Sioux City, Iowa, and is at work.

The church at Newton, Iowa, has given E. F. Leake, of Vinton, a call to serve them for five years.

P. L. Cunningham, of Kansas City, will succeed Edward S. McKinney in the pastorate of the church at Woodward, Okla.

J. Mad Williams will close his work as field advocate of Drake University the first of September.

C. A. McDonald, pastor of the church at McKees Rocks, Pittsburg, is spending his vacation at Ellake, Iasco Co., Michigan.

T. A. Maxwell, pastor of the church at Fairbury, Neb., is spending his vacation in Colorado.

H. E. Stubbs will close his work at Erick, Okla., September 1, and will enter the university at Enid.

F. A. Bright, pastor of the church at Waynesburg, Pa., supplied the pulpit of the First Church of Warren, Ohio, August 8 and 15.

James Buchanan, superintendent of Associated Charities for Richmond, Va., was preacher at the Seventh Street Church July 11.

E. L. Powell, Louisville, Ky., who is spending his vacation in Virginia, is preaching for the Seventh Street Church, Richmond, during August.

The First Church, Lincoln, Neb., H. H. Harmon, pastor, and the First Baptist Church of that city are holding union Sunday evening meetings during the month of August.

H. A. Reynolds will close his work at Magnum, Okla., August 15, and the church will want some one to take up the work at once. They have a good sized church building.

Mr. and Mrs. H. D. C. MacLachlan of the Seventh Street Church, Richmond, Virginia, are spending their vacation in Louisville, Kentucky. They will return to Richmond September 1.

R. L. Porter, the Louisiana State Secretary, and pastor of the First Church, Baton Rouge, has resigned his pastorate; but will remain with the church until a suitable successor can be secured.

The new church building will be dedicated at Tulsa, Okla., the first Sunday in September. The pastor, D. A. Wickizer, has given up his vacation this year that this desired result may be accomplished.

E. T. Edmonds, for many years pastor at Ft. Smith, Ark., is now filling pulpit of Chicago Ave. Church, St. Louis, Mo., during July and August, and will be available for regular work September 1.

The annual outing of the C. W. B. M. of the Jefferson Street Church, Buffalo, N. Y., was held at Appledore, the summer home of P. H. Frank, at Angola, N. Y., Thursday, August 12. Those attending enjoyed a fine swim in Lake Erie.

C. R. L. Vawter is in a meeting at Port Arthur, Ontario. In fifteen days there were fifteen additions to the church. The work is especially difficult here, and the meeting has been hindered by the fact that the singer, D. G. Dungan, was compelled to leave the meeting at its beginning.

A church to cost about $11,000.00 is to be erected by the congregation at Sumner, Ill. The building will be of concrete blocks, and of Gothic style. It will have several separate Sunday-school rooms. When complete this will be the best church building in the town. J. L. Fowler is pastor of the church.

The cornerstone of the new church at Wilhelm Park, Baltimore, is to be laid Sunday, August 15. The address will be made by Peter Ainslie, pastor of the Christian Temple, Baltimore. This church is the child of the Christian—the fourth in eight years. The church will be open for service by the first of October.

The C. W. B. M. at South Chicago has raised twenty-five dollars as a Centennial pledge. By this Mrs. S. S. Matthews, one of the faithful ones of the South Chicago church, has been honored with a life membership. The pastor, A. J. Saunders, is expecting several of the members of this church to attend the Centennial Convention.

Frederick F. Grim, secretary of West Texas and New Mexico, is slowly recovering from the operation which he underwent in June. He is again at his work; but the Board has relieved him of part of his work by employing J. A. Stout of Artesia as Evangelist. Mr. Stout has made a fine record at Artesia and is well fitted for the work he now undertakes, while Br. Grim will be left free to attend to the increasing duties of the secretaryship.

A. B. Moore, who recently succeeded J. E. Dinger as pastor of the church at Chickasha, has been compelled to give up the work and care for his father, who lives in Ohio, during his declining years. His going was a great disappointment to the church, especially in face of the work of entertaining the state convention. But the church is rallying to the emergency, and the Oklahoma Brotherhood is promised the best convention in her history.

Joseph Keevil, pastor of the Humboldt Street Church, Brooklyn, New York, has issued a folder describing the work of this church, and its policy of institutional service. This is one of the most interesting enterprises of the Disciples in the East. The special need of the church now is a mission hall. Those who would contribute to the erection of this hall should send the money to Joseph Keevil, 704 Humboldt St., Brooklyn, N. Y. Checks should be made payable to the treasurer, W. W. Dillon.

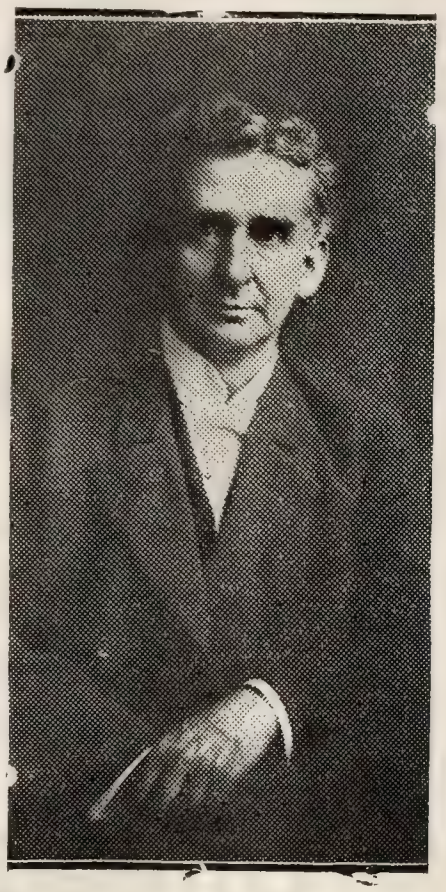
D. Y. Donaldson writes that The South Prospect Church, Kansas City, Mo., has arranged with Herbert Yeuell to hold a meeting with them, beginning early in September. Mr. Yeuell has just returned from a three months' trip abroad and is full of hope and vigor for the work of the autumn. He will continue in the meeting at South Prospect until the time of the Centennial Convention. The church is looking forward to a great meeting. After the close of this meeting Mr. Yeuell will go to Beatrice, Neb., for a meeting.

The tent meeting at Galesburg, Ill., closed July 25 with thirteen added to the church. Five of these were conversions. This meeting was a missionary meeting and was held on the East Side of the city, where there are many unchurched workingmen. The minister, J. A. Barnett, did the preaching and was assisted by Prof. Wm. Leigh, singer, of Akron, O. The Third Dist. assisted in the meeting. Much good was accomplished by the meeting outside of the results by way of additions. The meeting continued eighteen days and closed on account of the chautauqua. Mr. Barnett's church Board treated him to a surprise by voting him an increase in salary of $300 per year.

The church at Knoxville, Ill., Clark Walker Cummings, minister, was led in a two weeks' mission by Harvey O. Breeden, assisted by William Leigh, singing evangelist. It followed a three weeks' Union Meeting and though entered into without preparation was a great success. The meetings grew in power day by day; the last one being the crowning service. During the two weeks', thirty-five were added to the church, the majority being confessions. The standing of the church in the community was raised and many were interested, who will come in later. The membership of the church was led to higher ground and a deeper consecration. It was a glorious meeting in every way. Dr. Breeden proved himself a great preacher. Every sermon, though an artistic product, was logical and forcible, bringing home the great truths of the Scriptures. The church invited him back next year for a month's campaign. Professor Leigh proved himself to be a great soloist and inspiring leader. He is one who can interpret the "Gospel in Song" with grace and power. The local talent of high quality added much to the meetings.

The attendance at the church services in Spencer, Indiana, where Allen T. Shaw has just begun his ministry, is remarkable for this time of year. The prayer meetings have an average attendance of forty. On September 19 the Sunday-school will observe Rally Day. They are planning for an attendance of 300, and an offering of $20.00.

The new house of worship at Rocky Mount, N. C., will be dedicated, first Lord's Day in September. This congregation, and handsome new building is the result of a three weeks' meeting, held at Rocky Mount, early in the summer, by Dr. J. C. Caldwell, president of Atlantic Christian College, Wilson, N. C.



Bruce Brown, Valparaiso, Ind., who a few weeks ago received a call to the church at Beaumont, Texas, felt impelled to decline the call and has since been called to the Dean Ave. Church, Spokane, Washington, and has accepted. This is one of the finest churches in the West, which today offers so many attractions to the aggressive preacher.

Good and Ill Fortune for Eureka

On account of ill health, President R. E. Hieronymus has resigned from Eureka College. It is reported he will spend the winter in California.

Feeling that a strong man must be secured to succeed President Hieronymus, the Executive Committee of the Board of Trustees of Eureka College has extended a call to Dr. H. O. Breeden, formerly pastor of the Central Christian Church, Des Moines, Iowa, and for a great many years intimately associated with Drake University. The people of Eureka are unanimous in the opinion that Dr. Breeden is the man for the place. He has not yet accepted.

With this announcement comes the news that through the will of Mrs. Henrietta C. Pheasant, formerly of Buffalo, Eureka College will receive about $65,000. Mrs. Pheasant's estate is estimated to be worth $88,000. The chief beneficiaries to the estate are Eureka College, Eureka, Ill., which will receive, it is estimated, $65,000; Springfield and King's Daughters Home for Aged Women, $8,000. Various sums are given to relatives and the Mechanicsburg Cemetery association will be given $2,000 to be used in improving the burial grounds and keeping it in condition.

Dr. Harvey O. Breeden Who Has Been Called to the Presidency of Eureka College.

We hope that Dr. Breeden may accept this call to a great service and that this gift and others may mean an enlargement upon the good work done throughout the nine years of President Hieronymus' faithful service.

Grant K. Lewis, State Secretary of California, has moved his family to Glendale.

A. C. Osborn, who has recently closed his work with the church at Lyons, Ohio, has accepted a call to the church at Richwood.

Alfred A. Kuhn, of Des Moines, has been called to the pastorate of the church at Kankakee, Ill.

Harry G. Hill, pastor of the Third Church, Indianapolis, is spending his vacation at Lake Gage, near Angola, Ind.

T. M. Myers, of Kansas City, has been called to the pastorate of the church at Princeton, Mo.

E. W. Thornton has assumed the pastorate of the Naomi Ave. Church, Los Angeles, California.

J. W. Hall has just entered upon his work as pastor of the church at Arlington, California.

fourth Lord's Day in August lead by C. Manly Morton, of North Carolina. Much preparation is being made and a great meeting expected.

R. V. Hope, formerly of Columbia, Miss., has recently taken charge of the work at Washington, N. C.

D. W. Arnold, of Greenville, N. C., recently closed a very successful meeting at Pantego, N. C.

J. W. Tyndall recently closed a meeting at Whitakers, N. C., with thirty-five additions.

Three of the California churches that have for a long time been receiving assistance from the state missionary society will this year declare their independence. They are at Corona, Oxnard and Ocean Park.

As We Go To Press.

Beatrice, Nebr., Aug 11, 1909.—The Beatrice churches have received a cable from Herbert, Yeull, ondon, England, that he will be with us in a meeting with Percy M. Kendall, and wife, after the Pittsburg convention.—J. E. Davis.

Nelsonville, O., Aug. 10.—There were 517 in the Bible-school of the Nelsonville, O., church August 8. Of these there were 151 in the Berean Men's Class, taught by R. A. Doan, one of the elders. There were more men in the school than scholars three years ago on the second Sunday in August. W. S. Cook.

BAD DREAMS
Caused by Coffee.

"I have been a coffee drinker, more or less, ever since I can remember, until a few months ago I became more and more nervous and irritable, and finally I could not sleep at night for I was horribly disturbed by dreams of all sorts and a species of distressing nightmare.

"Finally, after hearing the experience of numbers of friends who had quit coffee and were drinking Postum, and learning of the great benefits they had derived, I concluded coffee must be the cause of my trouble, so I got some Postum and had it made strictly according to directions.

"I was astonished at the flavor and taste. It entirely took the place of coffee, and to my very great satisfaction, I began to sleep peacefully and sweetly. My nerves improved, and I wish I could wean every man, woman and child from the unwholesome drug—ordinary coffee.

"People really do not appreciate or realize what a powerful drug it is and what terrible effect it has on the human system. If they did, hardly a pound of it would be sold. I would never think of going back to coffee again. I would almost as soon think of putting my hand in a fire after I had once been burned.

"A young lady friend of ours had stomach trouble for a long time, and could not get well as long as she used coffee. She finally quit coffee and began the use of Postum and is now perfectly well. Yours for health."

The Northern California Convention

By Professor Walter Stairs

As Kentucky used to do, California continues to hold two conventions, and to maintain two distinct missionary enterprises, radiating from the two great centers, San Francisco and Los Angeles. The great reaches of California, and the very make up of the state render this a practical necessity. There is usually, however, a small fractional delegation year by year from each to the other convention. The southern and northern California people are in many respects quite distinct, each section is loyal to the interests of the whole state, and each rejoices in the missionary victories of the other.

The northerners held their convention at Garfield Park, Santa Cruz, where for about two weeks there is a respite from the sweltering of the San Joaquin, Sacramento, and other fruit growing valleys of our splendid state. Here the ocean breeze and even the dampening fogs are a delight to the "native sons," while the new comers and our eastern visitors shiver and wonder. Since 1897 ours has been by enactment a delegate convention, though as a matter of fact everybody talks and everybody votes. About forty churches are represented by about one hundred and fifty delegates, and a number of visitors.

The C. W. B. M.

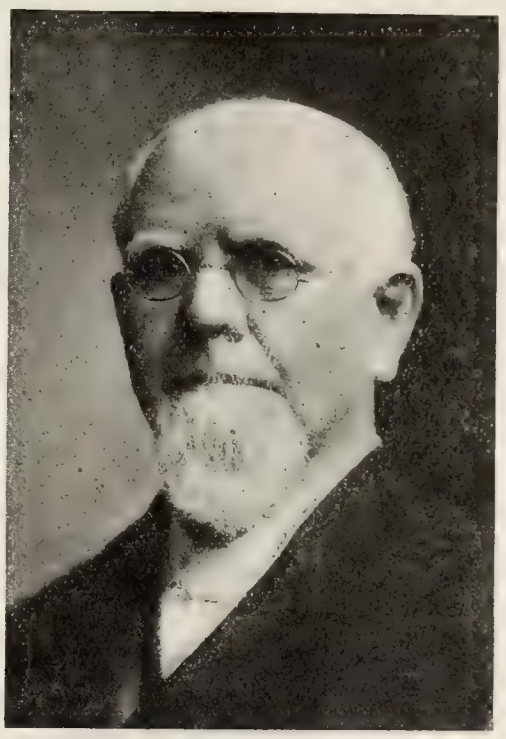
The women of the California churches accept gladly their share of the burden of Christ, and do modestly and faithfully their portion of the missionary work. The report of the corresponding secretary shows sixty-four Auxiliaries and Circles in Northern California, with a membership of 1,760, and the number of Tidings 932, while the work of organization resulted in six new Auxiliaries and Circles.

Money raised on C. W. B. M. Day and Easter	$ 768.25
Centennial money raised	926.60
Total sent to National Treasury	3,596.60
Total sent to State Treasury	858.40
Helen Moses Memorial Fund	274.30
Total raised during the year	4,729.30

The president, Mrs. Mattie C. Shelton of San Jose, said in her address that the greatest progress made during the year was in the spiritual growth of the members, and affirmed that since spiritual growth was put first, numbers and money would be added unto them. Important papers and addresses delivered at the C. W. B. M. session were "The Home Department," by Mrs. Mary Ingram, of Irvington; "Place and Work of Women in the Church," by W. P. Bentley; and the "History and Significance of the C. W. B. M," a centennial address, by M. W. Harkins, of San Jose.

The School of Missions.

It will be remembered that at the national convention which convened at New Orleans last October, a mission study was introduced and conducted by returned missionaries. I. N. McCash is responsible for its introduction into our state convention with the same text books, I think, Strong's "Challenge of the City," and Brown's "The Why and How of Missions." The sessions of this "School of Missions" were held at 8 a. m. each day during the convention, and were conducted by G. L. Lobdell, of Chico, and H. J. Loken, of Alameda. The work was well done, and Bro. McCash said the attendance compared favorably with that of the national convention. At times the itnerest was intense when discussion arose, and on the whole the "school" was the most exciting feature of the convention.



State Bible School Convention.

More and more the Bible school is working its way to recognition as a factor in the missionary business of our state, though even up to the convention of this year, this is more of a theory or a prediction than a realization. The secretary reports about eighty schools in the state with approximately 10,000 members. The amount of money raised is so small that I refrain from mentioning it. But interest is awakening, incited by the ever enlarging influence of the centennial aims, with the Teacher Training, the Adult Bible Class, the Loyal Sons movement, etc.

The State Missionary Convention.

All the factors that go to make up the splendid programs of the Santa Cruz conventions are an outgrowth of the "state convention," and are avenues of its outreach toward the saving of the sons and daughters of a rich and needy state. Since the "fire," as they say when they refer to the earthquake, the gospel problem has assumed two phases—that of the "Bay Cities," and "the state outside the Bay Cities." Two-thirds of the population are said to be resident in the bay cities. The problem is difficult. Preaching the gospel in California is not like preaching the gospel in the east. The people are different, the method is different. One thing Californians don't want is salvation, Christianity. The wealthiest state in the union, per capita, is California. They don't feel the need of salvation. To grapple with this situation is the problem. Disciples are trying it. By and by they will have larger success. The state convention program was distributed, piece meal, throughout the convention period. The first Saturday evening session was that of the "Business Men," and was addressed by R. A. Long, of Kansas City. Bro. Long spoke also at the Business Men's Banquet, on Monday afternoon, and stripped us of a little of our California egotism.

I. N. McCash was made president of the new state missionary board, and we expect to gain much from his large experience in missionary business.

B. B. Tyler, Guest of the Convention.

Our Visitor.

The "venerable"(!) Tyler Boy, of Denver, was our guest this year. He is seventy years young, and continually grew younger during the convention. We may say he was the chief preacher of the convention, and gave us a worthy series of sermons on "The Christianity of Christ," "The Essential Unity of the Church," "The Great Man of the Apostolic Age," "The Friends and Helpers of Paul," "Preachers and Preaching for Our Times," and "The Present Status of the Union Problem." Well, he was pretty hard to "follow," that is, if one wished to "appropriate" his sermons and style for one's own pulpit use: though the writer "took down" and has preached over and over one of B. B.'s sermons preached away back in 1881! His general theme was "The Christianity of Christ," which ran as a golden thread through all his sermons. Bro. Tyler made a profound impression upon the people. He spoke as one having authority, not the authority of age, nor yet of experience, but the authority of one representing the Book. He is a Bible student. He studies the whole Bible. He seems to think the Old Testament is for the children of Abraham by faith, as well as for his descendants according to the flesh. His exegesis is wonderfully clear and simple. He makes his texts glow with light, out from their native history. He did our souls good.

The Centennial Addresses.

Even now there comes a thrill to people (let us hope they are not puffed up) whom the program committees even of state conventions have counted worthy to deliver centennial addresses in this happy, memorial year. The California centennials were as follows: "Sources and Beginnings of the Plea of Disciples," by Prof. Walter Stair, Berkeley; "Thomas Campbell and the Declaration and Address," Frank Stuart Ford, San Francisco; "Alexander Campbell," D. F. Stafford, Watsonville; "Barton W. Stone," L. O. Ferguson, Modesto; "Isaac Errett and His Contribution to the Restoration Movement." I. N. McCash, Berkeley; "The Religious Outlook for the Century," J. R. Perkins, Fresno; "Personal Reminiscences of the Fathers." J. H. McCollough, San Jose; and "The Pioneers and Landmarks of Our Cause in California." a jubilee address, so to say, by R. L. McHatton. Fruitvale.

It is all done. The convention is over. The record is made, and the work is pitifully small, when we consider for whom we are working. We return to our homes and our respective fields of labor in humility, but in hope and the full assurance of faith, and determined purpose.

There is only one way to get ready for immortality, and that is to love this life, and live it as bravely and cheerfully and faithfully as we can.—Van Dyke.

"BUNCOMBE"

It Don't Always Pay to be Skeptical.

When a newspaper writer and proof reader that works nights can feed himself out of dyspepsia, which most all that class suffer with, it is worth while to know the kind of food used.

This man says:

"Being a newspaper writer and proof reader, also a graduate in medicine as well, though not practicing, makes a combination that would produce a skeptic on the subject if anything would.

"Day after day I read the proof on the Grape-Nuts advertisements with the feeling that they were all 'buncombe.' All this time I was suffering from dyspepsia from the improper food I was eating at the restaurant.

"One day I saw a package of Grape-Nuts at the restaurant, and tried some with good, rich cream. The food took my fancy at once. After a few lunches at midnight I noted an improvement in my feelings, and was able to work with less fatigue.

"I have used Grape-Nuts as a regular diet since then, and have improved greatly. The old dyspepsia and bad feelings that I thought were necessary adjuncts to night work all disappeared, and I am able to do much more and better work with less effort than ever before.

"I was nearly ready to give up night work and seek health in some other walk in life, but thanks to my change in diet I am now all right." "There's a Reason."

Receipts Forging Ahead

The receipts of the Foreign Society for the first ten days of August amounted to $10,320, a gain over the corresponding ten days of 1908 of $6.161. There was also a gain in the number of contributing churches and Sunday-schools. The churches as churches showed a loss in their gifts for the ten days of $300, but the Sunday-schools show a gain of $2,367.

This brings the total receipts of the year up to $243,554, a gain of $50,275. This is by far the greatest gain for the corresponding time in the history of the Foreign Society. There is also a gain from every source of receipts except bequests, which show a loss of $4,800. The missionary year is now rapidly coming to a close. September 30 is the time. There is yet time and opportunity to make an additional gain of $25,000. We would not be surprised to see a gain of $75,000 for the year. To this end we urge the churches, Sunday-schools and friends generally to do their best at once. Remember the report at the Centennial Convention.

The Church Extension Offering

We are coming on Lord's Day September 5, to the last offering of the first century. The date comes very close to the historic time one hundred years ago when Thomas Campbell issued his now famous Declaration and Address. That date was September 7, 1809. Our great date is September 5, 1909.

Here are some things to think about: Since its organization the Church Extension Society has helped 1,248 churches to their buildings in 44 states. Now think! 684 of these churches have repaid their loans in full and that money is at work again in the field plus its accumulations of interest. Over $864,000.00 has been returned and has gone back again into the field, not alone increasing itself, but increasing its usefulness and increasing the Lord's work.

You will remember that one of the Centennial aims was that in the church extension fund there should be, as we came up to our great Centennial, One Million Dollars. To Make that aim we need to make our final Centennial offering roll up to $300,000.00. It can easily be done if every preacher and every church is "Loyal to the Loyal" on the last Centennial offering day that comes September 5th. Will you help bring your church into line. If your pastor is indifferent talk him into line. Let him know that you are a live wire for the realization of all of our Centennial aims. Many a down hearted preacher has had fresh courage put into his heart and life by some good brother or sister giving him a word of encouragement. Sometimes the telling of a man that you expect large things from him, compels him to the largest that is in him.

Get yourself, your preacher and your church in line for this final Centennial offering for church extension. You've been praying for "showers of blessing!" God has placed the key to His hydrants in your hands. That key is obedience. Fit your key to the hydrant, make a long pull and a hard pull and a pull all together and you'll find the "showers" coming. Do you want the Scripture for it? "Bring all the tithes into the store house and prove me now, saith the Lord your God, and see if I will not pour out upon you showers of blessing."

Brethren: Conditions obeyed always mean promises fulfilled.

Let us see to it that on this last Centennial offering day for our Church Extension Society we make an offering that shall be worthy of ourselves our plea and our Christ.

Nearing the Close

Only a few more days and the work of our Centennial year will be closed and the records filed to await the day of eternity. Whatever duty remains to be done in this great year of our history, must have attention now, must be done quickly.

This item is to stir up your pure minds by way of remembrance, by calling your attention to an important matter concerning the King's business. Some of the faithful soldiers have come to the day after the battle. With bowed forms and tottering steps, battle-scarred and bleeding, they await the summons to the general roll call "up yonder." One of the most sacred obligations our Lord has laid upon his people is the care and support of these soldier-saints. Not a congregation in the brotherhood but owes this work an annual offering. What preacher can let this Centennial year close without an offering from his church to this work and feel he has maintained the dignity of his ministry, the honor of his church, and kept faith with Him who called him into the ministry.

We may not know just how much we ought to give to missions, and the world may not know, and any estimate is a matter of judgment; but we know and everybody knows just how much we must give to Ministerial Relief if we are to do our duty, please our Lord, and, as a people, maintain our respect before the world. We must give a sufficient amount to properly care for the few men among us who need this support. This we can measure and can understand. This we ought to do, and this we must do. As workers with our Lord, this ought to be one of our esteemed privileges. We pray you brethren, do not let September 30 find you delinquent in your offering to the support of the "Old Guard."

Board of Ministerial Relief.

The Veteran's Camp Fire

Great interest still centers around the Veteran's Camp Fire. Because we have fewer old people in our brotherhood than other religious bodies may be the reason we honor them more. At all events the veterans will be honored at the Centennial in a way that will rejoice their hearts, cheer our own and advance the interests of our plea.

The program will be in the hand of the venrable L. L. Carpenter of Wabash, Indiana. A tentative outline program follows:

Saturday afternoon, October 16, 1909. L. L. Carpenter, president. 2:00 p. m. devotional exercises conducted by F. M. Green, Akron, Ohio; 2:10 p. m. president's address, L. L. Carpenter, Wabash, Ind.; 2:15 p. m. address, J. W. McGarvey, Lexington, Ky.; 2:35, five minute address by the veterans present; 4:00, relations of incidents connected with the early ministry of the veterans.

The hymns will be the old time ones sung fifty years ago.

When the time comes for that meeting you can set down as a fact that the hall or church where it will be held will be crowded to its utmost capacity.

You will want to make this one of the scheduled meetings on your tablet for in missing it you will miss a great treat.

Some Courtesies that are Being Shown the Pittsburg Committee.

Many courtesies are coming to the committee having the work in charge.

The press is exceedingly liberal with space. All the daily and Sunday papers are giving columns upon columns of matter, all superbly meaning and interest of the convention.

The churches of the city are throwing open their doors in a manner that prophesies great things in the years to come. Especially interesting is the fact that the great Jewish Temple presided over by the Rev. J. Leonard Levy, has authorized the use of its spacious building during the convention as it may be needed.

The local churches of the Brotherhood are loaning their preachers with the kindliest and most generous of spirit, and the preachers are giving their time with unabated vigor and continually renewing ardor. All of which indicates that the Convention will be a great success.

Finally brethren, don't forget to pray for the convention, its workers and all who in any way help the great work along.

Sincerely yours,
John A. Jayne,
Chairman Publicity Committee.

I Would

I would be true, for there are those who trust me,

I would be true, for there are those who care;

I would be strong, for there is much to suffer,

I would be brave, for there is much to dare.

I would be friend to all—to foe, to friendless;

I would be giving, and forget the gift;

I would be humble, for I know my weakness;

I would look up, and laugh, and life.

Tipton (Indiana) Annual County Meeting

The annual county meeting of the Christian Churches, of Tipton County, was held in Carr's grove, near Hobb's station the first Lord's Day in August. In the fellowship of this meeting the following churches participated: Tipton, Windfall, Normanda, Kempton, Independence, the Chapel, New Lancaster, Hobb's, East Union and Nevada. At this year's session every congregation was represented, several of the churches having large delegations. Brethern were present from several of the churches of bordering counties. The following ministerial brethern bore a part in the day's services: Sellers and Wittekamper of Elwood, Honeywell of Windfall Daniels of Irvington, and Grisse of Arcadia. The weather was ideal and the attendance is said to have been the largest in the history of the association. J. A. Lord of Cincinnati, was the speaker of the day. Bro. Lord preached a strong sermon in the morning on "Freedom by the Truth" and in the afternoon preached another sermon of great power on "The One Church on the One Foundation."

In connection with this meeting it was resolved to form a County Board, consisting of one delegate from each church, which should have in charge the annual county meeting and should act in an advisory way in other co-operative movements of the churches of the county. Under the leadership of Bros. Honeywell at Windfall and Baker at Atlanta splendid new church buildings are to be erected this year.

CENTENNIAL OFFERING FOR CHURCH EXTENSION

It begins the First Sunday of September and should actively continue every Sunday of September and October until every missionary church has sent a liberal Centennial Offering.

PUT UP THAT MAP AND ORDER THOSE SUPPLIES

A poster-map and a post-card have been sent to every pastor or correspondent. Give the Map a Conspicuous place in your Auditorium and call attention to it. It shows a great work done by the Board of Church Extension. Fill out the post-card, ordering your supplies for the Annual Offering and send the post-card to G. W. Muckley, Kansas City, Mo. He will furnish up-to-date literature. It is attractive and the people will need it if you give it to them with a word of commendation.

IF INFORMATION IS GIVEN, MONEY IS GIVEN

People want the facts. We are criminally neglectful if we fail to give glowing facts to the brethren and thus fail to get money for the Extension of the Kingdom. The Church Extension Board has stirred up great activity in mission church building this Centennial Year by promising nearly $200,000 to 153 congregations to help them build. Let us help our Church Extension Board to pay these loans by rolling up a great offering for that work in the month of September.

LISTEN TO THIS: THINK HARD ABOUT IT

1.—1,248 churches have been helped to their buildings by the Church Extension Fund in 44 states.
2.—684 of these have paid their loans in full.
3.—Over $864,000 has been returned on loans, showing that the Church Extension Plan of having the money go out and, returning, go out again and again, is working beyond our fondest hopes.
4.—The Pity is that

ONLY 1,700 CONGREGATIONS

of our stronger churches have ever had fellowship in the annual Offering for Church Extension. Let us make it Unanimous This Year!

☛ Did you ever inquire about the Church Extension Annuity Plan? It is advantageous to you and to the church. Write

Paramount Ideals for the Centennial

What Supreme Characteristics Shall Our Celebration Show Forth?

The Centennial celebration of the Disciples of Christ next October will be more than a feast of rejoicing; it will be an open invitation to the world to stop and consider the principles we advocate. And we may not doubt that both ourselves and our principles will be searchingly analyzed.

It is of first importance, therefore, that our great convention should epitomize and illustrate the paramount ideals of our history.

What characteristics do we wish to be writ so large and plain in our celebration that both the casual observer and the earnest student cannot fail to be impressed by them?

We wish it to be put beyond dispute that we, the Disciples of Christ, have been dead in earnest in all this century of talk about Christian Union.

In the days of our fathers, Christian Union was a remote, impracticable and, to many people, an undesirable consummation.

But in our day it is an imminent issue.

The ideal of the church catholic is looming larger and larger in the souls of leaders in all denominations.

Every problem the modern church confronts awakens in her a sense of powerlessness so long as she is divided into sects.

The missionary problem, the evangelistic problem, the educational problem and this great, new, vague social problem—not one of them can be solved by the denominations acting separately.

Many of the great spirits in all the denominations, seeing this, are giving themselves today to a passionate advocacy of Christian union. It is in the air.

But up to date the Disciples of Christ are the only body of Christians which, as a body, has set itself consciously and systematically to realize this ideal.

The Declaration and Address, published by Thomas Campbell in 1809, the Magna Charta of this century-old movement, was a Christian Union pamphlet. Through all the years of phenomenal growth the Disciples have had but one aim: to draw together the scattered flock of Christ that there might be one fold and one shepherd.

The pathos of the present hour is the fact that our history is not interpreted by our brethren of the various denominations as making for Christian Union.

We are regarded by many as another divisive factor in the already confused and distraught church. To them our startling success has only this bare singificance: that we have added yet another great denomination to those already existing!

Our Centennial celebration is our chance to interpret our history and to disclose our aims and motives in such breadth of temper and such unselfish yearning love as to convince the world that we are in truth not another denomination with a fixed body of doctrine and sectarian tests of fellowship, but simply Christians, standing on catholic ground, in the liberty wherewith Christ would make all his disciples free.

Besides this, our Centennial celebration should demonstrate to the world that we have solved the problem of unity among ourselves on the very basis which we proclaim as the catholic and Christian basis for the union of all Christ's people.

What we are will speak louder than what we say.

Unless we are at peace among ourselves how shall we offer a platform of peace to our divided brethren?

If in the application of our principles within our own body, we should be found outraging the liberty of any Christian brother or body of brethren on account of nonconformity in belief, what pitiable irony would there be in our attempt to unite the whole religious world upon those same principles!

We are God's experiment in Christian Union.

Before He can use us as His instrument of unity, we must show ourselves capable of embracing in our fellowship many minds of widely differing creeds and philosophies.

Before the divided church will believe union is possible at all, somebody must exemplify it.

And it must be exemplified not on a sectarian basis but on a catholic basis. It must be the unity of variety and difference, not of uniformity and precise agreement.

The truly catholic church does not turn its heretics out but keeps them in. A Christian-souled heretic is the glory of the true church of Christ.

Happily the Pittsburg convention gives promise of illustrating this catholicity. There, men of the most widely different views in theology, Biblical criticism and philosophy will speak from the same platform. They will find their unity not in doctrine but in the love of Christ and the earnest desire to more fully possess his mind and do his will.

God grant that this ideal and promise may not go unfulfilled!

Yet, great as are those ideals, there is one which transcends all others in our prayer for the Centennial. That is this:

That we Disciples of Christ might be able to exhibit a type of spiritual life so rich, so reasonable, so genuine, so independent of artificial supports and stimuli that the world would take notice of it more even than of our doctrines or our programs.

After all, the world will ask more concerning the vital inner aspect of our religion than concerning our policies of church statesmanship.

Mankind is not worrying itself greatly about church platforms.

But in our day men and women are yearning for a living God.

There was never so much challenge to the church to demonstrate its religion in life as at this hour. The old time arguments for faith are unconvincing to those who read even the surface literature of the day.

What counts most in commending the spiritual life is not an argument about it but a living illustration of it. Evermore the law of spiritual progress demands that the word become flesh and dwell among men.

And we Disciples of Christ are self-committed to this responsibility. A motto in wide use among us declares that we are set for "the restoration of the primitive doctrine, ordinances and life."

Volumes have been written, ten thousands of sermons preached on our distinctive interpretation of the doctrines and ordinances.

But has any one ever declared that we are obliged to make a distinctive interpretation of the primitive life?

As a matter of fact this last item in our motto has always been dismissed with the ingenuous assumption that the "life" needs no fresh interpretation; that the orthodox standard of piety is as near Christ's experience as we can well get.

But any one with eyes to see cannot fail to note that the weakness of modern Christianity is primarily a weakness of its spiritual life. It is a fact that orthodox piety is dangerously near being conventionalized into unreality. Its smooth-worn appeal is easily withstood by the sophisticated world. Within the church it maintains itself by constant resort to artificial stimulants.

What do we, the Disciples of Christ, have to offer the world that is better, more genuine, more Christ-like than the traditional piety of the churches?

Heretics in church forms and doctrines, do we fear to be distinctive in the use we may make of Christ's God? We who call the world "back to Christ," shall we refuse to let him take us back to his Father?

Our Centennial is the time for the striking of a great new note in our history. Having played for a century on two strings let us bring forth the full harmony of our restoration plea by touching into music the unused string of our wondrous harp.

Here is our high hope, our paramount ideal, for the Pittsburg convention: that some great soul, having found its way "back to Christ" and learned the Christianity that was in his breast, will come before the people and show us the richer possibilities of life—of every-day strength and peace and quietness and health and service—through intelligent fellowship with the God Jesus knew.

This would be indeed the highest good.

The Trend of Events

By Alva W. Taylor

SCHOOLS FOR TUBERCULOSIS CHILDREN

One of the latest humanitarian devices is a school for tuberculosis children. The little folks are taken to a quiet, healthful spot with fresh air and plenty of outdoors and taught both the things that make for education and for the overcoming of their disease. They soon learn to relax and take plenty of sleep while the proper kind of food is given them. They will ultimately be made healthy, trained young people, able to cope with the world. Meanwhile their lives are saved, they are kept from innocently infecting other children in the public schools, their homes are relieved of the burden that often is too great to be borne where children are numerous and wages small. If Gladstone was right when he said one of the chief functions of government was to protect the health of its citizens, the school boards that provide special schools for children with infectuous diseases are among the wisest of governmental agents.

MISCHIEVOUS IDLE HANDS

The vacation problem in the city of children is one that is receiving wise attention. We are becoming too civilized to longer blame children with nothing to do for the mischief they get into. Active brains and idle hands will not keep the peace. The country child has plenty of opportunity to work off the superfluous energy through untramelled play. The city child has the same energy but is tramelled with the devices of civilization in the shape of streets and houses and other folks that he will run against things in his natural and spontaneous efforts to "do something." The remedy is not to blame him or deplore him or stunt him by shutting him up neither to endure him and finally send him to jail for something he does because he just grew up that way. The remedy is to deal with him as wisely as a farmer does with his colts, at least, and give his boundless nature a chance to exercise itself in a place where he cannot hurt himself, and since he is human, to add to it a direction that will further humanize him. This is being done now in vacation schools. The little chaps are given a sort of nature study school, a playground training during the summer. Their superfluous energies are directed instead of being allowed to run into things or to explode both to the menace of society and of the child. Chicago cared for 8,000 this summer, nearly double the number of last year. This work was begun by women's clubs and philanthropic societies until the school board was convinced. Now that its virtues are manifest it will doubtless become a regular part of the school activity in large cities.

WILL WOMEN BE BOTH EDUCATORS AND EDUCATED?

We spend $500,000,000 annually on the education of 20,000,000 children and young people. We employ nearly half a million teachers and seventy-eight out of every 100 of them are women. Their average wage is $44 per month as against $56 for the men. This is accounted for by the fact that men fill most of the superintendencies, where salaries are high, while women teach practically all the country and grade schools. Here is one vocation where woman receives like pay for like work done. Women will come into these higher positions ultimately to a larger degree. Mrs. Young has been made superintendent of Chicago's schools at a salary of $10,000 per year and it is generally accepted as a wise election. She is sixty-three years old and has spent her entire life in the city's public schools.

But women are not only our educators but the question may be asked if they are to become our educated. Girls predominate in all our public schools. In the grades they number 56 per cent as against 44 per cent of boys. In the high schools they likewise outnumber the boys. They are now admitted to all but three of the state universities. But few of the great universities refuse to admit them and most of those provide an auxilliary school of equal standing for them. In some of the co-educational higher institutions they bid fair to soon predominate and two of them have arbitrarily limited the number to be received to prevent it. Equally significant is the fact that they average higher grades than do the men.

This can hardly be said to be the result of woman's greater aspiration for education. It is due to the fact that boys are sent to the shop and fields while girls have more leisure from the responsibility of systematic tasks and also doubtless to the fact that they must prepare to become teachers, that vocation that is so rapidly becoming theirs and is so inviting to them as compared to work as domestics or factory girls.

But women have another title to recognition as the coming educated class. Their clubs and reading circles number thousands. They have become the semi-leisure class in our economic life. Their work in the home lends itself more easily to such opportunity than does the man's work at desk, shop, or plow.

EDUCATION IN RUSSIA

Russia proposes to establish some 150,000 more primary schools. But 3.3 per cent of her population goes to school. In United States we send nearly 22 per cent. At this Russia has almost doubled the percentage of her school population in the last quarter century. Twice as many boys as girls attend the elementary schools already established. There are nine universities and a number of technical schools and about half a million attend middle schools. The universities are frequently closed because they become the hot beds of patriotic sedition. Education is dangerous to tyranny but ignorance is more dangerous to government. Thus Russian bureaucracy is between the menace of a great illiterate mass catching the zeit geist of freedom and arising to anarchy and the danger of education as a leaven of progress.

We spend an average of $28 per annum for the education of each pupil. Russia spends an average of $10. Seventy-three per cent of her people remain illiterate. Germany, Switzerland, and the Scandinavian countries have but 1 per cent of illiteracy. In the United States there is 10 per cent—the most of it of course among the illiterate immigrants from Russia and lands like Italy and Austria where from one-third to one-half of the people can neither read nor write, and among the negroes of the South where about one-third are illiterate.

Russia's hope is in education. Modern revolutions are more economic than political even. The masses in Russia are on the edge of dire poverty at all times. They are deprived of much to do with and know little what to do with the little they possess. Education will create new demands and new abilities to do.

"RED RUBBER" AND THE CONGO

Nothing struggles so desperately or surrenders so bitterly as vested interest. It is bourbon by nature and proceeds, in the end, on the theory of "after us the flood." It will placate and compromise for personal advantage and strive to allay the rising wrath but it will not surrender until dragged to the block.

United States has joined Britain in refusing assent to Belgian assumption of rule in the Congo until assurance is given that the natives will be protected in their rights and the freedom of trade guaranteed. Leopold is a crafty financier. He sought to escape the storm by transferring the rule of the Congo to the Belgian government but behind it all preserving substantial guarantee of his interests. No arrangement has yet been made to restore landed rights to the natives. Until that is done they are robbed of their patrimony and made the serfmen of foreign syndicates. Wrath is rising in England and Sir Edward Grey, the foreign minister, is strongly with popular feeling in the matter. The British populace are not moved by land grabbing interests as has been accused. No public arises more powerfully to humane interests than that of England once it is aroused.

Two of the missionaries that gave most damaging evidence on the "Red Rubber" atrocities have been cited to appear at the mouth of the Congo in answer to charges of libel. This is more than a thousand miles from their homes and they must come by portage and boat. M. Vandervelde, the able socialist leader in the Belgian parliament, has announced his intention of voluntarily going to the Congo to defend them. The greatest fear of their friends was lack of adequate defense in French language. Again the effort to relieve the world may be their undoing.

NEWSPAPER LYING

After the murder of Elsie Siegel in New York's Chinatown there was an anarchy of words in the editorials of daily papers of the yellow type denouncing missions. No doubt mistakes have been made by overzealous women overstepping the bounds of good judgment in efforts to teach Chinese men. But to quote Sir Robert Hart as saying "no Chinaman was ever converted or ever will be" and then hang editorials on the supposed statement of that eminent man, charging that no Chinaman ever came into a Christian mission without either a lustful or a commercial intent, is to reach the depths of intellectual anarchy and unreasoning race hate. Now to find that the quotation from Sir Robert was an unqualified lie does not help these hasty purveyors of nasty yellow sensations. Sir Robert indignantly answers that not only did he not say the above but that he repeats what he has said on many occasions—"that the Word of Life is nowhere sown on barren soil" and that in the Boxer rebellion "thousands of Chinese Christians bowed to death rather than recant." Minister Conger said "you will search history in vain for more glorious examples of martyrdom * * * they suffered and died by thousands rather than give up one iota of their faith."

Yet even religious papers will quote as authoritive the reports that a certain professor has said the Bible is not to be used in Sunday-school instruction and conduct the kind of crusade among its readers that a mad dog does on a city street when what the professor really said was that there must be a selection of Biblical materials for Sunday-school instruction. The daily paper lied with the utmost deliberation because it knew its readers liked sensation and the religious press circulated the lie with great zeal because it served its purpose of discrediting its foes in the world of orthodoxy. Which is the yellowist?

THE NEW TARIFF AND THE POOR MAN'S CLOTHING

The wholesale houses report raises in woolen and cotton goods since the enactment of the new tarriff law. We import some 50,000,000 pair of cheap stockings each year. They run from eight to twelve cents per pair in value. The Dingley law taxed them from five cents to eight cents per pair. The new law raises the tax an average of three cents per pair. The poorer classes alone use them. The hosiery makers of Pennsylvania alone benefit by the tax and great is the name of Senator Penrose among them. They will give a great banquet in his honor and their employees will march before him.

We export $50,000,000 worth of cotton goods each year. We cannot use all we make. Cotton is the cheapest of cloths and thus any raise in price strikes the poor hardest. The new law raises the tariff tax on various kinds of the cloths that are rated as necessaries, from 6 to 500 per cent. Many of the increases are from 50 to 100 per cent. Muslins valued at less than seven cents per yard are raised 150 per cent if unbleached and 500 per cent if bleached. After citing some of the above facts and proving them from statements prepared by the Treasury Department, Senator Dolliver (Rep.) said—"and yet the statement has been made here that only minor and insignificant changes had been made in that schedule. The American people are being duped with that kind of humbug and mi-representation. I denounce this as an organized conspiracy against the American people." He charged that it would likely mean a reorganization of the cotton manufacturing business with "millions of common stock issued against the statutes of the United States."

TOM JOHNSON'S "CRUSHING DEFEAT."

Tom Johnson has again been "crushingly defeated." This is the last of the numerous "crushing defeats" the Phoenix-like Tom has endured in his ten years fight for the people of Cleveland and, incidentially, for all the cities of the land.

His last was defeat in a public referendum on the granting of a franchise to a new street car company to operate three cent fares on one of the streets of Cleveland. It was meant to be the thin end of a wedge for the ousting of the old companies and a complete reorganization of the street car business of the city and a complete victory for Johnson in his long battle for the three cent fare. It was defeated by one vote in twenty with 15,000 who registered not voting. The corporations, banks, "Big Business," all the purchaseable votes, and the "chaplains of the wicked wealthy" were against it and with them many who honestly are for whatever "Big Business" advocates, blindly thinking their own success depends upon the successful.

This throws the whole matter back to the basis proposed by Judge Taylor, viz., that the fare be fixed at three cents for a straight ride with one cent for transfers; that an arbitration committee be appointed to appraise the property of the street car company and that if the above arrangement as to fares does not produce 6 per cent profits the fares shall be raised to seven for twenty-five cents. This is the measure of Mayor Johnson's "crushing defeat."

Editorial

CAN we afford to die? This is the question put by Rev. Quincy L. Dowd in an article in Unity on "The Growing Burden of our Funeral Customs." In traveling in European countries he made a careful study of the customs connected with the burial of the dead and found that in Great Britain, Belgium, Switzerland, Italy and France they are far more intelligent and civilized, not to say Christianized, than we of America in this matter. In Japan the Buddhist scale of costs is a mere bagatelle compared with what a Chicago or St. Paul undertaker figures out. An American, he adds, "would save money for his family to buy passage to Japan and die there." Here are the items which make up the American undertaker's bill of wrongs:

(1)	Obituaries—press	$ 1.50
(2)	Hearse	10.00
(3)	Carriages (8)	32.00
(4)	Flower wagon
(5)	Cemetery (Oakland) fixing grave for interment	11.00
(6)	Draperies, black silk ribbons	3.50
(7)	Gloves (silk)	6.00
(8)	Embalming (Chicago price)	25.00
(9)	Dressing
(10)	Shaving the corpse (a charge made in Los Angest)	15.00
(11)	Attendance at grave	15.00
(12)	Engraved plate on coffin
(13)	Outside case (slate box or vault)	35.00
(14)	Burial suit
(15)	Miscellaneous, chairs	2.00

There may be added to this a fee to the minister, though seldom. If singers are hired it means for each $5.00.

"The major part of this modern unchristian and senseless style of burial is utter waste and worse. Give a moment's thought to it! Splendid cloth-covered boxes, lined with satins or other costly stuffs, handles of bronze, and silvered plate engraved, all this borne to a crematory and thrust into a fiery furnace to be consumed in a moment! If not so consigned to destruction, then lowered into the ground, in an instant lost to sight, and then left to decay! Perchance a cement box has been let down as a receptacle for the coffin, thus to hinder the quick return of dust to dust. Then, too, the tasteless smother of flowers. I am convinced that the church should protest against certain abuses in the conducting of modern funerals in which she bears a part. The church ought first to know the tragedies bound up with modern burial costs, and to try to protect society from this inflicted burden. We who are ministers might, if we had the courage of good sense, avoid the ridiculousness of much of it, the sheer paganism and vulgarity not infrequent in ordering obsequies, though to be sure, so fallen is the minister in these days from any but a perfunctory part in affairs even of his own office, that he is never consulted about preparation for a burial, and offers no real help to the bereaved."

THE two popular leaders of progressive religious thought in Chicago and the West during the past generation were David Swing and Hiram W. Thomas. Both were the subjects of heresy trials, one in the Presbyterian, the other in the Methodist church. Professor Swing withdrew from the Presbyterian ministry when his opponents, led by Dr. Francis L. Patton, now president of Princeton Theological Seminary, announced their purpose to continue the fight to the Synod after Professor Swing had won in the Presbytery. Dr. Thomas was convicted of heresy on his first trial and deposed from the ministry. Both heretics founded independent churches in the heart of Chicago—Professor Swing's, the Central Church and Dr. Thomas', the People's Church. For nearly a quarter of a century they held forth, preaching to great congregations. Professor Swing died a dozen years ago and was followed by Dr. Hillis who in turn was followed by Dr. Gunsaulus, the latter now preaching to one of the largest, if not the largest, Sunday congregation in the English speaking world. Dr. Thomas resigned his pulpit shortly after Professor Swing's death. His successors could not wear his mantle and the People's Church has passed away. Two weeks ago its founder passed away at his home at De Funiak Springs, Florida, in his seventieth year. His funeral service was held in Chicago last week at Abraham Lincoln Center where a great throng of citizens assembled at the inconvenient hour of noon to honor his memory. Jenkin Lloyd Jones spoke of him as "Chicago's great commoner, prophet of the open mind, and friend of everybody." Probably no two preachers have written their thoughts so deep in Chicago's life as these two. Swing was a poet-preacher. Thomas a philosopher-preacher.

IF ONE has in himself the love of a game or a contest he cannot fail to be intensely interested in the race the Foreign Society is making this year against its own record of last year. Our news columns last week showed a statement from the secretaries announcing that the receipts for Foreign missions were now $50,000 ahead of last year, there having been a gain during the first ten days of August of $6,161 over the corresponding period last year. Our secretaries have set their hearts on making a gain of at least $60,000 before the Centennial convention is held. All our readers will watch intently the reports sent out from time to time. The growth of the missionary vision and responsibility among the Disciples in the past quarter century is more significant than any other feature of our movement which we can celebrate at Pittsburg. It betokens the essential soundness and spirituality of the brotherhood's heart. It shows that our ideal of speaking where the Book speaks is taken broadly and seriously with us; that we do not interpret the great communion partially but comprehensively, regarding the command to "go" as equally imperative with the instruction to "baptize" all believers. Ours is a rich brotherhood in this world's goods and growing immensely richer each year. Nothing can stay the momentum of our purpose to lead all the denominations early in our new century in the divine business of carrying the gospel to the ends of the earth. Only while we are rolling up the increase for Foreign Missions let us not forget that Church Extension has the right of way in September!

OF THE total church membership reported by the various religious bodies and classified by sex the Census Bureau of the United States reports that 43.1 per cent are males and 63.9 per cent females. Among Protestants the disparity is greater, only 39.3 per cent being males, while in the Roman Catholic church the males formed 49.3 per cent of the total membership. The almost equal division of the sexes in the Catholic church is no doubt due to the fact that their statistics take account of christenings, thus including all the children of the family as well as the adults and not active members only but all adults that have ever been baptized Fewer males than females were found among the Latter Day Saints, the Lutherans, Disciples, Methodists, Baptists, Presbyterians, and Protestant Episcopalians, the percentage of male members decreasing he order shown, and there being but 35.5 per cent of males among the Episcopalians. Among the Christian Scientists only 27.6 per cent were males, and of the Shakers but 21.3 per cent, but in the Greek Orthodox church 93.9 per cent were males.

Of the total estimated population of the continental United States in 1906, the church members formed 39.1 per cent, as against 32,7 per cent for 1890. Of this 6.4 per cent increase the Roman Catholic church is credited with 4.4 per cent, and the Protestants with 1.8, the remainder being divided among all other denominations.

The total church membership for 1906 was 32,936,445, of which number the Protestants were credited with 20,287,742, and the Roman Catholics with 12,079,142. Of the Protestant bodies the Methodists numbered 5,749,838, the Baptists 5,662,234, the Lutherans 2,112,494, the Presbyterians 1,830,555, and the Disciples 1,142,000. The rate of increase shown for the Roman Catholic church is 93.5 per cent, which is more than twice that for all the Protestant bodies combined.

A WHOLESOME and in a high degree effective rebuke is that which Professor George Herbert Palmer of Harvard University is administering the irresponsible American press. He has been twice the victim of the wanton methods of such newspapers this summer. In his attempt to recover the personal dignity which the reporters dragged through the public prints he has taken occasion to say the indignant things that he has a right to say. In The Congregationalist Professor Palmer makes reply to the report that he was about to be married again, a report that was given publicity at the very time he was participating in the unveiling of a tablet in memory of his late wife, Alice Freeman Palmer, at Radcliffe College. Professor Palmer declared that story to have been fiction pure and simple and that the alleged interview in which, it was insinuated, he had allowed the publication of the report, was never had. Later one of the yellowest of the Boston papers took a facetious sentence from a serious address Dr. Palmer made at Radcliffe College and on the basis of this sentence ascribed to him an "Address on Flirting," in which he is described as encouraging this frivolity. Now he remonstrates in The Outlook against the copying of this "story," which originated in the Boston paper. Professor Palmer says, "Reports of my depravity have lately been sent to me from English and French papers, and in a recent number of Life I appear in a capital cartoon, my utterance being reckoned as one of the principal incidents of the month. It apparently did not occur to any of my abusers to look up the evidence of my folly. I dare say it was the very unlikelihood of the tale which gave it currency. I was in general known to be a quiet person, with no liking for notoriety, a teacher of one of the gravest of subjects in a dignified university. I had just publish a largely circulated biography, presenting an exalted ideal of marriage. It struck the press of the country as a diverting thing to reverse all this in a day, to picture me as favoring loose relations of the sexes, and to attribute to me buffoonery from which every decent man recoils. The low state of the editorial conscience in the daily press is rendered possible, Professor Palmer says, by the "lazy credulity of the public," a public which knows well enough the "recklessness of journalism as clearly as do I on whom its dirty water has been poured. Yet readers trust, and journal copies journal." Considering the vast influence of the press in modern life the most important asset in the moral progress of society is the development of an editorial conscience. And this conscience is needed in editorial offices in religious as well as in secular journalism.

AN INTERESTING illustration of the application of the principles of higher criticism outside of the Bible is afforded by our foolhardy contemporary, the Christian Standard, in its last week's issue. A contributed article by J. B. Jones on Professor George B. Foster makes an attack upon Professor H. L. Willett by quoting detached sentences from a recent editorial in The Christian Century on the Foster case. On the basis of the quotations from this editorial Professor Willett is made out to be a "champion" and defender of the Baptist heretic. Not to characterized it too seriously, this is, at least, a pretty "nervy" thing to do. The Christian Century has more than one editor. The editorial on Professor Foster had no name or initials attaching to it, nothing to indicate who of the various writers on our editorial staff had composed it. But Mr. Jones is so sure of Professor Willett's authorship of the article on the strength of purely "internal evidence" that he goes the length of calling him "a defender of the most iconoclastic enemy the Christian religion has ever had." We would be interested to know what are the ear marks of Professor Willett's style in the editorial referred to. Some occult method of identifying the authorship of documents, unknown to the experts, must be in the possession of the Standard's contributor. It always seemed to the present writer that it required a good bit of assurance to pick out a passage in the Old estament and assign it to a particular author whose name does not appear in connection with it. But the safety of the higher critic who deals in ancient writings is that both the real writer and the one to whom the book is assigned by the critic have been a long time dead. There is no danger of their rising up to embarrass the said critic. But J. B. Jones is a critic who presumes to assign an unsigned writing to a man still quite alive, and to make a personal attack upon the alleged author on the strength of a mere guess. We do not know that the editorial in question does not express the views of Professor Willett, but we submit that for he editor of The Standard to allow a correspondent to make an unauthenicated article the basis of a vicious personal characterization and himself to echo the characterization in his editorial column is rather a fool-hardy piece of journalism.

When to this fool-hardiness is added palpable misrepresentation of the editorial from which quotation is made, the offense becomes yet more serious. One could not find a more dishonest use of another's words than Mr. Jones has made of The Christian Century editorial. Because our statement treated Professor Foster like a gentleman, acknowledging his scholarly attainments and his personal graciousness, he editor of the Standard calls the alleged author of the editorial, "the special apologist of this blasphemer." The fundamenal and fatal criticism we urged against the Foster book our detractor passes by in silence. Mr. Jones does not add to his reputation among his brethren when he lends himself as an instrument of the Standard in reviving the unholy warfare to which an indignant brotherhood put a stop not many months ago.

Interpreting the Value of Scripture to the Spiritual Life

By F. Treudly

To him who has ever read in Ruskin's Praeterita the testimony of this great man to the power of God's Word, not only as an instrument of inspiration to holy thought but for forming his own style upon those lines, exquisite lines which showed him the supreme master of English prose of the nineteenth century, there must have come some notion of the true significance of this great book for human life and its fitness for our daily needs. The Bible stands forth as a power full of immortal vigor summoning into active life the crude energies of men, ripening them and refining them in process, directing them into activities appropriate to beings formed in God's image, and filling the hearts of the obedient with love and gratitude for such a destiny as is therein set forth and proven in the unfolding of life's deepest experiences.

Logic is the science which deals with proof. It analyzes the fact of experience in order to determine casual relationships. It is the science of reality. But spiritual reality is self-conscious life and gives its deepest proofs in terms of feeling. The sense of worthiness is the consciousness of the fact that deeds and aspirations are in harmony with the true self which is the self not only of today but of yesterday, tomorrow and forever, not of one place but of all places, not of one event but of all events, not of the self as an individual but as the representative of all other selves and an expression of an infinite One in whom "we live, move and have our being." God's word is the logic of life so plainly set forth that "the wayfaring man though a fool may not err therein."

Let the reader in the light of these remarks turn if he will to that noble volume by Prothero "The Psalms of David in Human Life" and note the effects of David's words upon multitudes of persons in every walk of life and in every condition of experience. Above all let him consider the comforting nature of these words and their healing power in times of extremest need and he will see how David was at one with all mankind. He had worn the purple and the sackcloth, had sat on thrones and on footstools, had been victorious and defeated, had marched at the head of armies and had been pursued by them, had felt the favors of the world and its scorn, had loved and lost, had aspired to the courts of heaven and had been thrown into the jaws of hell, had basked in the sunshine of God's favor and withered beneath the vengeance of His righteousness, had felt every emotion of the soul from the sinless hope of a lovely youth to the grasping passion of a sensual despot possessed of unlimited power. His harp was indeed of a thousand strings. This was David but because his was an unending warfare with his baser self, ending at last in triumph, he could sound every note capable of being heard by man and ages at its true worth every moral value possible to humanity. The Psalms are God's workings in and through David upon the human race. They are proosf of the divine within him. It is the divine within us that enables us to read and understand.

The writer's youth was associated with a dear old man who was wont each day at its beginning to assemble about him his family to read from God's Word and briefly to comment thereon. Time and again and again all the Psalms were read in his hearing but he recalls with great distinctness the first, eighth, fourteenth, fifteenth, nineteenth, twenty-third, twenty-fourth, twenty-seventh, thirty-second, thirty-eighth, fortieth, forty-first, forty-second, forty-sixth, fifty-first, fifty-fifth, sixty-second, sixty-seventh, seventy-first, ninetieth, ninety-sixth, ninety-seventh, 103d, 104th, 105th, 107th, 121st, 122d, 125th, 136th, 139th, 148th. With much reverence were they read and dwelt upon, the old man seemingly entering into the very sanctuary of life and issuing forth like a prophet bearing in his heart a burden of truth. Great men are always serious for the staple values with which they deal are of immortal texture. The garments which they wear as the covering of their souls are dipped in the colors of Paradise. Common things take on uncommon values. Plain, obscure life is woven in the same pattern. All good men work and live as ever in the great Taskmaster's eye.

In his recent list of books worthy of a place upon the "five-foot shelf" ex-President Eliot recommends a life of St. Augustine. Those who have had the fortune to know something of this great man will linger over that passage of his life where he tells us how in the garden of the Cathedral of Milan he heard in his meditations so painful with doubt a voice which said "Tolle, lege; tolle lege." He opened the Scriptures and his eyes fell upon the closing words of the thirteenth chapter of Romans. Why did these words take such hold upon him. Had the prayers of his mother Monica offered unceasingly throughout his life aught to do with this experience? Had those hours of reverential intercourse with this great woman upon the sacred theme any bearing, reaching possibly across the vale of tears made so by his invasion of the personality of others in the interest of his merely temporal self, to bring truth more firmly to his mind? When God fails to strive with men it is not meant that he casts men off but that men cast God off. They simply cease to hear. The din of the world's lustful clamor quenches the still small voice. God's voice could speak at last and be heard by St. Augustine. Out of his sinful life he arose and from a hater of the faith he became faith's greatest defender because at last he was enabled to return to himself, God's man at work out in the open, upon the great highways of life. No partial narrow life was for him hereafter. It was to be, in his own words, "a whole Christ for my salvation, a whole Bible for my staff, a whole church for my fellowship, and the whole world for my parish."

How many passages of Scripture laden with meaning have become permanent possession of mine, being the gift of others; from Robertson of Brighton whom I love, in his sermon upon Isaiah 57:15, from a dear sister ostracized for the teaching of negro children in the South after the war, finding refreshment in James 1:5, from my father again comparing the first letter of John to a counterfeit detector, a comparison very clear to those whose experience antedates the Civil War, from Prof. R. G. Moulton estimating the recorded speeches of Moses as the finest ever written, and to me that passage so expressive of the fullness and completeness of his life summed up the closing words of Joshua 24:5.

How many thoughts have come to me out of my own reading of words filled with the "power of an endless life."

In my college days as an undergraduate student I heard a great sermon upon Paul's philosophy of salvation based upon Second Corinthians 3:18. Thereafter these words were charged with meaning never to be forgotten. In those days also I heard a sermon upon Proverbs 21:4. A deep impression was left upon my mind of the utter folly of labor merely in behalf of ones' self, since labor for the mere self is the consummation of evil because it means the extinction of life. I recall a fine discourse upon amusements based upon Philippians 4:8, emphasis being laid upon "whatsoever things are of good report." I then learned in part to understand more clearly that one cannot fling with impunity evil practices in the face of those who have wrought nobly and against which practice they have made their protest. I heard many years ago a great discourse by O. A. Burgess upon these words, "And Jesus was about thirty years of age when He began to preach." How grandly he taught the lesson that adequate preparation is needed for a great life work. I once listened to a sermon by one called the "Boy Preacher." He seemed a mere boy and yet he had shaken the city of Indianapolis as few men have ever done and as I listened I wondered whence came his power. I did not enjoy him. He spoke upon the text, "Quench not the spirit," and yet, despite my protestations against his mannerisms, he drove that truth home with great force.

Finally I think the supreme words uttered upon this footstool are found in Luke 23:24. What makes them so supreme? They are the words of Him "who bore our sorrows and was acquainted with grief," and in these words the true interpretation finds the supreme attestation of his own worth and the divinity of his Lord.

As the years go by I find myself more and more appreciative of the following words found beneath the pillow of a dead soldier in the Civil War:

> O holy, holy Book of God,
> There are no words like thine:
> The tones that angels bow to hear
> Flow through these lines divine;
> And come with Love's own melody,
> From the King's heart to mine.

Singing in the Rain

Last night I heard a robin singing in the rain,
And the raindrops' patter made a sweet refrain,
Making all the sweeter the music of the strain.

So, I thought, when trouble comes, as trouble will,
Why should I stop singing? Just beyond the hill
It may be that sunshine floods the green world still.

He who faces trouble with a heart of cheer
Makes the burden lighter. If there falls a tear,
Sweeter is the cadence in the song we hear.

I have learned your lesson, bird of dappled wing,
Listening to your music with its lilt of spring,—
When the storm-cloud darkens, then's the time to sing.

Burlington, Kentucky

The Little Town in Boone County Where Thomas Campbell Established an Academy

By Edgar DeWitt Jones

Coming into Cincinnati from the west, either over the "Big Four" or the "B. & O. Southwestern," the trains run for fifteen miles through the valley of the Ohio and Miami, and almost parallel with the first named river. As the traveler looks out across the Ohio he sees rising abrupt and precipitous the sentinel-like hills of Old Kentucky. If it is winter, he will see them bare and bleak; but if it is spring or summer, he will see them beautiful in green leaf and tangled vine. From the first glimpse of the Kentucky shore near Lawrenceburg or Aurora, Indiana, until the train passes Anderson's Ferry, Ohio, those hills are in Boone county, of which Burlington, where Thomas Campbell once presided over an academy, is the county seat.

Boone county is, of course, named in honor of the great pioneer and pathfinder, Daniel Boone. In several ways the county is of unique and historic interest. It is the most northern county in the state; is shaped like a horse shoe, and has a river front of fifty miles or more. Many years ago the bones of a rare species of the mastodon were dug up at what is now known as Big Bone Springs, and the geological formations in many parts of the county are sufficiently unusual to attract the scientist and "rock hunter." Then, too, Boone county is the setting of John Uri Lloyd's novels, "Stringtown on the Pike" and "Warwick of the Knobs," tales that depict passion and prejudice as they existed there fifty years ago. Parts of the county are fertile and the home of prosperous and hospitable farmers, with fair and winsome daughters. (I ought to know, for I wedded one of them.)

In so far as the Disciples are concerned, this soil must be reckoned as historic ground, and this aside from the fact that Thomas Campbell taught school at the county seat. Many famous men among us preached regularly, debated, or held meetings here. Walter Scott, A. Campbell, Benj. Franklin, James Challen, Philemon Vawter, W. S. Keene, W. J. Howe, J. F. Rowe, J. S. Sweeney, Frank G. Allen, and Thomas Arnold, not to mention names of younger men are among those who labored here abouts to restore Apostolic Christianity. At Petersburg on the Ohio; Walton in the extreme southern part of the county, at Bullettsville, Florence and Bellevue, we have comfortably housed congregations, besides the strong country churches known as "South Fork" "Beaver," and "Point Pleasant."

But Burlington, the county seat, the town where Thomas Campbell once taught, what of it now, and what of the tradition of Campbell's enterprise there as it may be gleaned today from the aged and white-bearded lips of old men whose fathers sat in Campbell's classes—what of these things?

The spot where the school or academy building stood is now occupied by the modern brick residence of State Senator S. W. Tolin. Twenty years ago the old brick—the very same one in which Mr. Campbell taught, was torn down. Many of course remembed it; but no one has a picture of it or knows where one may be found. It was a substantial building and was built of brick. That much we know.

There is living at Lawrenceburg, Indiana, an old man whose father attended the academy, and who has in his possession, so I am told, a roster of all the pupils, exactly seventy in number. Of course not one is living now. As to the details of the incident that led to Mr. Campbell's giving up his school and shaking the dust of Burlington from his feet, there is some difference of tradition, but none material. It was the objection of the Burlingtonians to his teaching the negroes, that is why Mr. Campbell left. Whether it was in the woods that he taught them, as some aver, or in his study or sitting room, as others say; it was the objection of the people to his teaching the negroes at all that resulted in the closed school and the departure from the place of a most cultured and kindly man.

Thomas Campbell.

The town of Burlington is a small and typical county seat of northern Kentucky. I should guess the population to be five hundred, with a conviction that I am throwing in a hundred for good measure. It is, except on court days, one of the quietest, and most sleepy of places. Twice a day the "bus" brings the mails from Erlanger, seven miles away on the "Queen and Crescent." Politics is the subject nearly always up for discussion by the men who loaf about the court house or sit in front of the stores, whitling sticks and chewing infinite tobacco. There is, however, a fine spirit of hospitality manifest in the little place and the women folk are famed for their good cooking. There are yet left a few families who keep up the traditional customs and manners of southern social life of fifty years ago, but they are not many, and fast passing away.

It is not pleasant to write the truth about Burlington, religiously especially, when one has partaken of the generous hospitality in some of its homes. It is doubtful if there is a town of like size anywhere that is so absolutely indifferent to the church and its claims. Very few of the men attend church at all, though there are some notable exceptions to this general rule—men who are loyal and faithful to the cause.

There are five church buildings in the town, but only one congregation that has much strength or life. This is the Baptist, which has preaching twice a month and most of the time a resident preacher.

There is a Methodist church also, which, while it is not abandoned, has only a handful of members and is kept up by heroic effort against heavy odds.

There used to be a Presbyterian congregation and the meeting house is there yet, but it has been many months since a service was held in it. This building, I am told, has been or will be purchased for a library. There is a Universalist church there—a large frame edifice, but with only two regular members; though I should suppose universalism to be the popular doctrine with the majority of Burlington's men. Services are occasionally held in this church, the preachers being imported from Ohio or Indiana. I was about to forget the Colored Baptist church, which, in a sense, is perhaps the livest of all.

The Disciples used to have a flourishing congregation in Burlington years ago, and a commodious brick meeting house. But the congregation disbanded, the building was torn down and today Mr. George Hughes' law office occupies the site. I am glad to report that there seem to be better things in store for this sleepy, self-satisfied, but not uninteresting little town. There has gone recently to the place Edgar C. Riley, a bright young man of a fine old family, whom I ordained to the ministry before I went to Franklin Circle, Cleveland. Brother Riley graduated from Kentucky University, preached much in Northern Kentucky, and was assistant to Frank M. Dowling at Pasadena, Cal., having entire charge of the church when the latter was abroad. Bro. Riley preaches at Walton, Beaver, and Bullettsville and, as was noted above, resides at Burlington. He is also principal of the new graded school at Burlington, and recently was successful in his candidacy for County Superintendent of Public Instruction. His wife is a Boone county girl, a member of the Terrill family, one well-known and much respected throughout Northern Kentucky. Bro. Riley is a bright and popular young minister with a wide acquaintance in the county. He has had opportunities to take more remunerative fields, but has refused them in order to raise the standard of religious and educational interests in his native county. He will make a large and much-needed contribution to the town where ninety years ago Thomas Campbell sought to establish an academy and abandoned the project because of the prejudice of the time and the place.

Butler's First Graduates

A Story of the Strenuous Days When Politics and Theology Did Not Mix

By Jasper T. Moses

Butler College is peculiar among most of the smaller colleges in that it was able to graduate a class at the end of its first year of existence. Northwestern Christian University, as it was then called, opened in the fall of 1855. In the following summer, Philip Burns and John Kimmons received the A. B. degreee and Mrs. Nancy E. Burns was made a Bachelor of Science. The history of the class, especially before it entered old Northwestern, was known all over the country, and thereby hangs the tale that we are telling.

Bona Thompson Memorial Library, Butler College, Indianapolis, Ind.

In the summer of 1855 there were ten northern students in the junior class of Bethany College. Among these were the three first graduates of Northwestern and H. W. Everest, a distinguished scholar and preacher, who was in after years president of Butler College. At this time, Bethany did not admit women, but Mrs. Burns was there with her husband taking private instruction.

It was customary for one of the Bethany theological students to occupy the pulpit of the village church on Sunday evenings. Mr. Burns, in his turn, preached on the text, "Stand fast therefore in the liberty wherewith Christ has made us free." His audience was composed largely of the college students and faculty. The sermon dealt strictly with religious liberty. The young preacher had not even thought of the current slavery issue in connection with his discourse. In illustrating the value that men set on freedom, he spoke of the liberation of the Russian serfs and mentioned England's recent payment to free the slaves in the West Indies.

Immediately the preacher was interrupted by cat-calls and jeers. About half the students left the church in a disorderly mob, and others of the members arose and filed out. Mr. Burns was plucky and continued with his sermon. Showers of pebbles rattled against the windows. One student, who later became a well known minister, crawled under the building and hammered on the floor with a heavy rail.

The southerners gathered outside and decided to take the preacher and his northern friends down to the Buffalo for a ducking. As most of the men from Dixie bore weapons and were used to carrying matters with a high hand, matters looked dark for the fellows inside the church. The problem of how to dispose of Mrs. Burns was settled by appointing a committee of two to escort her to her lodgings. The boys waited for her in the dark, narrow, entry hall on the women's side of the old-fashioned church. They did not know Mrs. Burns, but were to recognize her by the white crepe shawl she was wearing.

Mr. and Mrs. Burns boarded with a southern family whose sense of hospitality outweighed their political prejudice. A son of the household volunteered to serve on the escort committee. He entered the church, whispered to Mrs. Burns to give him her shawl, hid it under his coat, and whisked her out through the crowd without their recognizing her.

Meanwhile the northern boys inside formed a flying wedge and dashed out the other door while their tormentors were still looking for the young woman. The ten gathered in Mr. Burns' room to await developments. They did not have to wait long. The excited and baffled southerners were preparing to take the place by storm when they were greeted at the front door by the man of the house and his two stalwart sons armed with shot guns. The chivalry of the South beat a hasty retreat before this very logical argument. The boys then assembled across the street vowing instant vengeance on any northener who dared venture forth. A little after midnight Mr. Burns' host becoming tired of the noise, ordered the crowd from the vicinity at the point of his gun.

Next morning the ten northern students were refused admission to their classes. They were notified that a complete and immediate apology was the only thing that could save them from instant expulsion. Not being able to imagine what they had to apologize for, they stated their case to the faculty. The southerners, hearing of this, let the faculty know in no uncertain terms that there would be all kinds of trouble if any concessions were made to the "Abolitionists."

The ten remained true to their convictions. In the face of public sentiment and of state law in Virginia, the college authorities dared do nothing for them. Their expulsion by the college was solely in the interest of peace, and was in line with the sentiments of most of Bethany's supporters. Horace Greely took the matter up, and wrote a stirring editorial in the Tribune, commending the stand of what he called "The Im mortal Ten," and denouncing in his most scathing terms the action of the college.

The grave students were welcomed by Ovid Butler and the authorities of the Indianapolis school, though Bethany threatened to sever all fraternal and spiritual relations with the new institution. The students were even denied their church letters. Next to Oberlin, Northwestern Christian University was the first western college to receive men and women on equal terms. The co-educational feature was Ovid Butler's especial pride, and he was highly gratified to have a woman in the first graduating class.

Mr. Burns died a year after his graduation, and Mrs. Burns, after teaching for a time in the college, married the late A. M. Atkinson. Mrs. Atkinson now lives in Indianapolis, and is the sole survivor of Butler's first graduating class.

"These are the things I prize
And hold of dearest worth:
Light of the sapphire skies,
Peace of the silent hills,
Shelter of forests, comfort of the grass,
Music of birds, murmur of little rills,
Shadows of clouds that swiftly pass,
And after showers
The smell of flowers
And of the good brown earth;
And, best of all, along the way,
Friendship and mirth."

—Henry Van Dyke.

Centennial Studies

By Dr. Errett Gates

The Call of the Twentieth Century to the Disciples.

In the letter of J. S. Hughes to the editor of this department he makes the following inquiries:

"Now my point of inquiry is, where and when did an ecclesiastical establishment like ours ever move itself out of the column of the ecclesiastical into that of the ethical?"

"I wish you to help me to enjoy the hope that we Disciples can be moved out of the groove of 'Churchianity, into the free, open highway of the kingdom of God and his righteousness."

Our Supreme Task.

Bro. Hughes has laid his finger upon the supreme task of the Disciples as they enter upon the second century of their history. The problem which this new age has set for them is not how they shall make more converts, build more churches, or endow more colleges, but what kind of a Christianity they shall propagate. They have to make their choice between the Christianity of a correct doctrine, or a correct ceremonial, and the Christianity of a correct life. Converts better not be made, churches better not be built, colleges better not be endowed, if they are to be used to fasten upon the world another ecclesiasticism of doctrine and ceremony.

What Shall be Our Peculiarity?

The one anxious concern of the Disciples should be, what kind of an impression they are to make upon the world as the supreme business of their existence. Where are they going to lay the emphasis in the next century? In what will they strive to excel all other religious bodies, both past and present? In what shall their peculiarity consist? They shall have to confess that in the last century they wasted much precious time and energy debating the baptismal question, the missionary and organ question. Perhaps it had to be done. These questions probably had to be gotten out of the way, when they lay like great fallen trees in the path of progress. And just because the Disciples gave so much attention in their preaching and printing to these questions the world got the impression that they were set for the propagation and defense of baptism. Many a convert got the same impression, and because he soon mastered the biblical argument for immersion, and could recite it with fervor, he felt called to preach the gospel. The first sermon of many a preacher among the Disciples was a sermon on baptism, with liberal denunciation of the sects. That was the strange gospel of Fatherly mercy and brotherly love wrested from the New Testament.

The Ground of Hope.

There are few churches among the Disciples at the present time that would tolerate a ministry with such a gospel. Let me repeat again the firm ground for my hope in the Disciples—they have changed in the last hundred years; therefore, they will change to meet new needs and conditions in the future. The last hundred years have witnessed a steady progress of the Disciples in the direction of a spiritual and truly ethical gospel. The principle of primitive Christianity has undergone progressive definition in the light of our growing knowledge of the mind of Christ. We are coming to see that primitive Christianity was not so much a way of conducting public worship, or organizing the local church, as of living the daily life; and that if we really wanted to see it in operation in the first century, we must go, not to the public assemblies of the first Christians, but to their homes and places of business.

The Christianity of the First Century.

This is where Christianity took effect among the Pentecostal Christians in Jerusalem in the year 30 A. D. We read that "all that believed were together, and had all things common; and they sold their possessions and goods, and parted them to all, according as any man had need. "And day by day, continuing steadfastly with one accord in the temple, and breaking bread at home, they took their food with gladness and singleness of heart, praising God and having favor with all the people."

This is primitive Christianity in epitome; it was a spirit which entered into all life, and not a form of doing anything. If we were to restore this Pentecostal Christianity we could do so under any form of political government or church organization that permitted the free play of brotherly love and equality.

This is how the Moravian Brethren understood the task of Christianity so long ago as the fifteenth century, when they banded together under the following covenant: "We are, above all, agreed to continue, through grace, sound in the faith of our Lord Jesus Christ; to be established in the righteousness which is of God, to maintain the bond of love among each other, and to have our hope in the living God. We will show this both in word and deed, assist each other in the spirit of love, live honestly, study to be humble, quiet, meek, sober, and patient, and thus to testify to others that we have in truth a sound faith, genuine love, and a sure and certain hope."

This interpretation of the Christianity of Christ is coming to be the consensus of Christendom. In this alone lies the usefulness of the church in the future, and the hope of Christian union.

The New Religion

By J. S. Hughes

Nothing can stop the re-examination of "our plea" or, as it is sometimes called, "our distinctive plea," and no time is better for doing so than now in this year of our jubilee and convention at Pittsburg. Some one has quite newly interpreted the slogan that we speak where the Bible speaks and are silent where the Bible is silent by reversing it, saying "Where the Bible speaks we are silent, and where the Bible is silent we speak." We might celebrate one as well as the other, for both are playing a shibboleth upon the people. For behind both there is the presupposition of an absolute and finished authority which is mere speculation. For there is this fact that where the Bible speaks loudest and last we enjoin a hush. We say that Christ's own self-revelation is dumb, that it is not an oracle but a riddle, and it has no place in fact in our system. And yet I tell our people upon the eve of our Centennial that the revelation of Jesus Christ which God gave to him to show his servants "was the first Christian scripture, that it alone was the written New Testimony of the Christian church for a long time—till the miscellaneous writings grew to be what we call our New Testament collection."

They are all Christian writings and credible, but were not intended by their authors to hold any such place as we have given them, i. e., as parts of a whole and final authority in writing; whereas the revelation was given and received at once as "The Revelation of Jesus Christ which God gave to him to show to his servants, and which he sent and signified to his servants, through his servant John." This was received as Christ's own self-revelation of his own religion in respect to world empire and the kingdom of God concerning which the churches are ignorant because they receive not its teaching. When we speak of the "whole Bible" we do not include it and when we say "we speak where the Bible speaks" we do know we are silent concerning the only book in our collection which expressly claims to have come from heaven.

If these statements are not correct let some one clearly point out the error, for it is the time and occasion for our people to understand.

President Eliot proposes a new religion and The Christian Century has written the best suggestion in print in proposing that we try the Christian religion. Let us do so. Let us receive it even as Christ himself revealed it. It opened upon the world in visions; Zachariah and Elizabeth and Joseph and Mary and the Shepherds and Anna and Simeon. It opened anew with visions on Pentecost and by the citation by Peter of the words of Joel that "in the last days God would pour out his Spirit upon all flesh" so that all might speak with tongues and properly, followed by the visions to Peter and to Phillip and Paul and Cornelius and Ananias. So that every fresh beginning of the early church was by a special commission given to a single person in vision and it was meant that it should close in the greatest of all revelations. That glorious revelation, accepted at its own self-appraisement and kept will yet prove the beginning of the new great religion—Christ's own—which he received from the Father.

By adding other writings to it and by evolving systems of scholastical religion out of them that operate to practically exclude it have we not "rejected the chief corner stone?"

Open the Door

Open the door, let in the air;
The winds are sweet, the flow'rs are fair;
Joy is abroad in earth today;
Open the door, it comes our way.

Open the door, let in the sun;
He hath a smile for every one;
He'll make of raindrops gold and gems;
He'll change our tears to diadems.

Open the mind today, let in Strong, noble thoughts which banish sin;
Open the heart's door wide, let in Sympathy sweet for all our kin.

—R. W. Nicoll.

Happiness is not hidden in a vast vault or a philosophy; it is in the free air under the blue sky, in the mountains, on the prairies, by the seashore; contentment is not attained by possession or position or pursuit about the globe, it comes to those who will but fold their hands and wait.—John C. Van Dyke.

The Open Mind

An Aspect of Spiritual Religion

By J. M. Lowe

Growth is impossible unless one has an open mind. To close one's eyes against new views of truth, or to allow others by prejudice or ostracism to limit one's powers of enlargement, this is the end of progress. Nor do I mean that we may flit from position to position, as a bee from flower to flower. I am making no plea for radicalism or a morbid desire for the new, but to "listen to birds and flowers, children and sages with open heart." Many people, when one speaks of an open mind are seized with a sudden conviction that such a one is enamoured of some new theology, some dangerous ideas about the scriptures. This does not follow. But an open mind is absolutely essential if religion is to be spiritual. Where form rules, spirit dies. From the bursting of the acorn, in its earth bed, until the mighty oak stands dead in the midst of summer, no two moments saw the tree exactly alike yet it remained an oak.

In fact, recognizing the continuity of a growing soul, life is maintained by constantly appropriating the new. Longfellow, when old but hale and strong, said: "that apple tree is old but it grows a little new wood each year. I try to grow a little new wood each year." This is the secret, we know it well in the case of the tree and the human body but are we aware that the human soul grows just so by appropriating the new. The suspicious attitude, the gruesome fear lest some awful idea may be abroad—clap a label upon it and there you are, "it is some kind of an ism. It is not of us." So we toss away the juicy fruit of a great thought and continue to gnaw the bark upon the dead limbs of our tree of knowledge. How absurd to allow our course to be marked out by names and isms. How narrow after all this thing of schools of thought, scientific, social or religious. If a certain name is called, we close the door, put out the light and sit down and sulk. I plead for the religion of an open mind. Let the soul doors stand steadily open, let the messengers of light in. Error will not bother you. Owls and bats are afraid of the light. "He that doeth truth cometh to the light." Here is the eternal test.

The Christian religion is a spiritual religion, it is the religion of an open mind. Jesus came a prophet of the new. Whatever his relation to the past, Jesus puts into our world something new, not only so but something that is always new to all. We cannot find out all about Him. Whatever our progress, Jesus remains essentially a mystery, yet a luminous inviting mystery. The dew kissed roses of dawn are not fresher or more fragrant than the flowers of love and truth that bloom at his feet.

"Still, still with Thee when purple morning breaketh
When the bird waketh and the shadows flee
Fairer than morning, lovlier than daylight,
Dawns the sweet consciousness, I am with Thee."

"A new teaching," "A new commandment," "A new creature," "A new birth," "All things new." One new man," "A new and living way." If we can bear witness in our lives to these things, we are enjoying the religion of the open mind. When we have found the pearl of great price, we must not hesitate to sell all we have and buy it. How can Jesus come to us in a new and glorious way, if we insist that our own mental and spiritual equipment is the last and best? If we are willing that our entire being may be revolutionized we are standing upon the threshold of the new. If we cherish our ideas as if they were finalities, we have closed the door of the Kingdom of God. This thing of following Jesus is a very real and vital thing. It is not doing certain things in a certain way, it is the moving of the entire being along the soul path where Jesus has gone. It is the progress of the entire man from realm to realm, from strength to strength. It embraces for the human soul a program which includes the whole of life.

The open mind would remove prejudice, harsh criticism and all unkindness. It would give tolerance for intolerance, love for hate. Having nothing to lose but error and nothing to gain but truth, the man of open mind cannot fail because he knows that God is good and gives His children the best.

The Closing Days of the Centennial Year

By P. H. Duncan

Increased effort and accelerated activity should characterize the churches in every department of work these closing days of our much cherished Centennial. All records must be broken, all past excellence must be excelled. To "hold our own" is not enough; this is the policy of the half-hearted.

Our Centennial aims were not placed too high. Let every Christian soldier mobilize his last piece of gospel artillery, and elevate his guns to the limit for most distant range. If never before, let every Church this year get above a "dead level." The Disciple whose enthusiasm is not kindled by the contemplation of the possible results of this resultant Centennial year, possess the apathy of the stoic; Diogonese was a hilarious, high-pressure optimist compared with such a one.

The aims sought are inspiring, and become a challenge to the heroic within us. At least this one time may our aspirations be unlimited. Emerson said, "Hitch your wagon to a star"; and so we may, if it be the Star of Bethlehem that leads the world to Christ.

An intensely urgent call for liberal giving comes to us, these closing days of the Centennial year, as it never came before. The response should ring true, meeting promptly every demand. We need not fear impoverishment. Bankruptcy does not come of giving to the Lord's cause. In all the world there is not a case on record. Financial panics come from other causes. Liberal giving in the Master's service never sent a man to the poor-house.

Iago said, "Put money in thy purse"; Judas said, "Why this waste?" But Jesus said, "Give, and it shall be given unto you." Some one has said, "Benevolence alone clips the wings of riches; and what we have, at last, is what we gave away."

I commend to you God's banking system. It is as staple as eternity, and absolutely safe. We skillfully manipulate our stocks and bonds, but in spite of our best laid plans they slip away from our nerveless grasp, never more to be regained.

Let us try to learn the full, deep meaning of partnership and stewardship as they relate to God and to ourselves. For such a study we will be richer in grace, stronger in purpose and ready to meet every demand of the church in its onward sweep to victory.

To claim to be supremely "orthodox" and apostolic, and then complacently sit down and persistently refuse to send the Bread of Life to a starving world is the most stupendous farce ever enacted in the realm of reason. Liberal giving depends more upon our willingness than upon our financial ability; there is no question as to the latter.

The present Centennial year should prove a distinctive epoch in the history of every congregation. If you want real, veritable pulsating life with amplitude of vision do something worthy of this great occasion. Something of which you may be proud all the remaining days of your life. This is a great and rare opportunity for valiant deeds and strenuous enterprise. There is time enough yet for marvelous things to be accomplished before the assembling of the mighty hosts of our brethren at Pittsburg in October. The ringing cry of a rapidly advancing army is filling the very air with its reverberations; and its clear, distinct echo is framed into words of victory. There is neither place nor time for the laggard. Let us fall in line and help to make this Centennial of our great Restoration Movement a distinguished epoch in the history of our people.

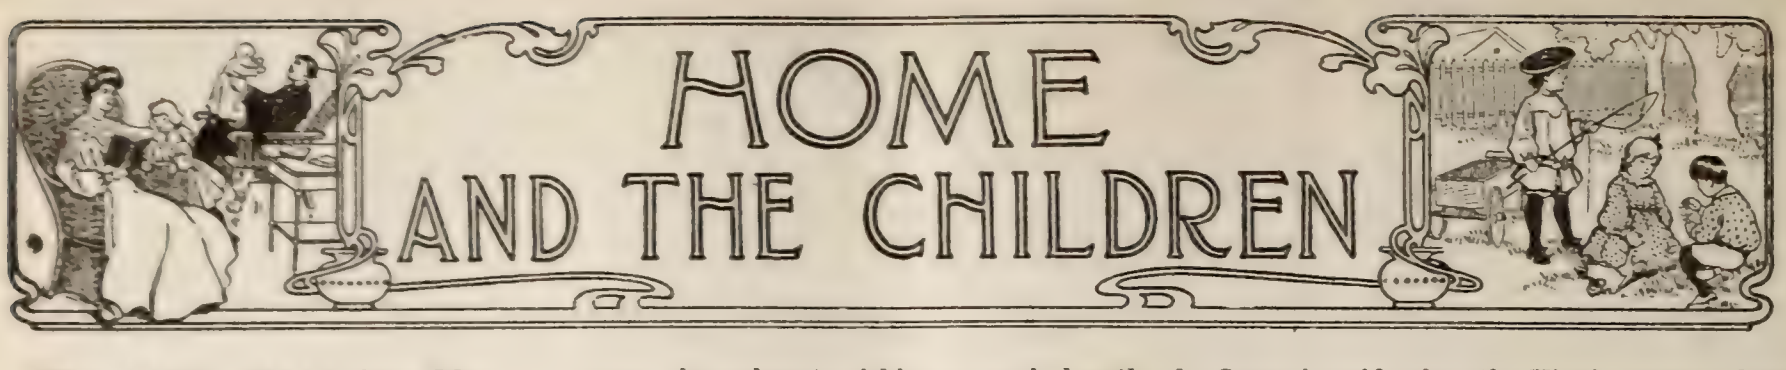
Lines Written on the Death of a Christian Mother

By Hugh T. Morrison.

O, Mother dear, how dark seems life,
Since thy sweet smile no more we see!
How can we meet life's bitter strife,
Without thy hand our guide to be?

Thy hand has been our guide and stay,
In childhood and in later years;
Thy loving smile made bright our way,
Thy cheering words dried all our tears.

We'll miss thy council and thy love;
No one our mother's place can fill,
But He who dwells in heaven above,
Will guide us up life's rugged hill.



We would not wish thee back again,
Where earthly cares have pressed thy soul
Sweet be thy rest from toil and pain,
Where sorrow's waves have ceased to roll.

Thy brave, pure life is all we ask,
We prize it more than fame or gold;
'Twill cheer us here in life's great task,
And make us brave the truth to hold.

We'll cherish as a gift divine,
That life of self-forgetting love;
Our hearts till death shall round it twine,
And then we'll meet in bliss above.

The heavenly home is nearer now,
And richer by thy presence there;
To God's decree we'll humbly bow,
And hope thy glory soon to share.

Then, fare thee well, dear precious guide,
Completed is thy work of love;
In thy strong faith we'll still abide,
Until we share thy home above.

The Little Maid for Me

I know a little maiden
Whom I always see arrayed in
Silks and ribbons, but she is a spoiled and petted little elf:
For she never helps her mother,
Or sister, or her brother:
But, forgetting all around her, lives entirely for herself.

So she simpers and she sighs,
And she mopes, and she cries,
And knows not where the happy hours do flee.
Now let me tell you privately, my darling little friends,
She's as miserable as miserable can be,
And I fear she's not the little maid for me.

But I know another little maiden,
Whom I've seen arrayed in
Silks and ribbons, but not always; she's a prudent little elf;
And she always helps her mother,
And her sister and her brother,
And lives for all around her, quite regardless of herself.

So she laughs and she sings,
And the hours on happy wings
Shower in gladness round her pathway as they flee.
Now need I tell you privately, my darling little friends,
She's as happy as a little maid can be!
This is surely the little maid for me.

"Having Fun" With Rover

One bright summer day, when Lake Michigan was almost as smooth as a millpond, two boys were taking a row in a small boat near Jackson Park, Chicago. Their faithful house dog, old "Rover," ran along the shore, barking at them and begging, in the best language at his command, to be taken on board.

"Let's have some fun with him," said one of the boys. We'll row close to the bank and call out to him, and give him a good swim."

They backed the boat to a distance of fifteen or twenty feet from the shore and called to the dog:

"Come, Rover! Get aboard!"

Rover dashed into the water. When he was within a few feet of them, they began rowing away from him, but encouraged him to come on. Keeping just ahead of him, they lured him out into the lake a distance of a hundred yards or more. Then the old dog, feeling his strength failing, and apparently convinced that his young masters were making game of him, turned to make feebly for shore.

Then, for the first time, the boys realized what they were doing. As quickly as possible they turned the boat round and rowed after the dog, whose strokes were growing feebler every moment.

"Here, Rover!" they called out. "Good old doggy! Come back! We'll help you in!"

Old Rover tried to obey, but even as he made the effort the last remnant of his strength failed him, and he sank before their eyes when almost within an arm's length of the boat.

The appealing, yet loving look in the old dog's eyes as the water closed over his head will haunt those boys to their dying day.—Our Dumb Animals.

The Old Gnome's Gold

BY FRANCES MARGARET FOX.

The King of Forgotten Land was greatly troubled. It was five winters since the Gnome of Golden Mountain died and left his pile of treasure. So many, many years had the sound of the old Gnome's pickaxe been heard "bang, bang, bang" in the depths of the mountain, he was missed throughout the kingdom when his silence fell in the cave of gold and jewels.

"The Gnome is gone!" repeated men, women and children who scarce believed their words. "Gone, and left his gold behind." Not one bright jewel could the old Gnome carry away after all those years of work below the sunlight.

The soldiers of the King found his pickaxe beside him when the persistent "bang, bang bang" was heard no more and all the kingdom knew the Gnome was dead. What would he do without that pickaxe in the other world? The people shook their heads and wondered. Soon, however, they forgot the unhappy old Gnome in thinking of his bags and bags of gold.

It was those bags and bags of gold that worried the King. Day and night his soldiers had guarded the entrance to the cave, while highways and byways swarmed with robbers seeking to steal the gold when it was removed to the King's treasure house.

In the beginning the King of Forgotten Land supposed the old Gnome's labors would immediately improve the condition of his subjects. He straightway built a magnificent palace, giving work to thousands of skilled men. Next he built cathedrals, lecture-halls and school houses. He laid out beautiful parks and public gardens. He built roads and planted trees beside them. Fountains appeared as if by magic in different parts of the kingdom.

Instead of being grateful to the King, the inhabitants of Forgotton Land did nothing but grumble and complain. They criticized the way he disposed of the old Gnome's gold; they could have done better. Discontent was felt throughout the kingdom. Thieves sprang up on every side to steal jewels from the new garden walls and silver bells from school houses. Sullen looks greeted the King when he drove forth in his golden chariot. Even little children forgot wild flowers on the highways to talk of the old Gnome's gold and to wish for a larger share.

At last the King bought a great tract of wilderness land from a neighboring prince. There he built a castle, perfect in every detail, surrounding it with a garden called the Garden of Peace. This garden extended to the very boundries of the old wilderness land. Birds sang in the trees and sunlight lingered lovngly upon the vast estate.

Beneath the courtyard of the castle the King tunneled a vast hall, and in that hall was stored all that remained of the old Gnome's gold, after the King's treasure house was filled to overflowing.

Then did the King of Forgotten Land announce to his subjects that to the man who best knew how to handle the great wealth should be given the castle in the Garden of Peace. Believing that many, many would be found worthy to live in the castle, the King appointed a council of wise men to manage the difficult choice.

On the morning appointed by the King for a meeting with the wise men, vast crowds approached the palace gates, every man insisting that he must have the first interview. When gates were opened, in rushed the multitude, tramping on the lawn, ruining the flowers and demanding immediate attention. Before the soldiers could interfere there was a dreadful fight outside the entrance of the Hall of Justice where the wise men sat waiting with fingers in their ears.

Days passed and not a man appeared to present his claim but proved by his very manner that he was not entitled to the management of great wealth.

"What shall we do?" demanded the King. "In days gone by we knew not that there was such selfishness in the Kingdom. What shall we do."

Three days and three nights the wise men sat in council before making answer. Then said they: "Let us search the kingdom for one unselfish man."

Days, weeks, months passed with nothing but sad reports from the King's messengers. Everywhere they found men neglecting their business while sitting by the roadside talking of what they would do if given plenty of money. Women, children and babies discussed the same subject. They would care for the sick and afflicted, buy food for the hungry and clothe the destitute.

At first the King was encouraged. He felt comforted by the good intentions of his subjects until the messengers explained that not a man could be found who did the best he could for those around, with what he had to share. They provided for their own families and talked of what they would do for the poor and needy if they had plenty of money.

One day the King was riding horseback through Forgotten County, on the outskirts of Forgotten Land, when he observed two boys tearing down a good fence in front of a cabin.

"Why do you do this?" inquired the King.

"Because," replied the older of the boys, little dreaming that he was addressing the King, "our father wishes to share the shade of our great oak tree with travelers who will not come through the gate to rest from noonday heat. If we tear the fence away they will no longer feel that the tree is not for them."

"Marvelous!" exclaimed the King. "Who, pray tell me, is your father?"

"Our father is the school master," was the wondering reply.

Slowly the King passed on. Five minutes later he met a small boy carrying a dog.

"What is the trouble with your pet, little man?" inquired the King. "Oh he's all right now," replied the boy, "because the schoolmaster washed his hurt foot and tied it up with his own handkerschief. The dog will get well, thank you."

Later, the King paused before a wee cabin to ask an old blind woman why she looked so happy. The schoolmaster had been reading her a lovely poem a few moments before; he read something to her every day on his way home from school.

By this time the King was deeply interested. Before returning to the palace at sunset, he learned that the shool master had shared his luncheon that noon with a tramp; he helped a neighbor catch a runaway horse and had shared both time and possessions with all, be they friends or strangers.

For three weeks the King's messengers watched the schoolmaster who lived on the borders of the kingdom; always finding that the schoolmaster shared his simple blessings with those who passed his way.

Thus it happened that the King ceased to worry about the old Gnome's gold. Throughout the kindom went the glad tidings that a man had been found worthy of the castle in the Garden of Peace. No longer troubled by visions of unearned wealth, the inhabitants of the kingdom went back to their work and contentment returned.

As for the schoolmaster and his family, they lived happy ever after, sharing their vast treasure with all who needed help as in days gone by they shared their small possessions.

Therefore, according to tradition, did the King of Forgotten Land live to a good old age.

The Animal School

Did you ever hear of the animal school ?

No ? Then I will tell you about it.

Miss Willow was the teacher, and the reason she was chosen was—why do you suppose ? Because she had so many switches about. If anyone didn't behave, she would reach out one of her long arms and get a switch, and then—um-m-m-M-M!

The scholars were: the donkey with his long ears, the owl, always half asleep, and the stamping horse; the wooly sheep, the billy-goat, the black cat, and the curly dog; the goose, long of neck, the turkey gobbler, the duck, and the little red hen. Then there was a row of birds on the top rail of a fence. And—O, yes—there was the frog. I almost forgot the frog. He sat in a puddle.

When it was time to begin, Miss Willow snapped all her switches. It was quiet in an instant. "Now," said she, "who is absent ?"

The owl cried out, "Whoo-oo, whoo-oo, whoo-oo !"

Miss Willow turned angrily to the horse. "Was that you who mimicked me ?" she asked.

The horse, trembling very much, answered quickly, "Neigh, neigh !"

"Attention !" said Miss Willow. "What does B-A spell ?"

The wooly sheep answered, "Baa!"

But just then the billy-goat stepped on the little red hen's toe. A bird on the fence behind saw it and cried out, "Whip-poor-Will !" And Miss Willow wept at the billy-goat's badness.

"We will now have our lesson in manners," said Miss Willow. "What does a man do when he meets a lady ?"

The curly dog cried, "Bow!" and was patted for giving the right answer.

"And how should we eat at the table ?"

The turkey answered, "Gobble, gobble, gobble !" Miss Willow reached for a switch. And the prim goose said in a shocked voice, "Hs-s, hs-s."

"Do we eat with our knives ?" asked Miss Willow.

"Neigh," said the horse; and the little red hen put in, "Cut, cut, cut !"

"Who is that new scholar on the fence ?" Miss Willow then asked.

A brown bird answered, "Bob White !"

"And who came in late ?"

The black cat cried, "Me-ow !"

But the donkey wouldn't answer any of the questions, and had to be put on the dunce stool, with a dunce cap over his long ears. And the duck always read through her nose, like this, "Quack, Quack!" And one little greenish bird had to have a handkerchief tied over his bill because he would interrupt by shouting, "Teacher--teacher—TEACHER !"

"And what shall we do next ?" Miss Willow asked at last.

All this time the frog had sat in his puddle and said nothing. Now he put his head out, and muttered in a deep voice, "Better-go-home, better-go-home, better-go-home !"

So the wind whistled a march, and away home they went.—Francis Weld Danielson, in Little Folks.

These Summer Days

By F. Treudly.

Into the heart of earth the summer rays and
August heats strike deep,
Quickening into pulses strong all ofrms of common life,
Ripening the grains and fruits and sending far away
Upon the wings of heaven perfumes of sweetest odor,
As proofs of loving power faithfully at work,
And signs of good soon coming to perfection.

At rest upon earth's bosom I look upon this scene
And marvel at the energies incessantly at work
Not vainly, but guided by unswerving wisdom,
And I ask; Whether is greater, power or wisdom,
Or are they both expressions of supernal love
Whose deep intensity charges and directs these forces,
Wasting nothing but coming to the end by path direct?

For whom is all this energy of life? For men
So inconsequential as I seem to be,
Lying so helpless here? And if so, why?
Since I seem so incapable of service
Beyond the simple bounds of knowing duty
Whose doing is beyond my strength
And whose full doing I can ne'er attain.
My doubts spring up from error. I am not weak
Nor inconsequential, for that within me in whose behalf
The power of God is ever working, is Himself, His very image,
To call which forth into its perfect form
He hath made the supreme purpose of His life.

For this is life, to love, and that only can be loved
Which, in itself, is lovable; the tender spirit,
The soul conscious of its limitations but ever seeking light,
The eye mild and luminous as it gazes upon beauty,
The heart quickening into pulses strong through service done,
The cheek tinged with that glowing color which is the rich expression
Of joy eternal when mind and heart are one.

Therefore, all this warmth and glow of summer days,
These golden flowers coming to full bloom,
These fruits surcharged with beauty and so luscious to the taste,
These harvests bending to the earth through fullness,
The insect life upon the wing, all life of man and bird and beast,
Feeding beneath the shadow or in sunshine in quiet rest
Upon food ambrosial, or drinking nectar
sweet out of chalices
Golden or silver or set in green,
Or hanging upon leaf or blade of grass, or bursting forth
From fountains pure, flashing like diamonds and Fed by summer showers falling alike in light or darkness
Upon all lands whether belonging to the evil or the good, the just or unjust:
All that I see and hear and feel and taste and smell
Is God's own presence calling unto me,
And ever calling, out of the skies and from the earth,
And through the voice of running streams and carolling birds
And hum of insect world and splendor of most gracious forms,
To rise and pass from out this vestibule of time and space
Into that real world of which this world is but a shadow.

Unanswered Prayers

ELLA WHEELER WILCOX

Like some schoolmaster, kind in being stern
Who hears the children crying o'er their slates
And calling, "Help me, master!" yet helps not,
Since in his silence and refusal lies
Their self-development, so God abides,
Unheeding many prayers. He is not deaf
To any cry sent up from earnest hearts;
He hears and strengthens when he must deny
He sees us weeping over life's hard sums,
But should he give the key and dry our tears,
What would it profit us when school were done
And not one lesson mastered?
Should our desires
Voiced one by one in prayer, ascend to God,
And come back as events shaped to our wish,
What chaos would result!
In my fierce youth I sighed out breath enough to move a fleet,
Voicing wild prayers to heaven for fancied
boons,
Which were denied; and that denial bends
My knee to prayers of gratitude each day
Of my maturer years. Yet from those prayers
I rose always regirded for the strife
And conscious of new strength. Pray on, sad heart,
That which thou pleadest for may not be given,
But in the lofty altitude where souls
Who supplicate God's grace are lifted, there
Thou shalt find help to bear thy daily lot
Which is not elsewhere found.

Indian Wisdom

Daily perform thy own appointed work
Unweariedly; and to obtain a friend—
A sure companion to the future world—
Collect a store of virtue like the ants
Who garner up their treasures into heaps;
For neither father, mother, wife, nor son,
No kinsman will remain beside thee then,
When thou art passing to that other home—
Thy virtue will thy only comrade be.

CHAPTER XI.

On Their Travels.

It was July. A dry sunny July, with a cloudless blue sky. The boys belonging to the small market town of Horton were all agog with expectation as a small procession slowly wended its way through its usually quiet main street.

First there came an old man with a patriarchal appearance. A long white beard swept his chest and wavy white hair hung on his shoulders; a violin case was slung across his back, and from his lips a trumpet announced his entry in notes as full as they were musical. A curly, towny-haired poodle followed close on his heels, bearing on his back a tiny monkey, dressed as an admiral, the monkey squinting from side to side as he bowed first one way and then the other with a comical grin of intelligence. The poodle wore a helmet tied under his chin with ribbons of bright colors.

Behind them came a small carriage drawn by a handsome goat; ribbons decked his head, and his harness shone like silver in the sunshine. A little girl sat enthroned in the carriage, her delicate face lit up with a smile of pleasure as she watched the interested looks of the bystanders.

Flanking the carriage like two outriders trotted two dogs with toy drums suspended round their necks, and on each head was perched a tiny cap with floating ribbons.

Straight to the village inn the procession wended its way, headed by the old man. Before the "Pig and Whistle" lay the village green, showing how a game of cricket had been in full play until interrupted by the entry of this troupe. The buxom landlady with her rose-cheeked daughter stood at the entrance door, watching the procession with amused yet interested faces.

Before them the old man paused, bowing low and showing a set of such dazzlingly white teeth that it put to shame the silvery whiteness of his beard.

"Can madame put us up for a couple of nights?" he asked softly.

Yes, madame thought she could, and then looked doubtfully at the dogs. "I suppose they can go into the stables?" she said.

Pierre Gascon shook his head. "My dogs are not like other animals. Where I rest, they rest also. Does madame object to such intruders?"

Madame looked as if she did; but her rosy-cheeked daughter overcame her opposition.

"Oh! let them in, ma. I'm sure they'll behave nicely."

Pierre raised his hat with another low bow. "Mademoiselle has guessed rightly. Madame will not be sorry for having admitted them; for the goat alone I would crave shelter in the stable."

With a slight snort the buxom landlady was heard to say, "I should think so indeed. It's the first time in my life that I have opened my doors to a menagerie."

"Not a menagerie, Madame, but a troupe of dancing dogs, a performing goat, and a trick monkey."

"And a fairy queen," added the rosy-cheeked daughter with an admiring glance at the little figure seated in the carriage, caressing now the heads of all the dogs in turn as they gathered round her.

But at her words a shade passed over Pierre Gascon's face, and he made no immediate response. Hastening back to the little carriage he helped Camilla to get out, displacing first the monkey from her lap, who leaped to his shoulder with a wild jabber of unintelligent jargon.

Into the inn parlor Pierre followed the landlady, the whole troupe in his wake with the exception of the goat, who stood pawing the ground and shaking his head fiercely from side to side when too closely pressed by an admiring crowd.

"Tea, please," said Pierre. "My grandchild is greatly in want of it."

"Oh! your grandchild, is she?" said the landlady, looking curiously at the dainty little form before her. "She—she don't look much like it."

"And something nice and savory, if you have it," continued the master of the troupe, as if she had not spoken. "What is it that you have?"

"Fried ham and eggs—real fresh eggs and home-cured ham."

"Bring a dish of it as soon as you can," was the reply.

Then she disappeared, closing the door after her, he said softly—

"Tired, mon enfant?"

Camilla looked up with a bright smile. "It is not I who should be tired, but you, Pierre, and these dear dogs," dropping her tiny hand in turn on their heads. "You have walked so far today; how far, Pierre?"

"A matter of twelve miles, cherie. But remember," lowering his voice to meet her ear alone, "to call me 'grandfather' always whilst we are here. It is not safe to call me by any other name."

Then as Camilla gave a sage little nod of her head, Pierre continued—

Reveal nothing, cherie, to the landlady or her daughter. I mistake me if the lady of this house is not as inquisitive as her daughter is kind."

"Nothing of the ship—and of—Daddy," said Camilla with a droop in her voice.

"Nothing, cherie; it would ruin all." He laid his hand softly on the brown hair, and lifting the tiny hand to his lips pressed it tenderly. "Now I shall go and see where Chicot is to be housed, and get him safely in and something to eat before tea is ready. Rest you in the big chair, cherie, till I return."

Five minutes after, the landlady's face appeared. She had seen Pierre unharnessing the goat, but from her pretended start of surprise at seeing only Camilla and the dogs in the room and Taras sitting close by the fire, no one would have guessed this.

"Alone, little one? Ah! your grandfather has made you comfortable. On which side, dear, is he related? Your mother's or your father's?"

"I don't know what you mean," was Camilla's very truthful answer.

"Ah, of course. You are but young to know the relationship. And where are you going, dear?"

"To see my grandparents."

"You astonish me! More grandparents! Ah! it must be on the other side: but this grandfather is very old."

It was on the tip of Camilla's tongue to assure her that Pierre was anything but old, but she wisely refrained from doing so and patted Jacques' head as it poked itself up from beside her chair.

The landlady busied herself in setting the round table, racking her brains the meanwhile for a few further questions.

"Where did you come from last, dear?"

"I don't know the name of the place. Pi—my grandfather knows it; ask him."

The Frenchman's appearing at that moment disposed of further curiosity on the landlady's part, and soon the much-needed meal was in progress.

The daintiest slice off the loaf, the nicest-looking egg, the best slice of ham was chosen by Pierre to set before Camilla. The dogs all sat round, waiting till the meal was over to receive their own. Then one loaf, broken into equal shares, was divided by Pierre and given to each dog. Taras fared better, for he received bread soaked in milk, after which he retired to a corner to cogitate.

"Tomorrow, cherie, we will give a performance. The village is larger than I thought it, and we may be able to stay here a week, making this our headquarters."

Camilla clapped her hands, at which Pierre bent on her a tender glance.

"Tired of so much travelling, mon enfant?"

"No, oh no, Pi—grandfather! Indeed, I enjoy it, and you are so kind to me."

"Nevertheless, a few days' rest will do you good, mon enfant. For your sake I am glad we have found our way here."

"And when you go out for the performance, mayn't I come too? Say yes—do say yes. It isn't fair that I should not help when you and the dogs, and even Taras and Chicot, go out to get money."

"You dress the dogs, cherie, for their performances. And who but you would have thought of decking Chicot out in such fine ribbons?"

"But that is nothing; you could do all that by yourself. It is to help in the performance that I want. You have taught me to play a little on the violin, and I do it well, don't I?"

"Admirably, cherie."

"Then why shouldnt I play for Jules and Bebe to dance to?"

"Never, cherie, never in public."

"Then let me dance the pretty dance you've taught me; or sing 'Auld Lang Syne' whilst you play the tune."

Pierre looked across the table at her with affection shining in his honest brown eyes.

"May I never meet Monsieur your father, cherie, in the Land Above if I expose his daughter to the gaze of a crowd of gamins."

"But—but they all see me when we first come to a new place."

"That, mon enfant," said Pierre, with a despondent shrug of his shoulders, "is what I cannot well do without. It is necessary to make some sort of public entry to attract attention, or else we might fare badly when the performance takes place. It goes against the grain, cherie, to exhibit you then, as I am forced to do, but to employ you in any way whatever when we perform is what I shall never do."

Camilla held over the table an imploring hand, which Pierre willingly took, but the determined expression on his face did not change, and Camilla sighed as she found that her greatest blandishment, which hitherto had never failed to touch her French friend's heart, aroused in him no sign of relenting.

"You assist me in the evenings by teaching the dogs and playing to them whilst they dance, but further than that you must not go. Comprenez-vous, cherie?"

Camilla nodded her head dolefully. At the same moment Pierre sprang up, and with a quick soft tread crossed the room, opening the door with a suddenness that surprised the landlady on the other side, who had been cooling her eye and her ear at the keyhole. She fell back with a startled face that somewhat paled as she caught sight of the Frenchman's expression, and then scurried away as fast as her stoutness would permit her.

Pierre's face was grave as he came back and re-seated himself. Camilla saw nothing amiss, as she was busily engaged in combing Jacques' refractory curls.

"He was a dear doggie he was, the cleverest, prettiest dog in the world," she murmured; then threw out her hand to Bebe and Jules, who were looking sulkily on. "And you, my pretties, are such dear little dogs that I can't help loving you too."

At this the jealous Taras sprang with a bound from his corner right on to her shoulder, and holding Camilla's brown head with one hand, worked away with the other until he had flung the wig aside showing the child's beautiful golden hair beneath.

"Oh! grandfather, look!" she cried with a laugh of childish delight.

But Taras was not to escape scot free. Pierre's hand caught him a resounding smack which sent him chattering and nursing his cheek to the further end of the room.

"We must stop such tricks as those, mon enfant. Has the rascal ever done such a thing before?"

"Yes, the other day, but you were not by."

"Then this must be the last time that he ever does it. For, look you here, cherie"—lowering his voice to a whisper—"if he takes it into his head to do such a thing when we are entering the next town, or when strangers are present, the—the fat will be in the fire. Taras, you rascal, come here."

Still nursing his cheek and looking sulkily aggrieved, the monkey advanced from his corner.

"Wherefore didst thou do such a trick as that? Knowest thou not that punishment always awaits such naughtiness? See to it, mon garcon, that it is never done again."

And with a few stinging slaps Taras was released, and told to stand in the corner for the rest of the evening.

The others, meanwhile, sat ready, waiting for the rehearsal which always followed on an entry into a fresh place.

"Thou, Jacques, take thy place with Bebe and chasse to and fro till I play—so"—sounding a deep chord on his violin—"when thou must both meet and bow and dance together. Jules, thou must dance by thyself, since Taras has misconducted himself."

A wailing sob from the monkey elicited no attention from his master, who felt seriously put about, first by the landlady's uncalled-for inquisitiveness, and next by Taras' unpardonable behaviour.

Camilla sat stringing coloured beads together which had been destined to adorn Chicot's neck, but which she now thought must be kept for Taras's little brown throat, to make up in some sort of way for the punishment he was getting this evening. She was constantly devising means for softening Pierre's somewhat rigorous treatment when the animals were at fault, and no one knew better than Pierre for whom those coloured beads were now intended.

Taras eyed them jealously. He loved colour and gaudy finery, and nothing pleased him better than to strut about in his admiral's uniform. He bit his little fingers and shut his eyes tight to prevent himself from making a spring upon those coveted beads, which he knew would call down upon his head a still more severe censure.

Meanwhile the strains from the violin went on, and Jacques and Bebe chassed backwards and forwards. Then the deep chord sounded, and they would clasp each other round the waist with their front paws and revolve slowly round and round.

"Jules, thou art not keeping time," his master's voice would break in sharply.

And then the others would stand aside while Jules danced alone to the music. Nothing escaped Pierre's eyes: he saw mistakes which no one else would have detected. The animals were thoroughly well trained, and were at the same time devoted to their master. Jacques loved him with a devotion that was rare even in so faithful a dog, and all Camilla's little wiles never lured him from his best friend.

"I rescued him, a tiny puppy, from the hands of some villain gamins who were driving the creature almost senseless with their persecutions," Pierre had told Camilla one day. "And since then he has been my faithful companion."

Camilla loved these rehearsals. Although she was never allowed to appear in the performances, Pierre had taken great pains to interest her in them, and to make her form one of them in the quiet evening hours when no public eye was on them. He had taught her to dance and to sing some simple airs as prettily and unaffectedly as only Camilla could sing them, and her slight performance on the violin was his delight.

"Now, cherie, for your song and dance," he would say when the animals had gone through their several parts.

And then Camilla would do her share, with Pierre standing by as sole audience to criticise and to applaud.

Ah! those were happy hours for Pierre and his little English charge.

CHAPTER XII.

Pierre Becomes Alarmed.

The next morning dawned fine and bright. Pierre was astir early; he not only wished to have a successful performance, but also to make those inquiries concerning Camilla's grandparents which were always uppermost in his mind whenever he entered a new place.

Not to his curious landlady, however, would he put such a question. He had serious thoughts this morning of changing his temporary quarters. Her inquisitive attitude of last night had disturbed him; what might she not say or do if questioned in her turn by those interested in the Frenchman's movements?

Their breakfast over, Pierre set to work in preparation for the performance. The meals were simple to a degree where the Frenchman was himself concerned, but with regard to Camilla it was different, her protector being of the same mind that his charge should have of the best that his purse of gold would permit. A comfortable bed at night was what he always sought for her, even when his own accommodation was of the poorest. Camilla might protest in childish words at their not always faring alike, but Pierre would wave such words aside and keep firm to his first resolution.

That English father's face was never far distant from his mind; and his promise, given when death was very near, was still fresh in his memory.

"And now to work, mes enfants," he said briskly. "Thou, cherie, what wilt thou do when we are gone?"

"Where will you perform?" asked Camilla.

"As near this house as possible; perhaps on the village green, so that you may watch us while we work."

Camilla clapped her hands gaily. "Can I sit with the window open?" she asked breathlessly.

But Pierre shook his head. "I would rather that thou didst not, mon enfant; it would attract too much attention. And"—seeing the face of his little charge fall—"it might draw attention from us, which is not what thou wouldst like, eh, petite?"

No, Camilla would not like that. She loved to receive the tin mug from Taras' hand on their return home and count up their gains with Pierre's assistance. If her presence at the open window were in some unaccountable way to detract from the performance, she would not let herself be seen, but only just peep at them. And with this assurance Pierre seemed well content.

"And thou wilt not answer the landlady's questions, cherie?" he asked anxiously.

"No, I do not like her," returned Camilla.

"Nor I. And thou wilt keep thy wig on, cherie, and never take it off once, n'est-ce pas?"

Camilla assented, and patted her brown wig with such evident satisfaction that Pierre laughed.

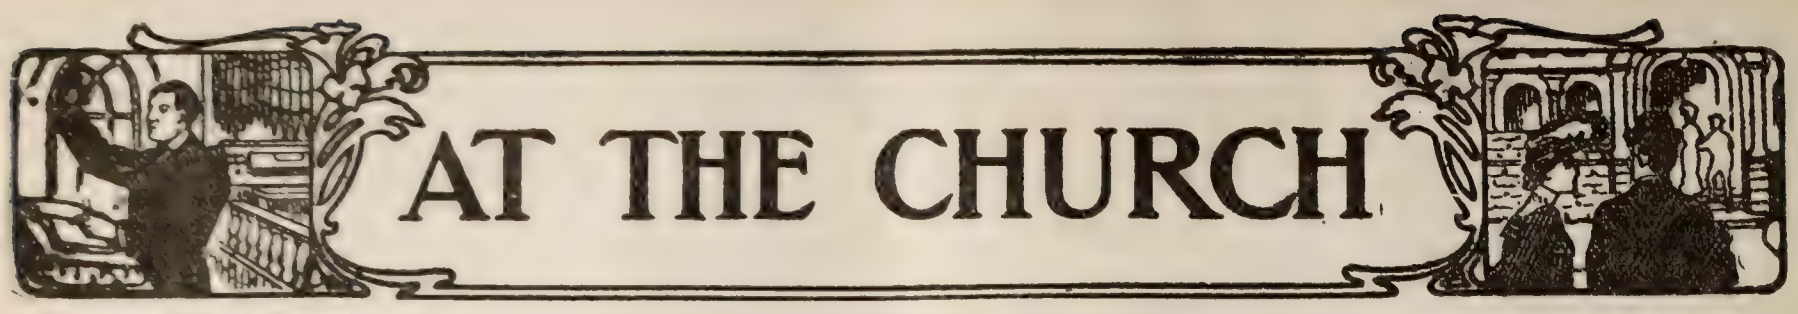
It always distressed him to leave her behind during these unavoidable absences, and his return home was full of anxious foreboding, until he had her safe again within his sight.

It was not always that Camilla could have the treat of seeing them perform under her very eyes. She watched with eagerness the procession start off down the road.

Pierre headed the animals in his leathern coat and slouch hat, and his violin-case across his back, blowing the trumpet to attract attention. Taras was mounted on his shoulder, resplendent in his admiral's uniform, and with the rather incongruous string of beads hung round his neck. Chicot came next, pawing the ground majestically, and tossing his head with pride in his new ribbons. Bebe and Jules followed close behind; and Jacques brought up the rear.

He always followed last. It was a self-imposed task, and one that Pierre agreed with most readily, knowing full well that the other members of his troupe comported themselves with dignity when the poodle's eyes were upon them. The slightest disorderly conduct, the least insubordination, and Jacques would pounce upon the offender and administer a well-deserved shaking.

Camilla, from her corner by the window, well screened by a muslin curtain, watched them all return after their promenade round the village and take up their stand on the green right in front of her view.



Pierre tuned up his violin and played a few ravishing airs, with his animals all about him. Then a brisk waltz tune started Jacques and Bebe dancing, and Jules and Taras followed in their wake. Chicot revolved slowly and majestically by himself on his two hind legs. Taras was accustomed to provoke laughter on his own account by suddenly leaving Jules' side and springing on to the neck of the goat, where, with hands clasped tight round his neck, he would sway his body this way and that, keeping time to the goat's movements. Then, putting his face down to the goat's he would kiss him with smacking sounds on either cheek and spring to the ground, well satisfied at having elicited roars of laughter from his audience.

The dancing over, Chicot told the year, the month, the day, the hour with accurate precision by placing his foot on the right pieces of cardboard laid out on the green by his master, on which in clear letters was written the correct answers.

Then Bebe and Jules held a skipping-rope at each end whilst Taras skipped gleefully, making several fantastic grimaces the while at the audience; he also danced on the tight-rope, to the intense delight of the onlookers. Then there was a sham fight between the animals, Chicot standing afar off to act as umpire.

All the while the master of the troupe played his violin, keeping, however, a watchful eye upon all around him. Suddenly a melodious voice, with something of a foreign ring in it, startled Pierre.

Sunday School Lesson

FOR SEPTEMBER 5, 1909.

Farewell to Ephesus

Introduction.

Paul's Third Missionary Journey—Continued—Farewells.—Acts 20:17-35.

Golden Text—I can do all things through Christ which strengtheneth me.—Phil. 4:13.

Between the last lesson and this Paul had made a tour in Europe, revisiting the churches which he had founded. Beginning with Macedonia he went southward to Greece, where he spent three months, probably the greater part of the time at Corinth. It was his intention to return directly to Syria, but Jewish enemies were watching for him, and he went by way of Philippi and then across to Troy. The companions on the journey are mentioned in verse 4. From Troy he sailed down the coast to Miletus, where he made a brief stay. He did not go to Ephesus, because of his haste to reach Jerusalem before Pentecost, whence he was bearing the alms collected from the Grecian churches. But he sent for the elders of the church of Ephesus to meet him at Miletus. His interview with the elders furnishes the matter contained in the lesson. The meeting was probably reported by Luke, as the use of the first person "us" and "we" in the chapter shows that he was again with Paul.

Outline of the Lesson.

Paul begins with a referencce to his own conduct while among them.

He reminds them of his great trials, and also of his devotion and fidelity to his work, He tells them that he is going to Jerusalem, and that he will meet with more trials. He says they will see him no more He exhorts them to care for the flock, because of "grievous wolves." He commends them to the grace of God.

He refers again to his own conduct and faithfulness.

Notes on the Lesson.

17v. From Meiltus. It was 30 or 40 miles from Ephesus. The elders of the church. Ministers or pastors.

18v. Ye know, etc. Paul makes much reference to himself in the interview, But this, no doubt, was due to the fact that he was so constantly assailed by bitter enemies, and also because he felt that example goes before exhortation.

19v. With all humility. He humbeld himself to every situation and hardship. And temptations. Trials. Lying in wait for the Jews. They were always "laying for him."

20v. Taught you publicly and from house-to house. A well-regulated ministry, effective in public, faithful in private.

21v. Testifying. The original idea of the apostolic ministry. "Ye shall be my witnesses." In this sense it was a scientific ministry, a testimonial to facts. Repentance toward God. This is what gospel preaching means, not simply a declamation against public evils, but to individual repentance. And faith, etc. Preaching which does not end in faith misses its purpose.

Of His Journey to Jerusalem.

22v. Bound in the spirit. He felt compelled by the promting of the Holy Spirit to make the journey. Not knowing, etc. All that he knew was that he must go, which shows that the Spirit simetimes commands without enlightening.

23v. Save, etc. This was part of the original call to the ministry. It was to be one of trial. See Acts 9:16.

24v. But none of these things move me. Ministers should not make too much of their trials. We hear now that young men are not entering the ministry because of low salaries, etc. But what heavenly good could such young men do in the ministry? Finish my course with joy. There were trials, but joy.

25v. Shall see my face no more. This was the saddest word of all; see verse 38.

26v. Pure from the blood of all men. Probably a reference to the prophet Ezekiel.

27v. Have not shunned. A suggestive word. There is a shunned gospel. All the counsel of God. Not part, but all.

An Exhortation.

28v. Take heed. The Bible is full of words of warning. Pastors should have the words of wariness. Pastors should have the eagle eye. Arabs who ride over the plains have an eye trained to see in the far distance. Ministers should be able to see an enemy when he crosses the horizon, and to see very close by.

Unto yourselves. The first members of the flock to be looked after, and the most difficult. It is hard to be a perfect example.

All, not pets, favorites, influential people, nice people, but all. Flock. A favorite word in this connection. It is the common view of Scripture writers that developing and training Christians is like raising sheep. The figure had more force with a pastoral people than with the millions now who seldom see a sheep.

The Holy Ghost has made you overseers That is, by sanctifying you, equipping you, and giving you the inward call to the work. It is not enough that a pastor be man-appointed; he should also be Spirit-appointed. To feed. In the original, to shepherd, which is broader, and includes feeding, protecting, caring for in every way. It is more import-and that a minister or pastor should be a shepherdly man than that he should be a "star" preacher. It is a great combination when he is both. The church of God. A much disputed text because of what follows in the next clause. The question is whether it should read, "of God," or "of the Lord." The manuscripts differ. We can no more than allude to it here. Purchased with His own blood. See Eph. 1:7; Heb. 9:12; 1 Pet. 1:19; and Rev. 5:9. That the church is a body of believers ransomed by the blood of Jesus Christ, is used here as an appeal to ministers to be careful, watchful and faithful shepherds. When they deny this doctrine and explain away the passages which teach it, and even try to set aside the apostle himself, it is not likely that their faithfulness will be increased. We better appreciate the immeasurable value of a human soul when we read such a passage as this.

A Warning.

29v. For I know this. Paul's optimism was not of a kind that made him blind to the dangers of the flock. The pessimist who sees only dangers is blind in one eye; the optimist who sees no danger is blind in the other eye. Grievous wolves. Strong wolves, dangerous wolves; "ravening wolves," Jesus called them. The term was not used of open enemies, but of men who played a false part. Not sparing the flock. Unfaithful men cannot destroy the truth, but they can destroy the flock.

Appeals to His Own Example.

30v. Also of your own selves. "The most dangerous enemies which the church has known have been nurtured in its own bosom and have consisted of those who have perverted the true doctrines of the gospel. Barnes. Speaking grienvous things. Perverting the Scripture, twisting texts, emasculating them of their meaning, and confusing the common mind. To draw away disciples. Heretical sects usually draw from the church, not from the world. It is easier to go into the fold than out into the highways, byways and hedges. Religious fads seldom feed on raw material. They prefer half baked Christians.

31v. Therefore watch. And they did watch, as we find in Rev. 2:2-6.

And remember. It is a bad sign when a minister does not like to remember Paul. It is a proof of the false position of a certain class of teachers that they discount Paul. I cease not to warn. The appalling fear of being called a pessimist had no terrors for him. Night and day with tears. That was the tireless work of a man, and the nursing love of a mother. Warning men with tears is more effective than a sarcastic sermon or a scolding prayer meeting talk. As has been remarked, there is a difference between feeding the sheep and beating the sheep.

33v. Have coveted no man's silver, etc. Paul's self-renunciation was complete.

34v. These hands have ministered unto my necessities. But he taught that the ministry should be supported.

Suggestive Points.

—It was well worth a trip to Melitus to spend an hour with Paul.

—In talking about himself Paul pointed to his humiliations and trials rather than to his successes.

—Paul enforced his appeals with his tears.

—He sought "the flock," not the fleece.

—He "kept back nothing;" some preachers keep back more than they give out.

—Ministers are in the world to preach repentance rather than reform.

—"To testify the gospel of the grace of God" is a whole volume in itself.

—We talk of "gray wolves" in city councils. Paul spoke of "grievous wolves" in the church.

—Paul had willing hands as well as a great head.

—Strength is not for ourselves alone, but for the weak.

—"Watch and remember."

Prayer Meeting

By Silas Jones

THE EARTHLY HOME OF THE SOUL.

Topic: September 1, Psa. 65:4; 84:4.

The church tramp has all the vices of all tramps. He is fundamentally wrong in his attitude toward organized religion. He would receive benefit from the church without assuming any responsibility for its purity and growth. The religious life grows by overcoming difficulties and these are created in part by the relation in which the individual stands to the church of which he is a member. The very imperfection of his associates gives him an opportunity to increase his spiritual discernment and his devotion to the right. He who would be a disciple of Christ must live with other disciples and learn to love them in spite of their faults. This is one of the hard lessons to learn. It is natural for us to look for agreeable people in the church and to feel that we have a right to desert if we are thrown into the company of some one whose character has ugly spots in it. The quest for pleasure ends in spiritual degeneration even when it occurs in the precincts of the church.

Whom God Chooses.

The doctrine of election has been a very comfortable one for many people. One is tempted to believe that some have rejoiced as much in the belief that certain men were to be damned as in the assurance of their own salvation. In other words, aristocratic feeling of a base sort has been in the church. The doctrine of election which a Christian may hold is something very different from this dogmatism of men who are concerned only for their own salvation. God chooses men and we know God's choice by what men are. A good man belongs to God's elect. Where he worships is a home of the soul. It is a misfortune for any one to be denied the privilege of worshipping God in fellowship with good men. There is justice in the statement that a community is godless if it has no company of elect souls meeting to worship God. The fires of moral enthusiasm will burn low in that community. It will be out of touch with the source of spiritual energy.

The Blessedness of the House of God.

We should beware lest we mistake something else for the blessedness of the house of God. Much that has passed and does pass for exalted religious feeling has no value whatever; it is at times a form of spiritual dissipation. We must ask of the religious enthusiast the troublesome questions that relate to self-conquest and social service! How much does he weigh morally? Is he interested in all that pertains to the kingdom of God? Or is he able to reach the state of ecstasy only by ignoring simple, everyday duty? It is no wonder that curious questions about conduct are disturbing to men of certain types of religious (?) feeling. The blessedness of God's house comes to men who have on their hearts the largest interests of the kingdom of God. Their vision reaches to the ends of the earth. They pray and they labor for the entrance of true faith into every human heart. They are able to connect interest in the universal reign of Christ with the common life. Because they are helping to evangelize India and Africa, they feel all the more strongly the obligation to be just in their dealings with their neighbors and their affections are stronger and nobler. They have respect for the rights of saint and sinner. Their joy in the assembly of the Lord is the joy of communion with God.

Building the Home.

Homes do not spring out of the ground by magic. Young lovers may think they do but experience teaches them better. Are there members of the church who imagine that church buildings will suddenly arise without anybody knowing the processes of their erection? If there are such persons, they probably think they have faith in God. The chances are, however, that they are lacking in generosity and courage. They prefer to keep their money to spend on themselves and they have not the courage to join in an enterprise that requires some risk. Churches in new and growing communities do not build themselves. Satisfactory results are possible in proportion to the generosity and wisdom displayed in the cooperation of Christians for meeting the religious needs of people everywhere. This is the reason for the Church Extension Fund. The haphazard method or lack of method of housing homeless congregations is contrary to the sanctified common sense of the church. Church Extension means systematic planning and building.

Christian Endeavor Lesson

By W. D. Endres

Life Lessons For Me From the Book of Romans.

Topic: September 5, Romans 12:1-21.

This is a consecration meeting and let us make it genuine. In the first verse of our scripture Paul calls upon us to make a sacrifice. What does he mean? He does not want the offering of bulls and goats, nor the first fruits of the harvest, but a perfect submission of the will to Christ. When we became Christians, if that move was genuine, our submission to Jesus was complete. No mental reservations were made, nor secret practices retained. Not an easy accomplishment. Many have been self-deceived just here. It is easy to think that you have succeeded when you have failed miserably. When the rich young ruler came to Jesus seeking salvation doubtless his inquiry was genuine and he thought he was ready to do anything that Jesus would ask. But when Jesus told him to sell all and follow him, he laid his finger on the treasure of the young man's heart. With this he was not ready to part company. This was the price of salvation, but it was more than he was willing to pay. He hung his head and walked away. Apply the test. Is there anything in all life which we treasure more than the life ideals of our Lord? Yes? Then like the young man the surrender is not complete and like him we must pass on, making life's journey alone. A perfect surrender is not an easy thing, but it is necessary.

Our Difficult Task.

Not only do we form such a profound resolution and upon that plane take up the Christian life, but upon that plane we must continue to live. This second and greater problem is a life long process. Sustained effort is a searching test. We can carry a great load for a short distance, but a light burden becomes intolerably heavy when sustained for a long time.

Christian history is glorious with heroic souls who have passed through the cleansing fires of persecution for the vindication of their lofty purposes. Those who did so were genuine. But in this day of religious toleration and freedom, we are not called upon to hang upon the cross, nor to stand at the stake. We have the more subtle, and therefore, the more difficult task—"to present our bodies a Living sacrifice." There are many who would give their bodies "to be burned" in behalf of a great cause, but who will lead compromising lives with respect to it. When Ex-Governor Folk was circuit attorney of St. Louis he attended a banquet in that city of which a part of the music consisted of national airs. At the conclusion of one of the pieces, a gentleman who sat by Mr. Folk, said to him, as tears were trickling down his cheeks, "I wish I could die for my country." Within six months that same man was brought into the courts of St. Louis by the circuit attorney on a charge of bribery and later sentenced to the penitentiary. He thought he was willing to die for his country, but certainly he was not willing to live for it.

A Living Sacrifice.

After all what is a living sacrifice, when stated in literal terms, more than the exercise of the power of choice on moral issues? For the Christian it is the selection of those things which will promote truth and justice among men, and the rejection of those things for which we have a personal desire, but which will hinder the realization of the Christian ideal. Under certain circumstances it may involve a denial to the possession of wealth, the pursuit of pleasure, or the joy of social intercourse. But if this is necessary for the realization of higher and nobler ends we must pay the price. The spirit of service rather than the spirit of self must characterize the Christian life.

With such a spriit there is no room for envy and jealosy. The "exagerated ego" has no place on such an elevated plane. All positions are exalted if they are nobly filled. Some people have administrative qualities; others the gift of public speech; still others prefer to minister all unseen to the sick and the needy; while there remain those who are suited to none of these things, but who are blessed with much means which they delight to use in the promotion of a cause which is common to all.

The Reformer

Before the monstrous wrong he sets him down—
One man against a stone-walled city of sin.
For centuries those walls have been a building;
Smooth porphyry, they slope and coldly glass
The flying storm, the wheeling sun. No chink,
No crevice lets the thinnest arrow in.
He fights alone, and from the cloudy ramparts
A thousand evil faces gibe and jeer him.
Let him lie down and die! What is the right,
And where is justice in a world like this?
But, by and by, earth shakes herself impatient;
And down, in one great roar of ruin, crash
Watch-tower and citadel and battlements.
When the red dust has cleared, the lonely soldier
Stands with strange thoughts beneath the friendly stars.

Church Life

Eureka, Ill., August 30-September 3.—The Illinois State Convention.

Church Extension, First Sunday in September.

The Oklahoma State Convention, September 6-10.

Eureka, Ill., Mecca for the Disciples. August 30-Sept. 3.

The Centennial Convention, Pittsburg, Pa., October 11-18.

Declaration Day, September 26, to be observed by churches and Bible schools.

Send Centennial offering for Church tension to S. W. Muckley, 600 Water Works, Kansas City, on Monday after first Sunday in September.

Mrs. H. L. Willett who has been seriously ill for more than a year past has been especially stricken during the summer. In all likelihood an operation will have to be undergone. This fact will explain any seeming neglect of his correspondents on the part of Dr. Willett of late.

F. L. Cook has resigned at Dallas, Ore.

The Martin family are now "storming the fort" at Kingman, Kans.

W. O. Cliffe preached for the church in Paynesville, Ind., Sunday evening, August 8.

L. A. Hussong has been called to the church at Red Cloud, Neb.

G. L. Bush, pastor at Carrolton, Mo., is in a meeting with the church at Melissa, Texas.

P. A. Cave has resigned at Charleston, W. Va.

A new church building is being erected at Roanoke, Va.

B. B. Tyler is expected to return to Denver in time to begin his work September 1. He has spent the summer in California.

G. H. Sims closed his work with the Central Church, Findlay, Ohio, the second of August.

L. P. Schooling, pastor of the church at Anaconda, Mont., is spending his vacation in Canada, looking after business interests.

It is reported that Dr. A. Clarke will become pastor of the church at Corpus Christi, Texas.

Church work is progressing encouragingly at Cameron, Mo., during the hot season. A. R. Liverett is pastor.

Work will be begun upon the new building for the Wayne St. Church, Lima, Ohio, early in the autumn.

W. J. Lahmon and B. L. Burditt are to assist the church at Lathrop, Mo., in a meeting, beginning early in September.

The churches at Indiana Harbor and Whiting, Ind., are co-operating and have called H. A. Carpenter as their minister.

The First Church, Findlay, Ohio, is supporting its own missionary and says that it finds the work a great blessing to the church.

A new parsonage is to be erected by the church at Goldfield, Iowa, where W. C. Cole is the minister.

Charles E. McVay, will lead the singing in a meeting to be held with the church at Fort Madison, Iowa, during January.

Louis H. Stine "and the members of the church," at Aberdeen, Miss., are holding a meeting this month.

The church at Riverside, California, contributes from $200 to $250 a year to the support of the Arlington Church, six miles distant.

The church at Greenfield, Ind., will send their pastor, R. O. Rogers, to the Centennial Convention—another generous and wise church.

O. W. Lawrence, pastor of the First Church, Decatur, Ill., has declined a call to succeed E. W. Allen in the pastorate of the church at Wichita, Kansas.

N. O. Davis, of Kansas City, Mo., has just closed a meeting at Kingsville, Mo., which lasted twenty-one days, in which there were forty-four accessions to the church.

In a meeting that is being held by Edward Clutter, evangelist, it is reported that there were nineteen additions to the church the first fifteen days.

Leonard G. Thompson continues his splendid work as secretary of the state work in Colorado. He has won a place in the affections of the Colorado people.

Evangelist W. J. Evans, Indianapolis, Ind., is making engagements for next year's work, and invites churches to address him at 606 Fletcher Ave.

Vernon Stauffer, Angola, was the chief speaker at the annual meeting of the churches of Allen County, Ohio. The meeting was held at Lima.

The following churches of the Nineteenth District, Ohio, are without ministers: North Baltimore, Prairie Depot, Gibsonburg, Eagleville and Jerry City.

W. D. Cunningham, missionary of the Christian church at Tokio, Japan, visited the Bible School at Canton, Ohio, August 15, and spoke at the morning service of the church.

Every Disciple in the state of Illinois should plan to attend the state convention which will be held with the church and college at Eureka, Ill., August 30-Sept.3.

A $10,000 house of worship is being erected at Salisbury, Mo. It is expected that the dedication will occur about the first of November.

Thos. L. Lowe, of Columbus, Ohio, addressed the Men's Club of the Central Church, Marion, Ohio, August 9. The church is planning for the organization of a Strong Men's club. Clarence Miller is the pastor.

The First Christian Church of Boulder, Colo., has made splendid progress the past year under the pastoral leadership of A. L. Ward. Some fine families have united with the church.

Otto D. Maple, pastor at Port Arthur, Ont., Can., can be had by some church for a meeting or supply, as the church grants him a few months off. They recommend him highly.

During the summer months the church at Lakewood, Ohio, is combining the Sunday morning Bible study and preaching service. If a good plan in the summer, why not in the winter?

The Wabash Ave. Church, Akron, Ohio, has a new pastor at the helm, Percy H. Wilson, who began work August 15. Professor Snoddy, of Hiram, has supplied for the church for several months, and is highly esteemed for his work's sake.

J. M. Lowe closes his work at Goodland, Kans., August 29, and his future address will be Des Moines, Iowa, care, Christian Union. During September Mr. Lowe will assist his former classmate, J. D. Greer, in a meeting in Missouri.

T. S. Tinsley goes from Shelbyville to Louisville, Ky. During the year there were sixty accessions to the church at Shelbyville at regular services. Of the year Mr. Tinsley says: "It was a happy year in a most delightful field."

J. R. Jolly, who has been serving as Assistant Pastor of the Sterling Place Church, Brooklyn, N. Y., while studying at Columbia University, will return to California this fall and assume charge of the church at Huntington Beach.

A fine service will be held with the First Church, Youngstown, Ohio, the last Sunday in August, when J. R. Ewers, the retiring pastor, will give the work over into the hands of L. G. Batman, who comes from the First Church, Philadelphia.

O. P. Spiegel is in a meeting at Dunn, N. C. Many have accepted the gospel invitation and come out on the Lord's side. Much interest is being manifest and the town stirred.

Clark Bower, who very recently resigned the church at Colorado City, has been called to the work of State Evangelist. His work at Colorado City was very successful and the state feels itself fortunate in securing him for the state work.

W. O. S. Cliffe and wife have been conducting a number of successful Centennial revivals in Indiana and are now ready to answer calls from congregations in line with their work westward, Illinois, Missouri, Kansas or Oklahoma.

A. L. Ward, pastor of the Christian church, Boulder, Colo., is the chairman of the general committee in preparation for a union meeting to be led by "Billy" Sunday, and has been very active in the work. He has the support of the entire church population and is leading our church to larger things.

Colorado State Convention will be held with the Boulder church, October 5, 6 and 7. This will give those who contemplate attending the National Convention just time to reach Pittsburg. Colorado work is growing and the churches are doing more than ever before.

The church at Long Beach, California, has joined the roll of honor churches by voting to send its pastor, F. M. Rogers, to the Centennial Convention with all expenses paid by the church. The same commendable action has been taken by the church at Pamona, where M. D. Clubb is the pastor.

There have been forty additions to the church at Hoopeston, Ill., in the last few weeks. The churches of the town are preparing for a union meeting to be held next October. The Christian church led by L. R. Hotaling is active in preparation for the meeting.

Guy E. Killie, teacher of English in the High School at Berwyn, Ill., while visiting in Indianapolis, was invited by the Third Church to preach for them Sunday, August 15. Mr. Killie was formerly a member of the Third Church. The church enoyed having him supply the pulpit.

Walter M. White, pastor of the First Church, Mexico, Mo., has declined a call to the West Side Church, San Francisco, Cal. Mr. White is making a place of wide influence for himself in Missouri, which he could hardly afford to sacrifice by a change of residence.

"Wanted: A million Christians, who are proud of the name they bear and eager to enshrine it in every heart, and inscribe it over every home, who would make that name known in every land, to every people and in every tongue."—The Christian Monitor, Warren, Ohio.

A new church is being erected at Lebanon, Ore., where there is a small congregation of Disciples, and a Sunday-school with an attendance of sixty. While waiting for the building to be prepared for occupancy the pastor, David Norcross, is pushing the work into the country round about, bringing accessions to the faith.

The church at Pendleton, Ind., has just paid off an indebtedness of $2,400 that has been hanging over it for several years. It has added about $400 of improvement to its beautiful property, and faces the future hopefully. Frank E. Jaynes begins his fourth year with the church the first Sunday in September.

F. M. Pittman, pastor of the East Side Church, Toledo, Ohio, has just built and moved into his own house. This indicates a confidence in his further relationship with the church, which is commendable, and profitable for both preacher and people. Too many preachers are wanderers, and the loss the churches suffer thereby is untold.

J. Fred Jones, Secretary of the Illinois Christian Missionary Society, has been appointed by Governor Deneen as delegate to the American Prison Association Convention to be held in Seattle. It was a serious mistake of the State legislature in making no appropriation for meeting the expenses of its delegates.

H. M. Hall, formerly city missionary of the Christian churches of Lincoln, Neb., and during the past year State Bible School Evangelist, will with Mrs. Hall spend a month working with the Scoville evangelistic team in a meeting at Franklin, Ind., and from there enter Yale University. Mr. Hall expects to remain in Yale University until he completes the work for the B. D. degree.

The churches are coming rapidly to practice Christian union, especially in those phases of their work where they feel most keenly the need of the strength that comes from union. The Baptist, Methodist, Presbyterian and Christian churches of Brownsville, Ore., have adopted the increasing practice of union Sunday evening meetings for hot summer months.

S. G. Inman, the efficient teacher in our school at Monterey, Mex., gave an address on his work in the East Dallas (Texas) church, August 8. Mr. Inman is working in Mexico, intelligently, with a broad grasp of the problems involved in that work, where so many of the people have lost all faith in the church, knowing it only as represented to them by the Catholic church.

Dr. Harvey O. Breeden, who was asked by the Executive Committee of Eureka College to succeed R. E. Hieronymus in the presidency, has declined the call. The opportunity to serve the Brotherhood as president of Eureka made a strong appeal of Dr. Breeden; but Dr. Breeden's aged father and Mrs. Breeden are both in such poor health as to make it deccidedly inadvisable for him to accept the work of the college.

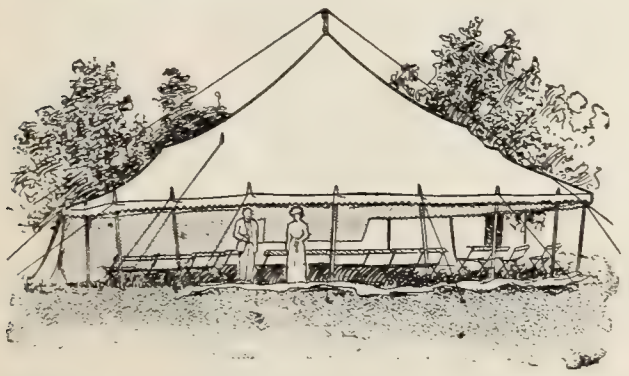
Mrs. F. M. Hoyt, of Forrest, Ill., lately deceased, left Eureka College $8,000. This, added to the $12,000 willed by her husband, will be immediately available for college uses, it is understood. A good sister at Mechanicsburg made the college beneficiary for the entire residue of an estate estimated at from $80,000 to $90,000, after some $25,000 is given to heirs. The will is admitted to probate, but will probably be contested.

W. L. Hayden, 14 N. Bolton St., Indianapolis, Ind., who is seventy years yonug, has prepared a series of Centennial addresses which would be a treat to any church. They are: "Alexander Campbell, the Matchless Defender of the Protestant Faith," "Walter Scott and the Great Reformation." The latter address was delivered before the Indiana Ministerial Association, which by vote commended these addresses to the church of the state.

F. D. Draper, who has been pastor of the Hillman Street Church, Youngstown, Ohio, for more than four years, has resigned and will close his work at the time of the Centennial Convention. Thus Youngstown is to lose two of her strong preachers this fall. It has been previously announced that J. R. Ewers goes from the First Church to East End, Pittsburg, the first of September. During Mr. Draper's pastorate with the Third Church a new building has been erected, and there have been 319 accessions to the church.

The attention of our readers is called to the letter from Prof. Charles M. Sharpe, of Columbia, Mo., which appears on another page. We regret that G. D. Edwards, who has been rendering such efficient service to the Bible College, should have been taken ill at this time, when it is so important that the campaign for the larger endowment be brought to a successful conclusion. The Brotherhood everywhere and especially of Missouri, will, we believe, respond to the appeal of Prof. Sharpe.

Before another number of The Christian Century reaches our readers most of them will have returned from their vacations to the tasks of another year—the first year of the second century of our history. To embody in our work during this year the paramount centennial ideals of spirituality, righteousness and power is indeed an inspiring task for preacher and church worker. Each earnest worker will seek to give himself at once with enthusiasm to the realization of the visions that have been given him during the time of rest and meditation.



The faculty of Eureka College are largely at some of the universities this summer taking graduate work. Profs. Jones and Boyer, of the Bible Dept., are at the University of Chicago and Prof. Lyon, of the English Dept., will spend both the summer and the year coming, there. Prof. Lyon, of the Language Dept., took his A. M. at the University of Wisconsin this month, and Prof. Harrod, of the same department, took his Ph. D. at Princeton in June.

"Appreciating God's House."

PSALM 122

As spiritual things are always dearer than temporal, so the Church Home becomes ever dearer than that of our earthly parents. Not that we love our earthly parents less, but that we love God and Christ more.

Worshipping in a Tent is not Permanent

With some help from Church Extension we can soon be in a good church home.

Some one has said the most beautiful name ever given to the church outside of the Bible was that of Bunyan's "Palace Beautiful." The buildings that Bunyan referred to were the log meeting houses of Bedfordshire. They were all the Baptists could afford in that day of religious persecution. Yet, when Bunyan sat upon those rude, rough, improvised seats, he felt that he was sitting in the midst of the General Assembly and Church of the First Born. Looking out through those dingy rafters, he could descry in the distance the shining pinnacles of the Church Universal. A sanctified imagination can make out of the most humble or the most costly church edifice a home of the soul.

The church is the window of the soul in human life, out through which we look and see God and heaven and the stars. And it need not always be an ornamented window in order to see well. Recently our Extension Board was asked for aid to build a four hundred dollar meeting house in Oklahoma. The congregation wanted to move from its sod meeting house into a frame. They only asked for one hundred dollars aid. It was a consecrated band. While a more pretentious house is needed in a city, this humble beginning was enough for this faithful little Oklahoma band.

"I was glad when they said unto me, let us go into the house of the Lord." Nearly one-tenth of our eleven thousand congregations can only say: "Let us go into a hall, storeroom, tent, opera house, court-house or school house." These may do for a few months after organization, but they are only temporary makeshifts. The Church Extension Board must help them out of the tent into an adequate building. The Annual Offering begins September 5th.

The Gains Continue

The receipts of the Foreign Society for the first seventeen days of August amounted to $21,274, a gain over the corresponding seventeen days of 1908 of $9,562. There was anlso a gain in the number of contributing churches and Sunday-schools.

The total receipts o. the year now stand at $254,508, a gain of $53,676. These are great figures. We congratulate the friends upon the splendid showing.

It is by no means impossible to gain $75,000 by September 30. Let all friends bend their efforts toward this point. This would be a great victory, indeed. The churches and friends are now surpassing all previous records, and if a gain of $75,000 is reached it will be a signal victory indeeed. However, there is not a day to be lost.

Many churches have not responded. They should line up at once. More churches are giving than ever before, and the increase from this source is quite encouraging.

We are glad to report twenty-eight new Living-link churches and the end is not yet.

IF YOU HAVE

CATARRH

Let Me Send You a Treatment of My Catarrh Cure. It's Free.

C. E. GAUSS.

I am Willing to Take Any Case of Catarrh, No Matter How Chronic, or What Stage It Is In, and Prove, ENTIRELY AT MY OWN EXPENSE, That It Can Be Cured.

Curing catarrh has been my business for years, and during this time over one million people from all over the land have come to me for treatment and advice. My method is original. The treatment is both local and constitutional effecting a cure by first curing the cause. Thus my combined treatment cures where all else fails. I can demonstrate to you in just a few days time that my method is quick, sure and complete because it rids the system of the poisonous germs that cause catarrh.

Send your name and address at once to C. E. Gauss, 4882 Main St., Marshall, Mich., and he will send you the treatment referred to. Simply fill in the name on dotted lines below.

To the Missouri Brotherhood —Special

G. D. Edwards who has had charge of the campaign on behalf of the endowment of the Bible College of Missouri at Columbia is ill with typhoid and the enterprise that he was leading falls upon others.

Dean Charles M. Sharpe at the request of the Executive Committee of the Bible College Board has laid aside for a few weeks his proper work upon the educational and administrative side of the school work and will devote himself to the endowment movement. The churches and ministers of the state are earnestly urged to render every possible assistance in this crisis of our educational interests. We appeal to the brethren of the state who are financially able to come to the rescue of this cause and to those who are not so largely blessed in the things of this world we appeal for their smaller offerings.

It is the plan to hold in as many of the churches as possible during September rallies for the object in view. Bro. Long's generous proposition must be met by October 1. If it is not the cause of Christian Education will be set back for many years in our state. It is no time for trifling. Let every one help and help now.

Dr. Z. S. Loftis Is Dead

A cablegram has just been received from Batang, border of Tibet, announcing the death of Dr. Z. S. Loftis, missionary of the Foreign Society, who had only reached the field. He died of small-pox and typhoid fever. It will be remembered that he went out last October. He stopped for a short time at Nankin, China, and left there February 19 for his long journey of more than 2,000 miles. He reached Ta Chien Lu May 24, and wrote that he would continue his journey and reach Batang about three weeks later. He must have reached his destination, therefore, about June 20.

This is sad news indeed at the mission rooms and will be shared by all our churches. This news will be a heavy blow to his lonely and aged mother and to the four missionaries who had looked forward so long and anxiously for his arrival. He was the Living link of the Vine Street Church, Nashville, Tenn., P. Y. Pendleton, minister, where he lived. This message will fill the whole church with deepest sorrow. They were very much devoted to their missionary.

This is a strange Providence, which we are unable to intrpret, but the God of all nations knows best and he may overrule the great loss to the furtherance of the gospel among the Tibetans.

It was a long, lonely, dangerous journey from Shanghai to Batang. It is the farthest interior mission station in the world. It is eighteen days from Ta Chien Lu, the nearest post office. The cablegram had to be sent to this point to be transmitted by way of Shanghai.

Dr. A. L. Shelton of Batang calls for another man to take the place of the fallen hero. Who will go?

Dr. Loftis was a well equipped man for his duties. He had been a student of mismions for many years. He pursued his journey to his station with cheerfulness and joy. He will long be remembered by his numerous friends. The grave of this good man at Batang calls lond to the four missionaries there on "the roof of the world"—J. C. Ogden and wife and Dr. A. L. Shelton and wife and three children.

A. McLean, President.

Church Extension Notes

It will delight the souls of good Christians to have a part in the Annual Offering for Church Extension which begins Sunday, September 5. Please do not forget that the Board has promised over $200,000 in loans to 183 congregations. We must pay many of these with our Annual Offering.

Last week the Board of Church Extension received an Annuity gift of $2,500 from a brother in Nebraska. This makes $5,000 given by this brother, and is the 255th gift on the Annuity Plan. Our Church Extension Annuity Fund now amounts to $249,333. Our Centennial aim is to reach $300,000 of an Annuity Fund by October 11.

Do not fail to order your supplies for the Annual Offering. Do so at once. Bring the matter to the attention of your elders. Pray and plan for the greatest offering your church has ever made. Let this coming September Offering be the most general and generous we have ever made to Church Extension; 163 congregations are appealing now for money with which to build. Many of our missions have made it a centennial aim to get a church home this year. Let us help them.

If every preacher and elder in our great membership could spend a month in the Church Extension office and read the appeals for aid and try to frame encouraging answers to these appealing homeless brethren, they could not fail to inspire their people to give in the forthcoming Annual Offering. We refer to appeals that are absolutely needy and worthy—churches that cannot barrow on hte ground to complete their buildings and cannot built without borrowing. They want help to help themselves.

An Appreciation

When James Small was called to the pulpit of the Independence Boulevard Church, to serve during my six months absence, there were some who doubted the wisdom of the choice. None doubt now. Though "in the field" Bro. Small has student ways and his sermons were as fresh as sea breezes. He preached and most acceptably by his tireless work forwarded all our ministries. Genial, kindly, big hearted, guileless as a child, tender like a woman, he won the hearts of our people. We are content—all save the indefatigable George P. Taubman, the minister superintendent of our Bible-school, who not even satisfied with the high summer average of 800 in the school is planning for a campaign that shall bring us to—wait and see. George H. Combs.

SURE TO ASK

The Kind of Coffee when Postum is Well-made.

"Three great coffee drinkers were my old school friend and her two daughters.

"They were always complaining and taking medicine. I determined to give them Postum instead of coffee when they visited me, so without saying anything to them about it, I made a big pot of Postum the first morning, using four heaping teaspoonfuls to the pint of water and let it boil twenty minutes, stirring down occasionally.

"Before the meal was half over, each one passed up her cup to be refilled, remarking how fine the coffee was. The mother asked for a third cup and inquired as to the brand of coffee I used. I didn't answer her question just then, for I had heard her say a while before that she didn't like Postum unless it was more than half old-fashioned coffee.

"After breakfast I told her that the coffee she liked so well at breakfast was pure Postum and the reason she liked it was because it was properly made, that is, it was boiled long enough to bring out the flavor.

"I have been brought up from a nervous, wretched invalid, to a fine condition of physical health by leaving off coffee and using Postum.

"I am doing all I can to help the world out of coffee slavery to Postum freedom, and have earned the gratitude of many, many friends." Read "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs. "There's a Reason."

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true, and full of human interest.

Illinois Christian Missionary Convention

Eureka, August 30, to September 2, 1909.

The Christian Century wishes to urge upon its readers the necessity of attending the meeting of the Illinois Christian Missionary Convention this year. Of course you are going to the Centennial Convention, but this will not discharge your duty to your own state. Then you will want to visit Eureka, the home of the Illinois College of the Disciples. The Eureka Church of which David H. Shields is now pastor is one of the great churches of the Brotherhood. She has a magnificant Missionary record, giving more for missions than for her work at home. The Eureka people are hospitable and are making every preparation for your coming. The program of the convention was published in full in the Christian Century last week. The Christian Woman's Board of Missions holds its meeting, Monday evening, Tuesday morning and afternoon, and Wednesday morning. President McLean makes the address Monday evening. Tuesday morning there will be the business session and an address by Mrs. M. E. Harlan. Tuesday afternoon, the annual reports, showing the work during this Centennial year, and an address by Mrs. Catherine Lindsay. Wednesday morning the election of officers.

The meetings of the Illinois Christian Missionary Society, Tuesday evening, Wednesday and Thursday will not lack in interest. The first address is by J. H. Gilliland, president of the convention. Wednesday morning, the reports of the year's work, by J. Fred Jones, W. H. Land, W. D. Deweese, J. P. Darst, and H. H. Peters. With short addresses by W. D. Ward and Theo. F. Hall. Wednesday afternoon, the Educational Association, which is just now working so hard for Eureka College will hold its meetings. There will be addresses by Mrs. Crawford, A. J. Elliott, H. H. Peters, F. W. Burnham and others. Charles Bloom's address on Evangelism at this hour, will be of vital interest. O. F. Jordan, with his illustrated lecture on "Boulevards and Slums of Chicago," will doubtless give to many a new insight into the possibilities and difficulties of the work of the churches in that great city. Thursday morning the delegates will have the opportunity of hearing, N. S. Haynes, former pastor at Eureka, and W. F. Turner, the new pastor at Peoria. And so the program continues until the last hour Thursday evening, when President Crossfield of Transylvania University gives the Educational address. The Disciples of Illinois are rounding out a great Centennial year. Many interests of the second century of their growth call for consideration at Eureka this year.

A Warning

Midland, Texas, Aug. 9, 1909.

With sad and disappointed hearts and realizing that this will bring sorrow to many brethren who have known him, we, the elders of the Church of Christ at Midland, take this method of announcing that Volney Johnson, formerly pastor of the Christian Church in Amarillo, El Paso and Midland, Texas, has committed a sin against God, the church, and his family and friends that has prompted the local congregation to withdraw fellowship from him, and its officials to send this warning to our churches. Deserting his wife and daughter, he left Midland for parts unknown taking with him a young woman of this place, with whom, as he confessed, he was madly in love.

In committing this sin he has compromised the holiest of interests, wrecked two families and brought grief to hundreds, who hitherto have believed him to be one of the purest men in the Christian ministry. Believing it a duty, we issue this warning to our brethren, and are sending this notice to the various papers of our brotherhood.

Durant, Oklahoma

Work under way on the construction of the new Christian Church, which was discontinued last year on account of the money panic. The new building will occupy one of the best building sites in the city, and when completed will be one of the most elaborate and best arranged church edifices in this section of the state. The estimated cost is $20,000.

The congregation is a comparatively small one, embracing only about 150 members, but it includes some of the most influential families in the city. The building of the church is largely due to the untiring efforts and energy of the pastor, A. E. Ewell, who launched the movement for the new church soon after coming here early in 1907. Rev. Ewell is one of the ablest ministers in the Christian Church in Oklahoma, and served with distinction as member of the last Legislature, devoting special effort toward the location of the Southwestern State Normal in Durant.—Durant News.

"The Athens of the Ozarks"

We have a number of country and small town churches in this delightful section of the state that could be supplied by young men, who have had experience in the active work of the ministry. We want men that have had not only some experience as preachers but who have had some work in Bible study. I am arranging to give two studies in Biblical History and Literature this year, beginning with September or October. These studies will be open to all students. The State University offers great advantages to such students. The tuition is only $5.00 per year, living in the boarding houses and dormitories is quite reasonable. The school is a thoroughly up-to-date, well organized university in every particular.

I shall be glad to hear from those who are thoroughly capable of caring for small churches and are willing to do some hard work for Christ and His kingdom.

Adult Bible Class Grows

1909 has proven a wonderful year in Adult Bible Class development. On January 1, there were 2,978 classes with an enrollment of 96,743. June 25, 1909, there were 7,397 classes with an enrollment of 214,119. The number of classes almost trebling and the enrollment more than double. These are the figures for all denominations. Our own report is very encouraging. January 1, 1909, we had 453 classes with 15,304 enrollment. March 25, 1909, we had 954 classes with 28,212 enrolled. June 25 we had 1,749 classes with an enrollment of 50,320. Thus, in six months, our number of classes has almost quadrupled, and the enrollment has more than trebled. A study of the reports by denominations reveals the fact that we are still in the lead. We are increasing not only in the number of classes but what is more important in the number of pupils enrolled. We have had no difficulty in maintaining first rank. This should not be simply a matter of pride to us but a matter of obligation, for we are set as no other people for the study of the Word of God, and one of our Centennial aims is "The Whole Church in the Bible-school." 1,749 classes with an enrollment of 50,320 indicates that we have only begun the work of enrolling our adult church membership in our Bible-schools. Subtract 50,320 from 1,250,000 and the result will indicate the task to which we must set ourselves. The following states report gains: Ohio, Illinois, Indiana, Kansas, Kentucky, Nebraska, Pennsylvania, Oklahoma, and Washington. Three states report a loss in the number of classes organized: Missouri, California, West Virginia.

Mrs. Meigs, to be Matron of Wharton Memorial

Mrs. F. E. Meigs, of Nanking, China, will assume the duties of matron in the Wharton Memorial Home, Hiram, Ohio, at its opening this fall. This is extremely fortunate. Her residence of twenty years on the mission field will give her a sympathetic insight into the problem of the care of the children of missionaries and will inspire confidence in the parents who must entrust their children to her oversight. She brings to the task also her own experience both as a teacher and a mother.

A local committee of management has been appointed by the Foreign Christian Missionary Society. The members are Prof. B. S. Dean, Mr. M. E. Baker and Mrs. Miner Lee Bates. Under their supervision the work is progressing rapidly in making the home ready for occupancy by October first.

The fund for this important institution is still much short of what is needed and the appeal is made to the Brotherhood to send contributions. They should be directed to the Wharton Memorial Home, Hiram, Ohio.

THREE REASONS
Each with Two Legs and Ten Fingers.

A Boston woman who is a fond mother writes an interesting article about her experience feeding her boys.

Among other things she says: "Three chubby, rosy-cheeked boys, Bob, Jack and Dick, aged 6, 4 and 2 years respectively, are three of our reasons for using and recommending the food, Grape-Nuts, for these youngsters have been fed on Grape-Nuts since infancy, and often between meals when other children would be given candy.

"I gave a package of Grape-Nuts to a neighbor whose 3 year old child was a weazened little thing, ill half the time. The little tot ate the Grape-Nuts and cream greedily and the mother continued the good work and it was not long before a truly wonderful change manifested itself in the child's face and body. The results were remarkable, even for Grape-Nuts.

"Both husband and I use Grape-Nuts every day and keep strong and well and have three of the finest, healthiest boys you can find in a day's march."

Many mothers instead of destroying the children's stomachs with candy and cake give the youngsters a handful of Grape-Nuts when they are begging for something in the way of sweets. The result is soon shown in greatly increased health, strength and mental activity.

"There's a Reason."

Look in pkgs. for the famous little book, "The Road to Wellville."

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true, and full of human interest.

Centennial Bulletin

The Prospectus, now being sent through the mail is a thing of beauty. To those who read it and preserve it, it will be a joy forever. It is a splendid specimen of the printer's art, and reflects great credit upon our Centennial Secretary, Bro. W. R. Warren, who conceived it, arranged it and pushed it to completion. It is full of information, relative to Pittsburgh, how to get there, what to do when there and how one will be entertained while there. It tells the story of the Centennial Campaign, and also that the Restoration cause in Western Pennsylvania. It has a recital of the convention plans and arrangements and has much to say relative to the program. It tells of Pittsburg's hotels and restaurants, and has much of interest relating to the varied industries of the city and closes with a description of a number of pleasant excursions that may be made out and away from the city.

You will want a copy of this prospectus. But if you expect to get one you must write for one immediately as there were only 100,000 printed and the supply will soon be exhausted. Write to the Publicity Man, whose name is signed to this article and he will see that you receive one as quickly as Uncle Sam can bring it to you.

Declaration Day.

A people who insist so earnestly upon the supremacy of the Bible would naturally be expected to be enthusiastic champions of the Bible-school. No people have made so much progress along this line within the last few years. No little credit for this revival of interest is due the Centennial propaganda. "All the church and as many more in the Bible-school," has proved a stirring war cry. That it is no chimerical idea is proved by the number of schools which have reached the goal. There is room for even a greater victory. It is suggested that in order to make the Bible-school sessions of the Centennial glow to a white heat, a new endeavor be made all along the line to reach this aim. Nothing but the best is worthy of us as a people. To add interest to the fall campaign and to increase the Centennial enthusiasm, the General Committee has issued a handsome two color streamer upon which is printed the Bible-school aim, which they are sending out, postpaid, for half a dollar.

Items of Interest.

There has just been received from Brother A. P. Frost, father of Miss Adelaide Gail Frost, a most interesting photograph of Alexander Campbell. This photograph was given to Brother Frost by our brother Ira J. Chase, formerly governor of the state of Indiana. Brother Chase received it from Mr. Johnson, brother-in-law to Isaac Errett. It was taken on the occasion of Mr. Campbell's last visit to Pittsburgh. In connection with this photograph there is another very interesting one, of Sarah Hanen, who was baptized. Each of these rare and valuable Luse, the same day that Mr. Campbell was baptixed. Each of these rare and valuable old photographs has been reproduced and will be presented in the Centennial Program now on the press in Boston, Mass.

In the Centennial Program which will be full of good things there will be short history of Pittsburgh, by that eminent author and distinguished critic, Col. Samuel Harden Church. Col. Church is the grandson of Walter Scott on his mother's side and the famous Samuel Church, of Allegheny on the side of his father, who did much in the early days of the Reformation to establish the church in Pittsburgh. In fact, Samuel Church donated the first tract of ground really owned by the early disciples and built the first church in Allegheny in which he preached for a long time. Now his grandson, Col. Church, is walking in the footsteps of the pioneers and shows in the twentieth century how the good deeds of the fathers are visited to their children's children.

Professor W. B. Taylor of Bethany, West Virginia, has forwarded to the Centennial headquarters three very interesting photographs. The first two are those of Dr. and Mrs. J. T. Barclay, our first missionaries to Jerusalem. Dr. J. T. Barclay is the honored father of Dr. J. J. Barclay now of Bethany, who married Decima, the tenth daughter of Alexander Campbell and was for years our United States Consul at Cypres, Jerusalem and Damascus. The other photograph is that of Dr. R. Richardson, the eminent biographer of Alexander Campbell, to whom all of our people owe a debt of gratitude for his masterly work. These photographs will be reproduced in the program and will make it of special interest to all who are concerned in the origin of the Restoration movement.

Finally brethren: Don't forget to make earnest prayers for all who have to do with the convention in any way. We may have the crowds, that is assured; we may have the enthusiasm, that is undoubted; we may have the good addresses, that goes without saying; but unless we have the Cpirit of the Lord Jesus with us our gathering will be in vain. Let us remember that "it is not by

The Hotel Henry has been chosen as Headquarters for Chicago people at the Centennial Convention. This is one of the best hotels in the city. Rates for the convention are $1.50 per day European plan, and $2.50 with two in a room. Prices range higher for rooms with bath. The hotel has a beautiful lobby where convention fellowship will be in full sway. It is new and modern and the manager is determined that nothing shall be left undone to make us quite at home during our stay in Pittsburg.

Chicago will be glad to be host to friends from all parts of the country who wish to stop at this hotel.

It is not one day too soon to make your reservation. We predict that hotel accommodations will soon be exhausted.

B. S. Church Extension Fund

Every pupil in every Bible-school ought to know that for the past three years the Board of Church Extension has quietly gathered what is called the Sunday-school Named Loan Fund. The purpose of this is to provide a fund of offerings from Bible-schools to erect churches in needy fields.

In most missionary fields the Bible-school is recognized as having a place of fundamental importance in evangelizing the community. Church architecture is giving more and more attention to the erection of buildings adapted to Bible-school needs. The Sunday-school Named Loan Fund is very useful just here. It will be possible as this fund increases for many a church to begin with a model Bible-school room and from the increasing Bible-school grow into a church which will be able to complete a suitable building.

During the year 1908-1909, 112 schools in twenty-six states had a share in the Sunday-school Named Loan Fund. The offerings amounted to $552.18. The total amount in the Loan Fund up-to-date is $1,461.46.

This fund has already built three churches, one at Rexford, Kans., another at Fairview, Oklahoma, and a third at Fayetteville, Ark.

These churches could not have been helped but for the liberality of the Bible-schools. This fund should be enormously increased during the month of September, so that many another waiting church may have a home.

The Church Extension Board is asking each Bible-school in our brotherhood for one of its regular offerings during the month of September to be sent to the corresponding secretary, George W. Muckley, 500 Water Works bldg., Kansas City, Mo. This request is so reasonable and the cause is so worthy that every Bible-school should participate promptly and joyfully, Marion Stevenson.

The Calling of Dan Matthews

By HAROLD BELL WRIGHT, Author of
"The Shepherd of the Hills" "That Printer of Udell's"

FORCEFUL—WHOLESOME—THOUGHTFUL
A Realistic Story of Pathos and Humor, Courage and Conviction

¶ The Calling of Dan Matthews while different in treatment and style from the author's earlier works, is a combination of the wonderful "motive power" of That Printer of Udell's and the beautiful "story power" of The Shepherd of the Hills, in one vital thrilling life-giving force of "thought power," out of which "the ministry of daily life" is the all-compelling incentive that grips the life and determination of its readers.

¶ Righteous in its mission, contemporary with present day thought, most beautiful in story, and exceedingly praiseworthy in literary merit. ¶ Big Dan, that manly man of convictions; Hope Farwell, so delightfully refreshing; the old Doctor, true philosopher and poet, and poor little crippled Denny, so sympathetic, loving everything and everybody, are masterful character creations—the best Mr. Wright has yet done.

Where Shall We Find God?

The Seeming Rivalry Between God and Science as an Explanation of the World

It seems to many as if the increase of knowledge is gradually but inexorably shoving God out of his universe and leaving it to a reign of law. This is probably due to the fact that men have from time immemorial located God's presence in the mysterious, the unexplained, the so-called supernatural.

The earlier revelations of God to man came, no doubt, through man's sense of wonder.

God made his presence felt in the unusual, the marvelous. A miracle was a certificate of his presence. Truth was seen true not always by its intrinsic nature, its reasonableness or its worth, but because it was accompanied by a sign.

Storms, fire, the burning bush, the quaking mount, the darkening sky at mid-day, an unexpected death, sickness, not to speak of the endless list of omens and portents—all bespoke the near presence of a world of spiritual beings whose goings-on took no account of the order of events to which man was accustomed.

The development of science has gradually brought us into a different universe. The tiny area of the known, the natural, has been wondrously broadened until man walks forth in a world in which he feels completely at home.

Not only has one mystery after another yielded to the explanations of science, but the conviction that every mystery would lend itself to rational explanation if we could only hit upon the right hypothesis, has rooted itself deep in the souls of modern people.

Religion has ever looked with fear upon this increase of knowledge because she has located God in the phenomena of the world that are inexplicable. She has always had a feeling that to explain an event was to rule God out of it; wherever science could go God was superfluous.

From the time of Galileo to our own day warfare has obtained between religion and science, between worship and knowledge.

When Newton and Leibnitz formulated the law of gravitation to explain the position and procession of the heavenly bodies they were opposed by religion on the ground that God would be driven out of a business he had engaged in ever since the heavenly bodies were created. For before Newton men conceived that each planet was shoved along by an angel or spirit appointed of God to this special task. Where shall we find God, men asked, if not in the starry heavens above?

Later Darwin came with his conception of organic evolution. All species of living beings have evolved each from an inferior species, he said. But religion had always taught that God had started off each species of living beings in the world by his direct creative power.

And where shall we find God if not at the great beginnings of things? men asked.

Then the Bible became the subject matter of a new discipline. Men undertook the task of finding out when its various parts were written and by whom and under what circumstances.

And many souls were afraid and asked, If the Bible sprang out of human history and may be explained through human experience, is it not then a thoroughly human book and have we not driven God from its pages?

Providence, too, the faith that God knows his children each by name, and that he answers to their need and call with his strong help—this comforting doctrine of our religion—the core and essence of religion, we might better say—has always been interpreted in terms of the unusual, the marvelous, the special intervention of divine aid or judgment.

But with more precise observation of facts this doctrine has suffered rude shock. It has been observed that the rain falls upon both the just and the unjust; that the good do not always prosper, nor the bad always fail; that a vast slaughter like the Iroquois theater fire or the Sicilian earthquake takes guilty and good alike; that to offset every instance of the special intervention of God's hand in behalf of justice for the innocent or judgment for the guilty, there can be produced an equally convincing instance in which the good were made to suffer or the bad allowed to go scot-free.

So that men are asking, if God does not bare his arm in a special dispensation in behalf of goodness and against evil, how can we make out his presence anywhere in the earth?

Likewise the soul's own experience of God in conversion and the Christian life has seemed ever to present wonders and miracles transcending the inquiry of science. Here in these marvels of conversion spirit meets with spirit. Here is the citadel which impertinent science cannot enter. Only God can explain conversion.

Now at last this conversion experience has been invaded by ruthless science. First came the Disciples of Christ with their clear analysis of the conversion process into a normal process of believing, repenting and obeying. All this, they said, needs no miraculous attestation of God's presence.

For this the Disciples were called Rationalists and Unitarians, and were charged with disbelieving in the Holy Spirit.

Now at last psychology in a spirit like unto that of the Disciples has set its instruments to analyze and interpret religious experience. It finds that the so-called miracles in the conversion experience are as truly subject to psychological law as any other mental experience can be.

And our heart, bleeding with the surgery of science, cries out, Where, then, shall we find God?

In all this our fault has been that we have sought God among the marvels of life, among the mysteries, among the miracles, in a realm we called the supernatural. We have limited God's activity to those events whose law we could not find. And when at last we found the law explaining an event we have assumed that God took his departure. Our basic assumption has been: the more magical, the more divine.

The great change religion is undergoing in our day consists primarily in a new sense of the location of God.

We are learning to see Him in the great commonplaces of life,—in nature, in the long, evolutionary process, in the history and human experience of the Hebrews who wrote our Bible, in the common events of everyday life as well as the unexpected, the unusual event, in the educational process by which a child is trained so as never to know himself other than a Christian, as well as in the convulsive experience of the prodigal's conversion.

We do not think of God as acting in wonders, in miracles, in mysteries, mainly, but in the orderly processes of life. And we are fast coming to the point where we can allow the scientist to do his utmost at explaining any sacred object like the Bible, or any sacred experience like conversion, without losing one whit of our sense of God.

After all, a world in which miracles may be explained is a diviner world than one full of miracles that can never be explained.

God is not limited to special occasions in his activity. The laws we discover in nature and the soul are the pathways of his habitual working. To know these laws is to be able to walk in closer companionship with God and perchance to help Him at his mighty task!

We have made the mistake of La Place, who sought God as a Thing among things. Sweeping the heavens with his telescope he reported that he found no God there.

The mistake of La Place was that he searched for God at the wrong end of the telescope. God gets into the universe by way of the soul. He does not break into the soul's consciousness from the outside like a crash of thunder or a landscape or a new planet.

Let us rather learn from Newton, that other astronomer, who came back from his explorations among the stars and acknowledged, "I think Thy thoughts after Thee, O God!"

To him a new truth was not only a discovery of his own mind, but a revelation of God.

The Trend of Events

JAPAN'S MISSIONARY JUBILEE

Preparations are being made to celebrate the Jubilee of Christian Missions in Japan next October. Fifty years ago three intrepid men followed the wake of Perry and entered Japan. They were not permitted to preach or teach openly, and the old edict, that for two hundred years had hung like the sword of Damocles over any christian aspiration in the Flowery Kingdom, was still scattered broadcast at the cross roads of the kingdom, saying, "Let no Christian be so bold as to come to Japan. If he violate this command he shall pay for it with his head." This edict was not finally taken down until in the seventies. But if public teaching could not be done, private converse could not be denied. The medical art cannot be resisted anywhere and Japan wanted it without the christianity that alone was willing to send it to them. These pioneers could not get anyone to teach them the language until a spy was found who was willing to do it secretly. He was asked to help translate the Bible and was frightened away. In the first twelve years but ten were baptized and these in secret. One was imprisoned five years when discovered and the threat of death hung over his head all that time. Another died in prison for the "crime" of reading the Bible in Chinese. The missionaries were told that anyone found baptizing would be executed, and any one found reading a Bible or selling even an English copy would be imprisoned. The first church was quietly organized in Yokohama in 1872, the edicts were removed in 1873, twelve were baptized in 1874, and Neesima started the famous Doshisha University in 1875, though he could not even rent a building for it for six years.

AFTER FIFTY YEARS

Last year nearly 10,000 united with the churches in that same Japan, fourteen Christians sat in Parliament, the Emperor made gifts to Christian enterprises, the great Ito commended Christianity, Tokyo welcomed an International Christian Conference and did itself proud in hospitality toward it.

Today, in Japan, is a church of 70,000 members and christian community of several times that number. It is said that a million young men are reading the Bible and taking it as their moral authority without uniting with any church. Their peculiar national devotion will make the coming of a national native church the signal for a Pentecost. Today there are 400 organized churches and one-fourth of them are self-supporting. More than that, there is a Japanese Foreign Missionary Society doing work in China, Korea, and Manchuria. Thus they have caught the spirit of Christianity. There are 500 native pastors and evangelists and 1,000 others devoting their time to active christian work.

The missionary host numbers 800. The M. E. church has united all branches and elected their own native bishop to direct the work among its 14,000 members. The Congregationalists number as many and have many independent churches. The Presbyterian subdivisions are also united under the title, Church of Christ in Japan, and with their independent and mission churches care for 18,000 members. All denominations tend to become more and more simply christian as they become more independent of foreign support. These Japanese Christians, with a wage earning power but a fraction of what our is, gave last year $150,000 for christian work.

THE SOCIAL LEAVEN OF JAPAN

The new Japan is measured by its progress in liberty and charity more than all else. While the edict against Christianity was removed in 1873, it was not until 1889 that Christianity was given official right to exist. The Feudal system was abolished, Parliament instituted schools under tutelage of Christians, there were established modern reformatory institutions, displacing the old dungeons, and placed under Christian direction, a national university was founded with a missionary directing, science was eagerly welcomed at the hands of Christian missions, and the social leaven of Christianity permeated through the whole measure of national and governmental life. Today, Japan has a modern school system from the kindergarten to the university, and is fast extending it so every boy and girl in the empire will be taught. Her Red Cross has 1,000,000 members. Her prison system will compare favorably with the most modern of the western world. Toleration is the national watchword. Education is the national aspiration. Philanthropic institutions are being founded, but the most far-seeing of Japanese statesmen are saying it will be impossible to preserve these things, the fundamental institutions of a civilization, until they have the soul of civilization—a Christian morality and religion.

The Doshisha, founded by the Japanese Christian, Neesima, in 1875, has taught 6,000, and they have gone into all lines of higher endeavor in the Kingdom. They are in Parliament, the schools, the editorial rooms, the leading counting rooms and the army and navy. Other Christian colleges have educated as many more and the 500 native pastors come from these and the Doshisha. There are 650 in the Bible schools and theological seminaries, 10,000 in the boarding schools supported by the missionary boards, and 8,000 more in their kindergartens and day schools. Last year one of the seven mission presses, the M. E., turned out 1,500,000 volumes. In the past five years 2,000,000 Bibles have been distributed.

Twenty years ago, Prince Ito, the most influential statesman in Japan, then as now, declared they wanted Western education and invention, but that their religion was good enough for them. Last year he laid the corner stone to a Y. M. C. A. building in Seoul, contributed handsomely to that and other Y. M. C. A. work, told the young men of both Korea and Japan that they could do no better than to follow the precepts of Christianity, and, with the Emperor, has been one of the greatest encouragements Christian missionary work has ever received in Nippon. Teachers of English in the Commercial High Schools of the land are selected by the Y. M. C. A., Christian men are favored for responsible financial posts, and the followers of the Nazarene furnish men for responsible positions in the government in a ratio of ten to one as compared to other faiths. Shintoism is dead as a faith and Buddhism is attempting to stem the rising of the tide by adopting many of the elements of the new religion.

IS CHRISTIANITY A SUCCESS IN JAPAN?

Some deny the success of Christianity in Japan because only 70,000 actual church members can be shown after 50 years. Some have never learned history and some have learned all of it except that which relates to religious progress. History has to them been a story of wars and diplomacy, or perhaps, in these latter days, of bread and butter and the making of machines. The time is near when, with these, the powerful factor of religion will be more reckoned with in the study of the rise and fall of nations and the making of civilization. In the mingling of elements it will be found to be both the most subtle and the most powerful. As one may discover the anatomy of the body more easily than the psychology of the soul, so may he analyze the material factors of civilization more easily than the spiritual.

The deeper the life of a nation, the more slowly will it yield its deep things and the more quickly will it adopt the superficial things that others offer if they can be proven good. A savage people may be won, and genuinely won to the deeper things of civilization, to the fullest extent of their ability to understand them because they have nothing to lose and all to gain. At the same time, having no preparation for the complexities of civilization they are able to utilize the mechanism it offers but slowly and as they learn. A cultural people will readily adopt the mechanical and material benefits of civilization, once their traditions are out of the way, because they have an inner preparation for their complexities. But they will not so quickly receive the deeper spiritual things because they must first give up their old things of the spirit. The first is material in the hand and like pine may be easily carved and shaped to use. The second is like the heart of oak, it grows only with the years.

Japan will "learn the doctrine by doing the will." In other words, she is utilizing the benefits of Christianity, is testing her by her fruits, and will believe on her for her work's sake. The million young men who are reading the New Testament are in the process of assimilation. The social work of Christian missions is leading in the new social era of Japan. Buddhism is, among its wiser adherents, assimilating Christian ideas. The old moral codes are discovered as not squaring with the new life and the teachers and leaders are declaring that if lovely Nippon is to preserve her material body of civilization, she will have to incarnate the soul of civilization, the Christian religion. It has even been proposed by some to make a national established church and adopt Christianity wholesale, as they have western science, by Japanizing it. This illustrates the process of assimilation going on and the fact as well that the old has not yet caught the vision of the new.

THE FATHER OF MODERN JAPAN

All this is illustrated in the life and work of the true Father of Modern Japan, Guido Verbeck. Two other men played most important roles. They were Dr. Hepburn and Prof. Brown. Brown translated the New Testament and maintained a school at Yokohama that gave the native church a score of its first evangelists and defenders. In that school he also taught many government officials. Hepburn was the only physician for several years and aroused a passionate interest in science among the younger and more progressive Samurai. He translated the Old Testament and compiled a dictionary of the Japanese language that is yet the standard. But most intimately associated with the course of Japan's actual redemption in practical ways was Guido Verbeck. Verbeck was a Hollander. He was Americanized by residence in this country during his formative period of life. The Moravians had cast the spell of missionary passion about him in the old country. He was imaginative, of poetic temperament and a fine linguist. He could speak four tongues fluently and keep silent in forty more. He was a wise and therefore a quiet man. He was a true christian and therefore humble but effective, caring not who received the credit, if only the good was done.

At the age of 29 he landed in Nagasaki. Not being allowed to preach publicly nor teach openly he welcomed a few young men to instruction. His class grew with the opening of opportunity. At the end of six years he had baptized but two, but the quiet, amiable, determined missioner was teaching English by using the Bible and the Constitution of the U. S. as text books. Count Okuma and other "makers of Japan" were learning his lessons. At the end of the decade he was laying the foundations of the Imperial University which has since become one of the great educational institutions of the world. At that time he was translating Blackstone and works on Political Economy. These were followed by the Code Napoleon, the Constitutions of various European countries, legal works, and legal forms of all kinds. The next decade was one of ferment ending in rebellion and the firm establishment of the Mikado on the throne. During this troublous time Verbeck quietly taught. The University grew to over 500 students with 18 instructors. The enmity toward Christianity grew intense. Both Christians and progressives suffered martyrdom, but Verbeck became one of the most trusted advisors to Iwakura, the leader on the New Japan party. He says little, waits to be consulted, offers advice deferentially, asks for no personal favors, and his parlor becomes a council chamber for the Young Japan party. He advises the sending of a party of the young leaders around the world. He arranges their route, obtained introductions and was accorded the honor of naming two of them. Before they returned, upon his advice, the boards bearing the Anti-Christian Edict were removed. Seeing that several of the old world powers looked with covetous and imperialistic eyes to the East, Verbeck advised an army and a navy and coast fortifications and obtained places for six young men at Annapolis. Now princes were asking him to give scientific advice on development of the country, the government had asked for missionaries to establish schools over the empire, and Wm. Elliot Griffis went to assume charge of scientific institutions and training. The Emperor organized a Senate to advise him in affairs of state, and Verbeck is unofficial advisor to the Senate.

Now that Japan is opened to Christianity, Verbeck desires to withdraw from official life and devote all his time to purely missionary work. After some months he obtains release and the Mikado decorated him with the Order of the Rising Sun. Ever after he is ex-officio guest at all state functions and was received by the Mikado once each year as a mark of special esteem. When the Parliament was granted he was importuned to lecture to its prospective members on political subjects, but refused because he preferred to preach. He consented to give two lectures a week before the nobles' school on Christian Ethics. He traveled over the empire the last years of his life, but refused to speak where enthusiastic Japanese friends had announced in public print that he carried the Mikado's decoration. This man's part in the renaissance of Japan illustrates well the manner in which Christiantiy has influenced the nation and is leavening the social life of New Japan, and is a parable of the manner in which she will be won to Christianity.

THE MORROW OF NIPPON

Japanese population is growing rapidly. In 25 years it has increased from 37,000,000 to 50,000,000. The country is both small and mountainous and there must be overflow. In the past few years more than 100,000 have emigrated. Korea and Manchuria will become Japanese by economic conquest. She has farmed her mountains to the top and her sea out to the landless horizon. She has fought her battle for life and is deeply in debt. She has prescience enough to want peace and an opportunity to build the solid foundations of economic strength under her vast new civilization. She looks to a morrow of revenge by Russia unless Russia becomes a new government. She sees the awakening of China's mighty economic power, latent in 400,000,000 of the most tireless workers in the world. She must keep her place among the powers and all requires economic strength. So peace is her desire and trade her ambition.

The menace of Japan is not militarism, but materialism. She needs money and she is in danger of worshiping at the shrine of Mammon. She is breaking away from the compulsions of the old religions and agnosticism must be her portion if a better religion replace not the old. She can easily become Chauvinistic and be ruined by her "jingoes" because her success has been so remarkable. She can easily transfer her Shinto worship of the throne into a materialistic worship of the nation's "destiny." But she will not do any of these things. Thirty centuries of history contradict the possibility of a hasty ruin on the shoals of mere temporalities. She has in her the continuing life of milleniums. She is too spiritual in her patriotism to allow beloved Nippon to fly in the face of a fact as old as her dynasty. That thirty centuries is a rock of ages under her and her patriotism is a breath of heaven in her and she will be warned by her wise men and amid all her readjustments come in due time to that mightiest of them all, her spiritual readjustment, and the religion that has the halo of the eternal on its brow will be the faith of undying Nippon.

Editorial

PROFESSOR Ernest DeWitt Burton, head of the department of New Testament Literature and Interpretation, in the University of Chicago, returned last week from a thirteen months' trip to the Orient. Professor Burton was sent out in July, 1908, under a commission of the University to make a study of educational conditions in China and other lands of the far East. His investigations took him within the borders of Turkey, Egypt, China, India, Korea, and Japan. Six months of the time was spent in China; two months in India, and a little over six weeks in Japan. In all these countries, declares Professor Burton, is found keen interest in education. In India the British government is making larger provision for education, and the youth of the land are eager to avail themselves of the advantages, though usually only as a means of securing a better salary in government service than they could hope to make in other ways. In China, the old education is a thing of the past, and Professor Burton confesses surprise at the tendency these people show for building up systems modeled closely after the best schools of England and America. New buildings are being erected, with modern equipment, and teachers are being employed who have the very best preparation. Professor Burton commends the work that is being done by the mission schools, but these and the government schools are entirely unable to meet the demands that are made upon them by the Chinese youth, who have awakened to the fact that a new day has dawned in Chinese history, and that the only way in which they can live influentially in that new day is to secure the educational training which the best schools offer them. The great defect of the educational work of the Japanese, as seen by Professor Burton, is its over-specialization. Their schools lack entirely that broad education which is provided by the American schools as a basis for the special work that the students may wish to do later.

WHERE are the idealists? It has usually been assumed by Christian people that the Christian church is the nursery and home of the highest ideals of the race. Now comes Harold B. Wright, who was at one time pastor of a Christian church, in Kansas City, and in his late book, "The Calling of Dan Mathews," which we review in another page, claims that not the church but the men outside the church are the true idealists. He makes use of a cast iron monument as a symbol of the church, while a live, growing garden, which supplies food for the hungry is the symbol of the life outside the church. Is this true? Are the true idealists to be found outside the church rather than within it? There are many who will advocate this claim. Perhaps there are some in the church who will admit the charge. Many will admit the strong tendency within the church to crystallize, to worship the traditional form, to confuse the accepted statements of belief and forms of worship and service with religion which is the life-giving spirit. But after all, this is a failing of human nature and not a failing of the church alone. Be it so; still most of the men in the church, are idealists, and they, though they see the imperfections of the church, are striving for a day when she shall be free from these hindrances, and shall go forth with power to accomplish her God-given tasks. Mr. Wright's argument that because of this tendency to emphasize the external and accidentals of religion, it is best to forsake the church and seek the realization of one's ideals in other directions is hardly justifiable. When a business is not paying, we do not abandon it, but reorganize it so that it will pay. When a school is not accomplishing its mission we do not forsake it, but reorganize it so that it will perform the desired work. So with the church. The true idealist within the church will not forsake her because he sees her imperfections, but will seek to reorganize her activities so that they shall express the highest ideals of the Christian religion.

THE series of studies of present-day evangelism which appeared in our pages recently has brought us many letters of gratitude and approval. From some have come criticisms of this or that point in the discussion, but no one has attacked the essential thesis upon which our articles were based. We gladly give space this week to J. E. Davis, pastor at Beatrice, Nebraska, whose reply to our examination of revivalistic music is typical of many other communications we have received. He evidently did not read our statements with much care. We nowhere condemn any of the features he defends—noise, the "control" of the congregation by the leader, or congregational singing. The unspirituality of the worship led by such a godless choir as he describes cannot be more repugnant to him than to us. Fortunately we are not shut up to any such alternative. Least of all does our critique state or imply that evangelists make a "premeditated attempt" at hypnotic control. Whatever hypnotism obtains in revival meetings we choose to believe is, for the most part, unconsciously employed. But it is none the less vicious and degrading to spiritual religion even though the manipulator is unaware of the nature of the forces with which he deals. A body of protest is growing rapidly against the unspiritual methods of many revivalists. With the clearer insight into the method of Jesus himself that the modern rediscovery of his person is making possible we may expect not only a theological change but a profound transformation of the organization and methods of the church itself.

The Winning of the Million

WHEN our Church Extension enterprise took form twenty years ago the gain of a million dollars for this purpose seemed a dream so far from realization that it was only to be taken seriously by such enthusiasts as the Secretary and the Board. Other denominations had vast sums at their disposal for this work, but the Disciples were new to such things and were concerned rather with the arithmetic of conversions than with that of missionary funds.

The years have gone by and it is astonishing that today our fund lacks less of being a million than any one of us dared to hope. It would be a magnificent thing if we could achieve the whole amount this year. To do so would require an offering of three hundred thousand dollars, but it is safe to say that with reasonable enthusiasm the churches would pass the three-quarter post this year and turn into the home stretch next year for the winning of the million.

In the meantime many notable things have been done by this fund which makes pleasant reading to Disciples. Since its organization the Church Extension Board has helped 1,248 churches spread over forty-four states. Of these churches 648 have repaid their loans in full, and that money is at work again helping other churches. A total of $864,000 has been returned from assisting churches.

This is one of the finest features of Church Extension and makes its appeal strongly to the business sense of all contributors. There are very few enterprises in which one can keep his cake and eat it too. In most of the good work we do, whether in the local church or in the foreign field, the money spent returns only in the good it accomplishes. In addition to this primary effectiveness of Church Extension money, the total amount comes back again and again to repeat its splendid work of building churches throughout the nation. This looks more like magic than reality at first, but it is the soberest of financial sense.

There have been no losses to the Church Extension Fund. So high has been the appreciation of the churches that the most earnest efforts have been made by all that have received aid from the fund to return the money intact, plus the small rate of interest charged. This interest is intended to cover the expenses of administration, so that no money actually comes out of the fund for any other purpose than the erection of churches. This is a feature of Church Extension which appeals strongly to its promoters, and these promoters are the entire brotherhood.

In addition, it must be remembered that no loans are made upon property which is not advantageously located or whose title is in the least cloudy. Those who have made application to the Board for loans to complete churches know with what careful scrutiny the Secretary and his legal experts examine every detail of the proposal. Many a church has been disappointed because it was unable to meet the very reasonable conditions of the Church Extension Board. But these very conditions have proved the safe-guards of the fund, and a church which cannot comply with them should rejoice with all the other churches that the affairs of the Board are administered in a manner beyond danger of loss.

But the real difficulty which confronts Church Extension among us is its inability to meet anything like all the calls that are presented for its assistance. In spite of the rapid growth of the fund the churches have multiplied more rapidly still. Many of them are entirely unable to provide themselves with church homes without the assistance which the fund offers. And the fund itself is inadequate to provide assistance for many churches which are most worthy and dependent. This is a condition which the Board and the Secretary are powerless to remedy. The churches alone can provide sufficient funds to answer the calls of the brotherhood.

The offering which begins the first Sunday in September is devoted to this cause. It requires a special effort, for the reason that September is an early month in the calendar of all the churches after the vacation period of the summer. Some of the members have been away and the work of the church has more or less slackened during the warm weather. Special emphasis must, therefore, be laid on the Church Extension offering to have it reach normal proportion. It must be left to no haphazard and careless announcement. If so, it will be a disappointment to the minister, the church, and the Board of Church Extension. With careful preparation a suitable and just gift can easily be made to this great cause, such a gift as will measure up to the responsibility and good will of the church.

It need hardly be urged that a church without a building is only living a half life. Its power of usefulness is largely wanting. Even if the quarters it rents for worship are suitable and commodious, it cannot have the air of possession and permanence which justifies the people of the community in taking it and its future seriously. At best a church in a hall or building not its own is in the stage of childhood. Childhood is always promising, but not very effective. It is the erection of a building which creates confidence in the efficacy and promise of such a congregation, and attracts to it the people who will prove its mainstay in future years.

It is with satisfaction that the increasing interest of the Disciples in church architecture is noted. In many of the cities our churches are coming to be among the most beautiful and commodious. It may seem a far cry from one of the modest chapels which constitute the great body of Church Extension structures, to one of these handsome and elaborate temples, costing up into the hundred thousands. Yet the connection between the two is very intimate. Perhaps the great church began its career in a building as small as the least of these. At any rate, the large churches are interested in seeing the smaller ones coming to competence and the possession of homes. And the small churches are equally interested in seeing other congregations take form and, like themselves, secure by the assistance of this helping fund those structures which become life-saving stations for the Kingdom of Heaven.

Let no church forget the offering for Church Extension which begins on the first Sunday in September and continues until all the members have had opportunity to share in it.

Jesus and the Old Testament

Interpreting Jesus' Attitude Toward the Sacred Writings of His Day

By G. N. Stevenson

Having overcome the temptation to fall in line with the current conception of the Messiah, Jesus at once plunged into "the work of his ministry." In doing this he finds at the outset a system of religious thought and worship in many cases at variance with the spirit of his own movement. This system was founded upon the law of Moses, by us usually termed the Old Covenant. Our present study will be to show the attitude assumed by Jesus toward this system of life and worship.

Rights and Ceremonies.

I. We learn that Jesus treated certain rites and ceremonies of the Mosaic law with perfect indifference, while he brushed aside others with a mere wave of the hand.

(1) Circumcision is not even referred to in the positive teaching of Jesus. He seems to ignore it altogether.

(2) The law of sacrifice met with mere courtesy at his hands. He looked upon it as possessing no essential value. It is true that he told the lepers to offer their gifts at the altar, but this merely as an evidence to the people that the healing had taken place, and the one that returned to give Him thanks for the healing that he so joyfully recognized was not, as far as we know, again requested to offer the sacrifice. Luke 17:11-79; Mat. 8:1-4. In assuming this attitude Jesus showed himself in line with the teaching of the great prophets of Israel's spiritual age. Jeremiah 7:21-23; Amos 5:21-27.

(3) Jesus saw no good sense in the practice of fasting as then in vogue among the Jews. When interrogated by them as to his apparent neglect of it, his answer practically was, That in times of mourning nature became the law and compelled fasting; but as a prescribed institution as it then was, he could see no appropriateness in it, nor could he discover any good end that it might serve. Mark 2:19-20; Mat. 6:16-18.

(4) Jesus most decidedly breaks down the distinction between clean and unclean food from a commercial point of view. From a religious point of view he affirms that it makes no difference what a man eats providing it is good, wholesome food. It is what comes out of the heart and not what goes into the mouth that defiles. Even his specially chosen disciples did not at first comprehend this law, and it required a special revelation to convince one of the most spirit-filled preachers of the apostolic brotherhood that all actually clean food is religiously clean. Matt. 15:10-20.

The Sabbath.

(5) Jesus in carrying out his divinely appointed program came in contact with the question of Sabbath observance. On two occasions at least, the matter was brought to his notice, and on both he suffered censure from the Pharisees for what they termed a violation of the Sabbath laws. This violation, however, was one rather of tradition than of Mosaic legislation proper. Nevertheless, Jesus took occasion to teach his lordship of the Sabbath day, pointing out that it was made for man, for the benefit of man, and hence was simply a means to an end. Jesus goes back of all law and indicates that all law, human or divine, has for its object the welfare of man, and that there can be no wrong in removing any law that does not function well. Mark 3:1-6.

(6) To the law of gifts and tithes Jesus gives his sanction when observed under their proper conditions and limitations. Jesus recognizes the religious value of a gift, when the giver is at peace with all men, otherwise a gift as an offering to God is not acceptable. He recognizes also the legitimacy of tithes, and their spiritual value to the offerer, when justice, mercy and truth are the concomitants of the generosity. Matt. 5:23-26; Matt. 23: 23-24.

The Moral Laws.

II. Some of the so-called moral laws of the Old Testament Jesus finds inefficient, defective and sometimes immoral.

(1) The law of divorce as granted by Moses Jesus forbids, and recognizes one legitimate ground of separation, viz., adultery on the part of one of the contracting parties. Mark 10:1-12.

(2) The law of killing Jesus makes more stringent, and lays under the ban of his censure not only the hate of the heart that leads to the rash act, but places such an emotion in the category of spiritual crime. Matt. 5: 21-22.

(3) The law of revenge he repudiates entirely and declares it not only defective, but immoral. Matt. 5:38.

(4) The law of love Jesus makes more comprehensive, and demands that it embrace not only the neighbor, but the enemy also. Matt. 5:43. Jesus taught that it was quite possible to keep the ten commands and yet lack the essential of eternal life. Matt. 10: 17-21.

III. It must not, however, be inferred that Jesus' attitude toward the Old Testament was destructive in its aim and tendency. Jesus looked upon the law of Moses as a divine institution—from God and designed to serve his righteous purposes.

(1) He told the Jews that if they had believed Moses and the prophets they would have had no difficulty in believing him, "for," said he, "they testify of me." John 5:39.

(2) Abraham in the parable told the rich man that his brothers had Moses and the prophets as their teachers, thus implying that these were sufficient to lead them to Christ. Luke 16:29-31.

Jesus and the Prophets.

Jesus in seeking to fulfil his divine mission got his plan and method from the law and the prophets. He searched both for their essential nature and spirit and built upon these. He went back of the ten commandments, and the letter of prophetic utterance to the spirit and motive that called them forth. He discovered the spirit and motives to be wrapped up in the two great commandments, neither of which formed any part of the decalogue, viz., love to God and love to one's neighbor; for upon these two, he declared, hang all the law and the prophets. In other words the object of all law and all prophecy was primarily to generate in man a wholesome love of God, and to lead him as well to love his neighbor as himself. Jesus accepted this as the true objective of his Messianic work and from the beginning of his ministry set his face toward its accomplishment. But to do this he found impossible along the line of the religious customs then existing. It became necessary for him to reinterpret Mosaic law and prophetic utterance upon the basis of the spiritual purpose of the Old Testament legislation. He was compelled to revise the whole Jewish system of religion and the laws upon which it was founded.

DO THE DISCIPLES OCCUPY COMMON GROUND?

It was a disappointing moment in the early efforts of Thomas Campbell when the various religious bodies to whom he addressed the "Declaration and Address" refused to consider his plan of Christian union. It was so clear to him that the only way to union among Protestants lay in faithful adherence to the New Testament as a rule of faith and practice, and it was so manifestly the professed principle of all the churches, that he could see no reason why they should hestitate to confer freely and act conscientiously in conforming their faith and practice to the New Testament model.

Thomas Campbell's Position.

To him it was almost an end of controversy among all protestants to propose the New Testament as a perfect constitution for the worship, discipline, and government of the church, and to agree to be guided alone by the Divine Standard. He declared himself ready to relinquish whatever he had hitherto received as matter of faith or practice, not expressly taught and enjoined in the word of God, and to open up the whole question of required terms of fellowship in a free conference. But he did not find the representatives of the other religious parties of the time so ready to treat the terms of fellowship as an open question. The overture of Campbell and the Christian Association was not merely ignored, but it was openly attacked. The churches were not ready then, even on the basis of a principle of biblical authority which they acknowledged, to subject their faith and practice to criticism and revision.

A hundred years have passed since that first disappointment, and still there is no change in the attitude of the churches toward the overture which the Disciples make to them. Apparently the Disciples believe today just as strongly as Thomas Campbell a hundred years ago in the efficacy and finality of that same plan of union—conformity to the faith and practice of the primitive church, as the essential condition of Christian union and communion. Has there been no change?

The New Condition.

A new condition has arisen since Thomas Campbell's first proposal to the religious world. The first proposal in 1809 was made by (1) a mere society without church organization; (2) in the form of a tentative principle of action; while the proposal which the Disciples are making in 1909 is being made by (1) an organized church or group of churches, (2) in the form of a fixed program of action.

In other words, since 1809 principle has been reduced to practice, an open question has become a settled conclusion, and a voluntary society has become an inviolable church. This makes all the difference in the world with freedom of action and responsiveness to approach, on the part of the Disciples and their religious neighbors. Who can but see that it has increased the difficulties of the Disciples in their study and promotion of Christian union. In their program for the unification of Christendom there is now both the general and the particular—the general appeal to the authority of primitive Christianity, and the particular definition of it in a fixed order of church procedure.

Union More Difficult.

The Disciples are therefore confronted with two problems,—the problem of finding common ground, universal agreement among Protestant Christians in both principles and practices. This has been the interesting history of their principles during the last hundred years, as regards both the principle of Christian unity and of primitive Christianity, that they have steadily grown in favor. Their principles more than ever unite them with the common consciousness of Christendom. But can as much be said for their practices, by which their principles are finally judged?

Desire for Union Universal.

When the Disciples go to other religious bodies and say to them: There ought to be no divisions among the followers of Christ; let us all unite by restoring the Christianity of the primitive church—there is but one response, and that of universal agreement. All now, with few exceptions, believe in Christian union, and in primitive Christianity. Here is common ground. But when the Disciples are asked to define primitive Christianity and they present their church order as their understanding of it, there is immediate difference of opinion. The ground ceases to be common ground; the Disciples are found standing upon it alone.

Principles and Practices.

The thing that separates the Disciples from other religious bodies is no longer their principles, but their definitions and practices. Their principles have come finally to unite them to others, as Thomas Campbell felt they should. And so long as conference and discussion are confined to the principles there is concord and sweet fellowship.

So far as the Declaration and Address discloses his purpose, it was the plan of Thomas Campbell to carry out his scheme of union on the basis of a voluntary society, which should not take sides with any religious party. He says: "The cause that we advocate is not our own peculiar cause, nor the cause of any party, considered as such; it is a common cause, the cause of Christ and our brethren of all the denominations." He saw how futile the effort of the Christian Association to promote peace and unity would be, if it organized itself as a rival sect. He says: "To advocate the cause of unity, while espousing the interests of a party, would appear as absurd as for this country to take part with either of the belligerents in the present awful struggle." In no other way than by preserving an impartial neutrality with respect to all parties did he dream that he could accomplish anything in the interest of peace. Hence he protested against the rumor that he was organizing a new religious party. He says: "Should any affect to say that our coming forward as we have done, in advancing and publishing such things, has a manifest tendency to distract and divide the churches, or to make a new party, we treat it as a confident and groundless assertion."

As Others See Us.

The organized denominational form into which the Disciples have grown is a departure from the original plan of the Declaration and Address and compromises their advocacy of Christian union by placing them as a rival party over against other religious parties. Disavow it as they will, in the eyes of the religious world they are an interested party in any conference on union, and they can not escape suspicion of self-interest. This very fact tends to neutralize their testimony concerning unity in many communities where they compete for members with other churches.

The Disciples have come to this anomalous position by no will of their own. It was forced upon them by their devotion to what seemed to them the truth, but more by the constituted order of the religious world, which is in structure sectarian and forces all religious movements into the same mold.

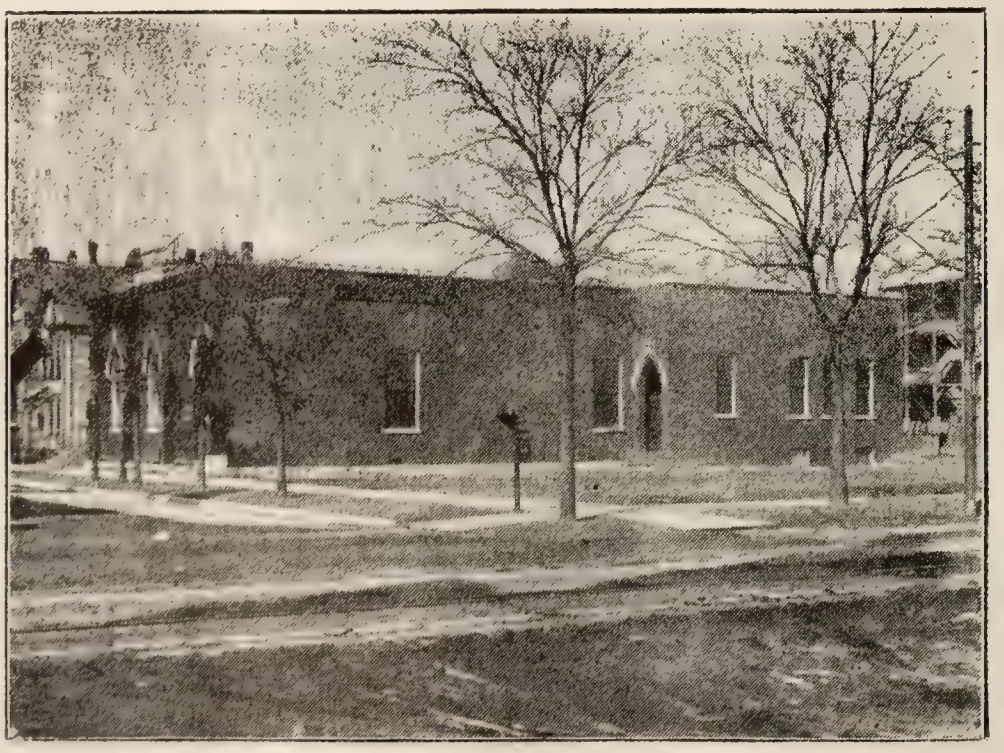
The Disciples have but one defence for their position—to be larger, broader,. and more truly Catholic in spirit than the common denominationalism with which they are confused, and thus by proving their unlikeness to it, entitle themselves to a different classification.

Chicago

A Study of the Conditions of North Side Missions

By Orvis F. Jordan

Those who undertake the task of describing the mission work of the Disciples of Christ in Chicago are likely to yield to one of two tendencies, either that of extreme pessimism, or that of revelling optimism. In undertaking some observations with regard to our mission enterprises, we are desirous of presenting the facts as far as possible, and allowing the reader to judge whether he should be encouraged or discouraged with the presentation. We shall lay bare all of the weakness and failure which have characterized our efforts but we trust we may be able to see also the permanent advance that has been made in the last few years.



In Twenty Years

Twenty years ago we had only four small congregations in Chicago. Now we have twenty-two even after making all deductions of defunct and unrelated enterprises. In that twenty years there was first the period of indiscriminate organization. We went all over the city organizing little groups of Disciples into congregations. Many of these ill-timed enterprises have perished. Their names are hardly remembered by present-day Disciples. Yet out of all this enthusiasm, there resulted some good churches that are now self-supporting as well as some mission points that are each year coming nearer to the time when they can achieve self-support. The present missionary board received such an abundant family of missionary orphans on coming into office that they have confined their efforts for the most part to giving adequate support to the groups already organized. Gary has been opened up and two northwest groups combined into a congregation and given a preacher but the remainder of the money has been expended in giving the other points adequate support.

In order that the brotherhood may know the problems of our missions, we shall in this and the next two numbers present facts with regard to the missionary situation in the different parts of the city. The city board has division committees for the three main divisions of the city, North Side, West Side and South Side and we shall follow this convenient method of division.

On The North Side

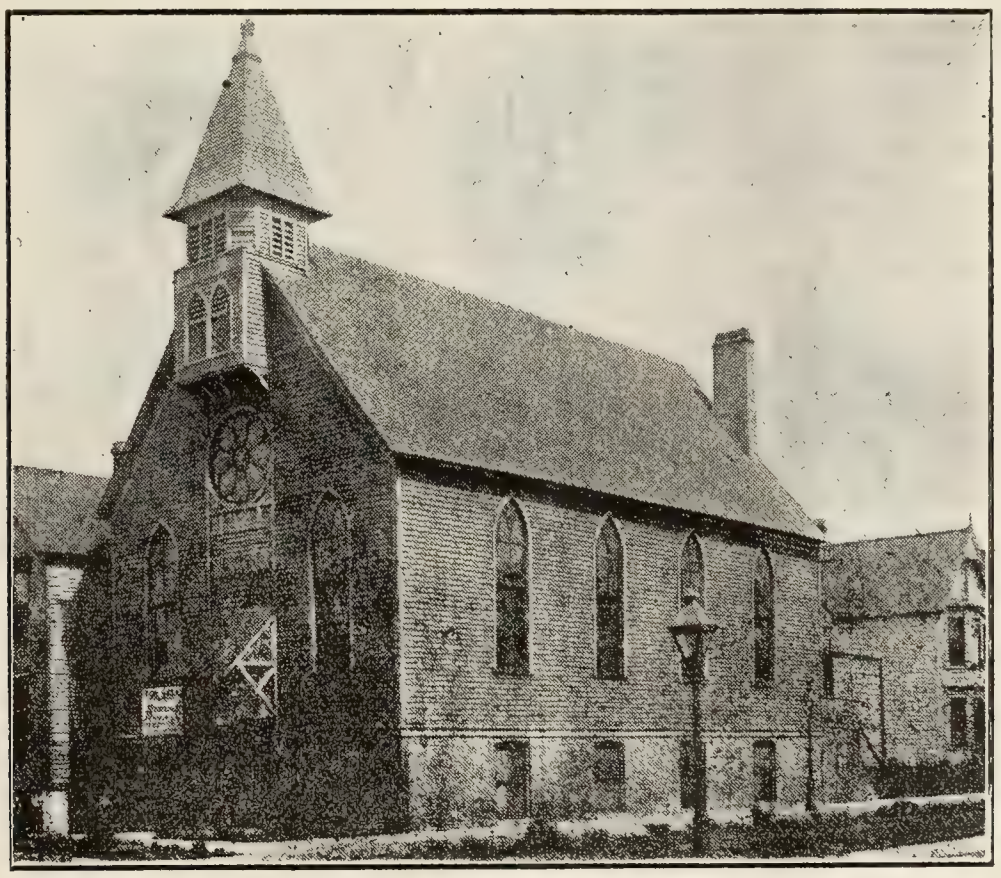
On the North Side, we have two self-supporting churches, Evanston and Irving Park and two mission churches, Sheffield Avenue and Armitage Avenue. With only four of our twenty-two congregations planted on that side of the city most favorable to the work of the Disciples, it will be seen that we have not recognized our opportunities in Chicago. The North Side is pre-eminently the side of the city where the most English-speaking people live. Not that this means that English-speaking people are in a majority here but they are a little less in the minority. On the north shore are the homes of the most prominent citizens of Chicago for the most part. It is a section where the Protestant denominations have planted missions that have grown into self-support in a few years.

The Sheffield Ave. Church.

At the Sheffield Avenue mission, W. F. Shaw is pastor. This was once a strong self-supporting church with several hundred members reported. W. B. Taylor and Bruce Brown have preached here in days gone by.

Two causes have contributed to weaken this congregation until it is now on the missionary pay-roll. First of all, there was a piece of wild-cat finance some years ago. We know little enough of the details and the responsible parties to warrant as in speaking of it. Property was purcheasd at a price in advance of its value. Hard times came and all was lost. With nothing left this brave group bought another piece of property and are now paying off the Church Extension loan. The second cause of their weakness has been the change in the character of the population. Foreigners have moved in and the English-speaking people have moved farther out on the north shore. The success of the Moody church closer to town indicates that a church organized for social service can live even in these foreign sections, but so far our people have not been able to secure equipment for any such enterprise. They are hoping to finish paying off their loan and to become a self-supporting church again in a year or two. To this end the sacrifices of Will F. Shaw will have contributed no small part.

not combine with their simple religious message the message of human brotherhood exemplified by good deeds and ultimately come to hold a great place in this section of the city. We ought to buy this building we are now renting or else erect a new one. The little group over there is made up of thirty or forty wage earners, mostly single young people. They will never be able to build or buy a church property. If the opportunity is grasped, we shall be compelled to do the thing as the Methodists and Presbyterians often do, buy the property and set this group up housekeeping out of debt.



What Other Churches Have Done.

The speed with which new missions have been made self-supporting by other religious bodies on the north side, should be an object lesson to us. Only two years ago, the Methodists had a little mission in a store building at Granville Avenue. Now they have a beautiful church edifice and are self-supporting, all achieved in about three years. The North Shore Congregational church at Wilson Avenue is now six years old. They have a seventy-five thousand dollar church edifice and have the leading congregation in that entire section. Time would fail us to tell of similar enterprises all along this stretch of territory, about twelve miles long. The secret has been to pre-empt a territory in the beginning of a building boom. Secretary Muckley rightly says, "There is no longer any frontier in this country except in our great cities." On the north shore is now the most important frontier of Chicago. The movement will not stop until the city is built solid to Waukegan, at least.

There are splendid locations that are still untaken. In Rogers Park on the west side of the railroad tracks is a population of three thousand with not even a Sunday school. The one church that used to be there has left to build a beautiful church in the stylish section of town leaving the work on the west side undone. In Edgewater, it would be possible to plant a Sunday school on the west side of the street car line over a half mile away from any other and in splendid residence section.

Why Do We Delay?

If it be asked why we do not go into this land and possess it, the answer is simple. Two of our preachers went on foot all over the north shore this spring spying out the land. They reported everything favorable. Nothing was done, for the board could not see funds to carry through an enterprise that would succeed in this section. We are hampered by the lack of funds and by the restriction in their use. Our money is supposed to be spent for preaching. The strong denominations of the city are spending as much as two-thirds of their income for buildings. Their superior rate of growth is evidencing the wisdom of the policy. We are getting ready for the time when we may work on this larger basis and when we can, we have the kind of men that will succeed as well as and better than the men of other religious bodies.

Place Where Armitage Mission Meets.

An Opportunity at Armitage Avenue

In our mission on the northwest side at Armitage Avenue, we have a unique opportunity. We are now renting a building owned by the Norwegian Free church and vacated by them for a more imposing edifice on another street. J. K. Arnot is our preacher. There is not an American church within a mile's radius of thickly settled territory. It is true that the Scandinavian element is strongly entrenched in this section. The children of these immigrants are now young people with poor command of the mother tongue. They are straying off to English-speaking churches to improve their English and complete their denial of everything that is not American. In this same section there are American families who for various reasons live here. The free entertainments that have been given the past year in the Armitage Avenue church have brought out audiences that have practically filled the house. These audiences have not been foreign but have been of such a character as to fill us with hope with regard to the ultimate possibilities of the work. A half mile away is a settlement house run by a lady of Jewish birth. There are certain reasons why this settlement house will probably not become larger than it now is. There is no reason, however, why the Disciples of Christ should

Chicago Church Notes

A number of the Chicago preachers have been to Pentwater where a considerable colony of resorters gather every summer in the two parks run by the St. Louis and the Chicago groups of Disciples.

Will F. Shaw is back from his trip to Toronto and at work again in Sheffield Ave. Church.

October 3 is Chicago Day for city missions. The board is planning an aggressive campaign of education and it is hoped that congregations outside of the city may add the day to the calendar of their missionary interests.

O. F. Jordan exchanged pulpits with E. J. Arnot of Batavia last Sunday. The Batavia church is one of our oldest churches in northern Illinois.

Reservations are being made right along for Hotel Henry and the time is soon coming when no more room will be available. The special train will command good delegations from almost every Chicago church.

Religious Education

INTRODUCTORY STATEMENT.

With this number we add another department to the work of the Christian Century and ask of our readers that it may have a share of their attention from week to week. Certainly no phase of the church work is more worthy of attention than the Sunday-school. No plans that are now forming in the minds of pastors and church workers for the activities of the coming year are more worthy of careful thought than those relating to the Bible School. Here the church touches the life of men and women in the making. Developing lives are brought to it for direction. There is need of skill and wisdom here, as in no other part of the work of the church.

Among the Disciples of Christ, more, perhaps, than with other religious bodies, there has been of recent years a wonderfully increasing enthusiasm in the work of the Bible School. "All the church in the Bible School, and as many more" is a slogan that has in many places come to be a reality during the last two or three years. Church members who had long ago ceased to attend the Sunday-school, have, under the stress that has been placed upon this work. repented of their past sin and returned to the bible class. Bible classes have passed goal after goal in their records of increasing attendance. The eyes of the entire church, and even of the community are upon the Bible School. She has first place in the work of the church.

In this department we shall, however, interest ourselves not so much in questions of attendance and of the management of the school; but rather questions of educational principles and method shall claim our attention. We shall think of the service the school can render to the individual pupil, who has come to it for direction, rather than of ways of securing the attendance of a larger number of pupils. Efficiency in teaching shall be given first place in our discussions. Through this department we shall look upon little Jimmie Brown, who is brought by his mother to the school for the first time, not as one more added to the attendance, nor as a prospective member for the church, but as an immature being to be educated, who has come to us for that service. What a great service! What an opportunity is here presented the Christian worker. The harvest may be delayed, but it is sure, and a hundred fold will be the return.

To this side of their work the churches are giving serious attention today. No one can misunderstand the significance of present movements in this direction. The modern church builds for the Sunday-school, so that each teacher may do her work, undisturbed by the work of the other classes. Some of the wealthier churches are employing men to direct their educational work who have had the training that would fit them for university professorships. Two or three of the leading universities of America have established departments of Religious Education, to prepare pastors and teachers for this special service. Who can doubt that this means that the efforts of the Sunday-school shall increasingly come to be under expert scientific direction?

In the department, "Religious Education," we shall give attention to the discussion of the problems involved in this undertaking. The editor does not propose to do all the talking, but solicits contributions from all who have thought upon the subject and will put what they wish to say in legibly written form, and send it to the office of the Christian Century. There is room here for the discussion of such questions as The Sunday-school curriculum; the graded lessons; the work of the teacher; the methods to be employed in teaching; the music used in the Sunday-school, and a thousand questions which must be answered by the teacher who would "show himself (herself) a workman that needeth not to be ashamed."

We have chosen to call the department "Religious Education," rather than the department of "The Sunday School" or "Bible School," or other names that might have been given it. The argument for this involves the discussion of the fundamental purpose of the Sunday-school, which will be presented next week.

A Letter to the Editor

By J. E. Davis

Dear Editor of the Christian Century: In your article of July 15, on "Revivalism," I feel quite sure some of your statements are partial. At least I beg to call your attention to a few of these statements and permit you to judge whether you are putting a burden on our evangelists that even we pastors cannot bear. I agree with you heartily in disapproving extremely noisy or emotional evangelism. Yet noise nearly always accompanies a crowd, (they cannot move their feet without some shuffle), and what soul could be mightily stirred without some emotion manifesting itself. I wish to quote a few excerpts from your editorial and comment thereon as follows:

> "We found the distinctive power of the revivalist to lie in his possession of the art of controlling a congregation as a whole."

I think this is not only true, but tactful. I am also frank to assert that as much is true of all sensible public speakers, either in or out of the pulpit. Who cares—either lecturer, pastor or evangelist—to have half-hearted listeners, an audience half of which is interested in something else, or a company of neighbors in a service who have come to church to visit. I want control of my congregation, a harmonious service, and an uninterrupted hour. I think the evangelist asks no more. The introduction of a lecturer by a platform manager is for the purpose of attracting the audience to the speaker, and delivering its control to him.

Again you say:

> "But the typical revivalist uses music not as a genuinely spiritual exercise, but as a means of getting the congregation in his control."
> "The typical evangelist does not use the song service as a means of worship, but as a means of manipulating the audience into a suggestible state of mind for the preacher to move. The music, therefore, is a part of the mechanism of hypnotic control."

I do not believe the above suggested characteristic is typical of evangelists. I do not believe it is true of any considerable per cent of them. I believe you do your good judgment an injustice in the above paragraph. On the other hand our revival music is deeply spiritual. As compared with our regular Sunday music in our larger churches, the difference is as great as the mind can well conceive. In a meeting, the congregation does the singing; in a regular service, the paid choir. In the former, it is the voice of the multitude; in the latter, it is the voice of the preferred—the congregation must listen.

These choirs are often dancers, grass-widows, opera-singers, card-players, the ungodly, and I have known even adulterers (not publicly known, however,) to be members of this unnatural thing. Often the only qualification for membership in a choir is a good voice.

Please understand I am not opposed to the choir properly constituted, but choir service in my judgment is not to be compared with congregational singing as a help in real congregational worship. I believe you stir up an unfair prejudice against meetings in charging singers with attempting to secure hypnotic control of audiences. The choir leader belongs to the same classification. Neither of these workers attempts, nor accomplishes hypnotic control. Such is not even thought of.

> "The singer claps his hands, jumps, shouts, jokes, and cracks puns. Often he capriciously changes the rhythm of the song for the sake of producing a certain confusion and stirring up of the feelings. Toward the close of the sermon he sits in a tension waiting for the preacher to pull the trigger when he and his choir let go 'Just as I am' as if it were shot out of a gun.
> "It is an inviolable rule of revivalism that the invitation song must fit to the last word of the sermon, like the crack fits the snapper of the whip."

In rare cases this may be true, some people make altogether unnecessary noises when happy. Some laugh outright; some clap their hands, especially when they approve a speaker; at St. Louis when the Free Baptist brother was speaking some even threw up their hats. However, very few of our evangelists are noisy. Such conduct is a rare exception.

How do you know the singer often capriciously changes the rhythm of the song? Might you not be misjudging his motives, might not the change of rhythm be done expediently, instead of capriciously? Are you sure the change is made to stir up a certain confusion? I have known the change to be made for the purpose of breaking up a stale, irresponsive atmosphere: to set the buttoned-up folks free.

> "There must, therefore, be no interspaces in the service, no waiting, no break down of the tension. And the singing evangelist with his well-trained choir makes this possible."

It is true the evangelist wants no interspaces in his service. But, does anyone else invite such. Suppose after Bro. Willett preaches next Sunday morning, at the conclusion of his sermon he goes to his chair and sits down. After remaining seated three minutes he arises and says "We will now sing a hymn and invite those who desire to take membership, to come forward. Does Bro. Willett or Bro. Morrison make use of interspaces?

Stigmatizing evangelism with premeditated attempted hypnotic control is a grave offense, especially when the type of evangelism cited is a rare exception. Would it not be better to point out specifically the offending ones than to prejudice many people against one of the chief works of the church?

I readily agree with your idea of the pertinence of the inquiry room. Bro. Scoville uses this plan to good effect.

Beatrice, Nebr.

Her Name

Clad in her little blue rompers,
  Dancing and skipping, she goes;
Curls in the wildest of tangles,
  Cheeks like the heart of a rose;
Running and romping and shouting,
  Laughing and all out of breath—
"Tell me your name, little lassie!"
  Quickly she answers, "Just Beth."

Trim in her 'broidered white apron,
  Patiently learning to sew;
Setting the stitches so neatly,
  Each after each, in a row;
Singing in sweet little snatches,
  Softly just under her breath—
"What is your name, little lady?"
  "Now it's Elizabeth."

Aunt Ruth's Fish Stories

FAY STUART.

"Hurrah for Paul Stanley!" shouted that young man as he rushed in from school with a glowing face. "twenty-five words in spelling and every single letter right. Now, Aunt Ruth, you must tell about fish; you know you promised. And please may Roy and Bert Lewis come and hear the story? I told them they might if you didn't care." "Certainly," said Aunt Ruth cordially, "I am glad that I studied up my subject since I am to have such a fine audience. Call the boys and we will go to the library; Lois is arranging the pictures for us." "I told Miss Gray and she said she wished you'd tell me stories every night. And she said I must remember to ask you about the fish that build nests and fly like birds. Don't believe she really meant it, do you, Roy?" "Of course not; fish don't have wings, do they?" laughed Roy scornfully.

"And nests would spoil in the water," added Bert shyly. Said Aunt Ruth, "Turn to the picture of the flying herring, Lois." The boys crowded around the table, eager for an explanation. Aunt Ruth watched them with amused eyes.

"You don't see any wings? Well they are slender fish with light, hollow bones like a bird, and these large, wide-spread fins are as good as wings. There are about twenty kinds of flying fish. The sea hawks and gulls are their enemies and are always watching for them to rise above the water." "Aren't they wonderful!" said Lois, drawing a long breath, "but I don't see how the nests are made. Look at this one down under the pond lilies." "Those are the common sun-fish that you catch in grandpa's pond. The nest looks a great deal like a bird's, but it is not made of the same material. The fish circle around and around until they have made a hollow in the mud; then they line it with bits of twigs. The nest is always in some sheltered spot where it will not be disturbed. The little white fish make pyramids of small pebbles; the sticklebacks make their curious homes by collecting leaves and fastening them together with the gluey substance that fish are provided with for this purpose. When this is done they bring small pebbles to make it stronger. They are regular little carpenters for they have a front and back doorway and a pretty arched roof. The inside is plastered with the glue until it is as smooth as painted walls. But the strangest nest I have read about is that of a little East Indian fish. It is made in basket shape of sticks and leaves glued together and fastened upon a branch that hangs over the water. See, it resembles our humming-bird's nest." "It sounds like a fairy tale, don't it, boys?" cried Paul. "But it isn't," laughed Aunt Ruth, "it is a fish story only it is every word true. What do you think of a fish in Borneo, the black Goby, I think it is called, that can jump and climb upon rocks and trees. They have large heads like the frog-fish, I spoke of last night." "Does a frog-fish look like a frog?" asked Roy. "Its head does; here is the picture of one. See what an ugly little creature he is. We will suppose that he measures two feet; how long do you suppose the head is?" "Six inches," guessed Bert.

"Twelve inches," said Aunt Ruth, "just half of his whole body." "Big head and little wit," laughed Paul. "Ah, but he is witty enough to catch the silly little fish and crabs. He burrows in the mud and waits for his breakfast. Pretty soon he sees a fish; then he moves his feelers which flash like silver in the sun, to attract his attention. Then he opens his big mouth and poor little fishy meets his fate. He is sometimes called the Angler."

"Then there is the toad fish which looks somewhat like a toad and is said to be poisonous. He is also a nest builder. I wonder if you boys know how fish breathe?" "Like anyone else, I suppose," answered Paul. "Oh, no! We use our lungs to breathe the air, but fish have gills instead; they are on each side of the head and the water as it passes through is to them what air is to us. If you lay a fish upon the grass, its gills soon become dry and the poor thing suffocates as surely as you would in an air-tight room. Remember that, boys when you go fishing, and don't treat the poor things cruelly," said Aunt Ruth earnestly.

"Oh, Aunt Ruth!" cried Lois, "here is a fish with a long bill like a bird and just see in this other picture he has made a hole in the boat!" "That is Mr. Sword-fish," explained Aunt Ruth. "We had some for dinner this week. It is a large fish, sometimes nearly twenty feet long. It often attacks boats and pierces them with its sword. It is caught with harpoons, like whales and sharks. Here is a group of the fish we use for food. We cannot talk about them now, but you are familiar with their names—Cod, haddock, halibut, blue-fish, mackerel, perch, trout and salmon. It is interesting to have their photographs, isn't it?" "Is that all?" asked Paul dolefully. "All for tonight, dear." "S'pose we get all our lessons good tomorrow," proposed Roy, "will you tell us about these great whales?" "Yes," agreed Aunt Ruth, "I will upon that condition, but you will have to be very careful for Miss Gray and I are good friends and I shall hold you strictly to your agreement." "All right, we'll work like everything," cried Bert, tossing up his cap.

"Good-night," said Aunt Ruth.

Which to and fro did sway upon a wall:
Our shadow-selves, our influences, may fall
Where we can never be.

Life for the Czar

BY FRED MYRON COLBY.

The clear, cold rays of a January sun were shining upon a little clearing in the woods of northern Russia some more than two hundred years ago. The snow lay white and heavy upon the clearing, and half-covered the topple-down hut or cabin, from whose chimney the smoke was ascending in thin spiral columns. A young lad, not more than fourteen or fifteen, sturdy and strong and ruddy, with a shock of blond hair rippling upon the fur collar of his doublet, was busy making a path through the snow in the direction of the forest.

He had not finished shoveling when the cabin door opened and a woman appeared on the threshold.

"Boris," she screamed," there is no wood for a fire, or at least enough only to cook our dinner. You must get a load before night."

"That I will, mother," answered the boy. "We will not be without fuel, even if we have to cut down the Czar's woods," and he seemed to redouble his exertions with the shovel making the light snow fly over his shoulders till his bearskin cap was as white as the flakes themselves.

Suddenly he paused to listen. There came a cry from the forest, the cry of one in need, and Boris, pausing just long enough to locate the call, rushed into the cabin and seized his heavy ax and started off in the direction of the sound.

The snow was deep and Boris did not make rapid progress, but his steps were hastened by another call for help, this time much more in earnest than the first.

Whoever it was stood in mortal need of assistance Boris realized, and he sprang forward with great strides, hoping to be in time to render aid before it was too late.

"Here! To me, for the Czar's sake, quick!"

Boris heard the cry right in front of him, and leaping around a huge fir tree, whose low-hanging, snowy branches presented a barrier, the boy saw a sight that for a moment held him spellbound.

A man, a stranger, was struggling hand to hand with a huge brown bear, the largest Boris had ever seen. The man, apparently a hunter who had wandered out of his way, was tall and strong, but the bear was taller than he, and was evidently getting the better of him. Inch by inch he was losing ground, and just as Boris halted he fell backward with a groan, and the great beast precipitated himself upon its prostrate foe.

Boris hesitated but an instant. The next he bounded forward and brought his ax down with a powerful blow upon bruin's head. The keen steel, driven with all his force, penetrated the brute's skull, and he toppled over without a struggle and lay dead.

"That was a good Russian blow, my lad," said the man, as he struggled out from under the bear's carcass, and proceeded to wipe the blood from his clothes. "Your ax was more faithful than my spear," and he kicked the broken weapon contemptuously aside.

Boris gazed at the stranger admiringly. He was almost a giant in size, dark and swarthy in complexion and had a pair of the keenest, fiercest eyes that ever lighted the face of mortal man. His clothes were rich,

CHAPTER XII (Continued).

Pierre Becomes Alarmed.

"It is all very clever and wonderfully well done. The animals have been well trained, and they seem to enjoy playing before the public. But where is the little girl that I was told came with the company yesterday?"

Pierre played on, his ears strained to their utmost to catch the answer.

"I don't know; we shall ask the old man when he had finished playing. But I should say she would be a great acquisition to the company. She looked like a perfect fairy riding in a chariot drawn by that goat. And 'pon my word, the animal seemed thoroughly to appreciate the honour conferred on him."

The speakers did not belong to the village folk. Theirs were educated voices, and Pierre longed to turn round and see who they were. He continued playing, however, and waited to hear more.

"I should like to see her," said the first voice. "I did not see the procession come in yesterday."

Who could be the speaker? Pierre could stand it no longer. He must see whether the voice belonged to the man he had been warned about.

With an abrupt movement he swung to one side and gave a cautious glance at the speakers. Neither was known to him, and he breathed afresh. One looked like an English gentleman—a short, fresh-faced, kindly-featured man; the other had a foreign look—an Italian, Pierre thought; for the Frenchman had done some little touring on the Continent, when travelling witn his theatrical company.

The foreign gentleman's voice was heard again. It had the peculiarly melodious sound that Pierre had noticed before.

"I should like to see the child for more reasons than I can reveal at present."

The words were uttered cautiously, and, as Pierre fancied, craftily. Under cover of the music and Jacque's tricks Pierre glanced again at the man, and disliked the face he saw.

"It is not that of one in whom I should like to put any trust," said honest Pierre to himself. "No, I do not like him. His words have created a fear within me. It may be that he is a friend of that other from whom I have promised to guard the child. Assuredly we must leave this place, and that soon, for rather than let him see la pauvre petite enfant I would spirit her away this very day."

No one could have guessed the thoughts that flitted through the brain of the musician as he smiled and nodded his commands to Jacques, who sprang through the treble hoops held so dexterously by Jules, Bebe and Taras, on to the sturdy back of Chicot waiting to receive him.

"The old man is a clever musician," said the Englishman.

"Yes, he is so. Ah! that takes me back to the music of my own country," said the Italian, as Pierre, with cunning thought, suddenly dashed into the strains of Il Trovatore.

"Played with a master hand, by Jove!" said the Englishman. "Why, the fellow is lost playing to a handful of villagers and these animals."

Jacques' tricks were finished. The performance was over; and whilst Taras skipped nimbly round with his tin cup held out appealingly, Pierre's mind was made up. He would take the initiative himself. Before all things he must act—act the part of the old man; and also, he must cease to be French. He felt thankful then, as he had felt thankful ever since Camilla had been entrusted to him, that he had spent so many years of his life on the stage.

Doffing his slouch hat to the two gentlemen and thus displaying his silvery hair, he said mumblingly, but in good English—

"I hope the performance has given you pleasure, gentlemen."

"Your music undoubtedly has, and your animals are well trained," replied the Englishman in a kind voice. "But, man alive, surely your talent could have led you to something better than becoming the master of a small troupe! Why waste such music on a parcel of rustics such as these?"

Pierre shook his head in a weary fashion. "A fair question, sir, a fair question, but it is misfortune, sir, that has landed me—an aged man, not long for this world—in the position you now find me in."

"What about that little girl that travelled with you yesterday?" put in the melodious voice of the Italian.

Pierre looked up through half-closed eyes, bleary eyes they seemed through their half-shut lids. "My grandchild, sir, do you mean?"

"Your grandchild, is she? Why didn't you bring her out here to help in the performance?"

"A fair question, sir, a very fair question, and she has a pretty voice when accompanied by the violin; a pretty voice, sir, a very pretty voice."

His own died away in a mumbling sound as he looked mildly round on the assembly.

"The old fellow's in his dotage," said the Italian. "Look up, old man, and listen to what I say. Why didn't you bring that little girl out this morning?"

"My grandchild, sir? She is better within doors when the cold is on her. A wheezing on the chest, sir, is a dangerous thing. It affects the voice, sir, and she has a pretty voice for singing, a very pretty voice."

"Which is more than you have for talking," returned the other, as Pierre's tones died away again in a mumble. "When will she be able to sing again, eh?"

"In a week from now, sir. In that time I count that she will again be an ornament to the troupe of which I am the master."

"In a week, do you say? Why, that is a long time off. Do you intend to stay in this village a week from now?"

"I had hoped to do so. And the wheezing on the chest, sir, the wheezing on the chest is a dangerous thing for a singing voice, and a very pretty singing voice she has."

Taras had now stopped with his tin cup before the two gentlemen. The Englishman paused with a silver piece between his finger and thumb, and looked first at the monkey and then at the old man. Then, quickly diving his hand again into his pocket he brought out a gold coin.

"This is for luck," he said kindly. "Luck to you, old man, and to your grandchild."

In all sincerity Pierre raised his slouch hat and bowed low and feebly. "My good wishes are yours too, sir," he said politely.

The monkey's eyes gleamed. He knew the difference between silver and gold, 'twixt copper too, for that matter. With a perky jerk of his head, as if he would say, "Now copy your betters," he held out the cup to the Italian.

"You spoil this kind of people, Sinclair," said the Italian half sullenly. "What on earth am I to give now? Silver will not satisfy him."

"Then follow my example and give him gold," said the Englishman laughing. "It won't hurt you, Bartoletti. You're a rich man, and may one day be still richer from the accounts that I now hear of your neice's probable heiress-ship."

"There is many a slip between the cup and the lip," returned Mr. Bartoletti with a grin which showed his long teeth. "Well, here goes," and he spun another gold piece into the tin cup.

"Wish him good luck at the same time, Bartoletti," laughed the Englishman. "I always wish these people the wish of their hearts."

"To the wish of your heart then," said the Italian with a musical laugh, "and may it bring you all the success that you——"

"Deserve," put in Mr. Sinclair with another laugh.

And with that they turned away, Mr. Bartoletti, however, turning round to call out—

"I shall be here in a week's time to see and hear your grandchild."

The slouched hat was doffed off again and the aged figure bowed low, but no one heard the words that Pierre mumbled into his beard except perhaps the monkey, who had sprung upon his shoulder and was patting his cheeks with hairy little fingers.

"In a week's time, my good sir, my grandchild will be many miles away from you."

CHAPTER XIII.

On the Move Again.

"And thou, cherie, didst thou see anything?" asked Pierre.

Camilla was turning out the contents of the tin mug. A little scream of delight escaped her as the two gold coins rolled out.

"Ma foi, it is not often that such come in our way, petite," returned Pierre with a smile at her delight. "Dites donc, was the performance to your liking?"

"It was beautiful," said Camilla; "I saw everything. And Taras was so funny. I laughed aloud when I saw him on Chicot's back. And the landlady laughed too."

"Ah! she was here then?" said Pierre in an anxious tone.

"Yes, all the time. I don't like her," said little Camilla. "She—she is not like your sister, Pierre."

Pierre smiled through his anxiety. "What did she talk about, mon enfant?"

"She wanted to know how long I had been travelling with you, and oh! a lot of other questions: what my name was, and if I had a f—father and a mother living."

"And thou, cherie, what didst thou answer?"

"I kept on clapping my hands and laughing at Taras' tricks, and telling her to look too. I—I hope I wasn't rude," said little Camilla looking sober. But Pierre was too much disturbed to smile, as he occasionally did at her old-fashioned airs. "When she talked of my—father, I said he was—dead, and that I had no one but you. That was right, eh, Pierre?"—anxiously, and with tears in her eyes—"and I did not answer when she asked my name."

"Quite right, mon infant. Thou didst everything quite right. But now, cherie, what wilt thou say when I tell thee that we must leave this place—leave it at once, petite? Wilt thou be much distressed?"

Camilla's large eyes looked wonderingly at him; then she crept closer, and putting her little hand into his whispered—

"Is it because of the landlady?"

"Because of her, and because of other things that happened on the green this morning," returned Pierre.

"Because of those two gentlemen that I saw speaking to you?" asked Camilla with a shrewdness that surprised the Frenchman, "and who, perhaps, gave the gold pieces?"

"You saw them, then? Did they see you?"

"No, I kept behind the curtain all the time, although the landlady wanted me to come right to the window. She said that the short fair gentleman was a Mr. Sinclair, who lives not far from here, and that the dark gentleman was staying with him."

"Ah! she said so, eh?" Pierre's brows were bent in deep thought. He looked up presently. "It will be moonlight tonight, petite. Wouldst thou fear to travel tonight?"

Camilla put her hand into his and looked affectionately into his face. "I will do whatever you wish, Pierre. I'm never afraid to go anywhere with you and our dear doggies. I have no one but you, you know, to care for me," and the child's eyes filled with tears.

"Thou wilt soon have plenty to love thee, cherie. Am I not striving to find them for thee?" was Pierre's reply, as he pressed the little hand with much affection.

That afternoon he spent in making the inquiries necessary regarding Camilla's relations. But no; no one named Falconer lived anywhere near there, and Pierre resolved to stay no longer in a neighbor so fraught with danger towards his charge.

The landlady raised surprised eyebrows at hearing they would leave that evening.

"The collection was not as much as you had hoped, I suppose," she said. "And yet Mr. Sinclair is a very generous gentleman, and I saw him amongst your audience."

"Where is his house—in what direction?" inquired Pierre.

With much volubility the landlady explained, adding, "It would be worth your while to pay him a visit. He might secure you an audience in his own grounds, amongst all the friends he has."

But Pierre, as he turned from her, muttered to himself—

"I might have gone there had it not been for that crafty-faced Italian. As it is, I shall direct my steps as far as possible away from his house."

Late in the afternoon they left the village inn, not in the triumphal way they had entered it but quietly, with all superfluous dress and decorations hidden away in the little box that lay at Camilla's feet in the goat carriage.

The landlady and her daughter stood at the door and watched them going slowly down the road.

"The first turning to the right will lead you straight to Mr. Sinclair's gates," screamed the landlady after him.

Pierre nodded an assent over his shoulder, and the procession plodded on.

When the first turning to the right was reached, Camilla looked doubtfully into Pierre's face as he went steadily forward.

"You are not going there, then?" she inquired softly.

"I greatly fear that it would be a case of the spider and the fly, cherie, were I to take that road," was his answer.

And Camilla, though not understanding him quite, rested content.

When out of sight of the village Pierre's aged gait changed to the brisk walk of a young man. He hurried Chicot up, who responded willingly to the word of command. The dogs pranced on ahead, for restriction was over for them, and the procession proceeded at a quick rate.

They had covered many miles when darkness settled down upon them. But though they had passed several desirable-looking resting places the Frenchman stayed not.

"Allons, mes enfants, allons," he urged, as the animals' steps began to flag perceptibly.

Then the moon rose, quietly, resplendently, helping the weary travellers over further miles of toilsome road. Camilla was fast asleep in her carriage, and Pierre welcomed the knowledge. She was warmly clad with a thick rug thrown over her knees, a last gift from the cheery little Frenchwoman at Deal.

When at length they reached the borders of a wood, Pierre decided to stay and rest his animals. Many and many a night had he and they camped out, but it was the first time they had done so since Camilla had joined their company.

The Frenchman's eyes were full of anxious thought for her as he silently unharnessed Chicot from the carriage and lowered the shafts gently to the ground, so as not to awaken the little sleeper inside. The dogs willingly stretched their weary limbs beside their master, but the tired goat nibbled a few mouthfuls of turf before laying himself down to rest. Taras made himself comfortable within the breast of Pierre's coat, and soon they were all fast asleep.

CHAPTER XIV.

They Meet a Friend.

Some hours of deep sleep had passed when Pierre was suddenly awakened by a loud barking from Jacques. He opened his eyes to find that the dawn had already broken and the sun in the east was lighting up with golden tints the little carriage in which Camilla lay.

Two men with workmen's tools upon their shoulders were standing a few feet away, staring in a half compassionate manner at the camping-out party.

"Hast no wither to go, mister, that you lay yourself down to set the seeds of rheumatiz if they be not sprouted a'ready?" asked the elder of the two.

Pierre rose to his feet stiffly, his old man's look and figure and shaky gait returning to him on the instant.

"Thanks, sir, for your kindly attention," he mumbled, "but the night was warm, and I and my animals were tired with a day's travelling and lay ourselves down here, and knew no more until your presence aroused my dog."

"And a fine dog he be for sure," said the younger man, with an admiring glance at the poodle's massive frame.

A frown crossed Pierre's brow. He had no wish just then to court attention to his troupe, and more especially did he wish that Jacques would retire into the background instead of standing in that threatening attitude with his bristles raised.

"The little lady too, for sure, must be cold and weary with lying all night in the kerridge," continued the elder man.

"My grandchild, sir, my grandchild," was Pierre's abrupt reply.

"My cottage is but a few steps away from here, by the middle larch. There, ye may see it if ye step this way, mister," went on the elder man in a kindly tone. "The missus be up there, and will be right glad to welcome ye and give ye and the little miss a cup of hot tea and a warm by the fire. Just ye say that Josiah Brown sent ye, and ye'll have it in less than a pig's whisper."

The Frenchman was about to give a polite refusal when he found Camilla's eyes wide open, and resting on him with a most eloquent expression.

"Wouldst like it, grandchild," he said softly.

"As you wish, grandfather," answered Camilla in the same tone.

"For my grandchild's sake, then, I accept with thanks," said the Frenchman courteously, raising his slouch hat and bending low.

"Ye're kindly welcome, and the missus will say the same. Good morn to ye and to the little miss." And with that the two men went their way.

"How kind of him! Wasn't it kind?" exclaimed Camilla, turning to Pierre after following the men with her eyes till they were out of sight.

Pierre assented, casting at the same time an uneasy glance in the direction the men had taken. They had carpenters' tools on their backs, and the only house within any distance was the one he was striving to avoid, unless, indeed, they were bound for the same village that Pierre had just left. Was it wise to go to the cottage, or would it be better to travel hurriedly onwards and stop at the next resting place?

But one glance at Camilla's face decided him. Her hands had dropped listlessly on her lap, her face looked pale and sharpened in the glow of the early sun.

"Venez, Chicot," he said suddenly. "Marchez, mes enfants."

The goat was harnessed; the dogs pranced round; Taras issued from his hiding place in the coat, whither he had again fled on hearing the strange voices.

Down through the wood they started, making straight for the middle larch as described by the elder workman. And there, nestled in amongst the forest trees, was a pretty little cottage, ivy-covered, and looking like a veritable abode of bliss.

A comfortable-looking, elderly woman with a pleasant, homely face, was shaking a mat out at the entrance door of the cottage. She stood still, shading her eyes from the sun's rays to gaze curiously at the strange procession approached her gate. As the goat carriage stopped she hurried down the neat pathway, her mat still in her hand.

At sight of her Pierre doffed his hat, and she curtseyed low in return.

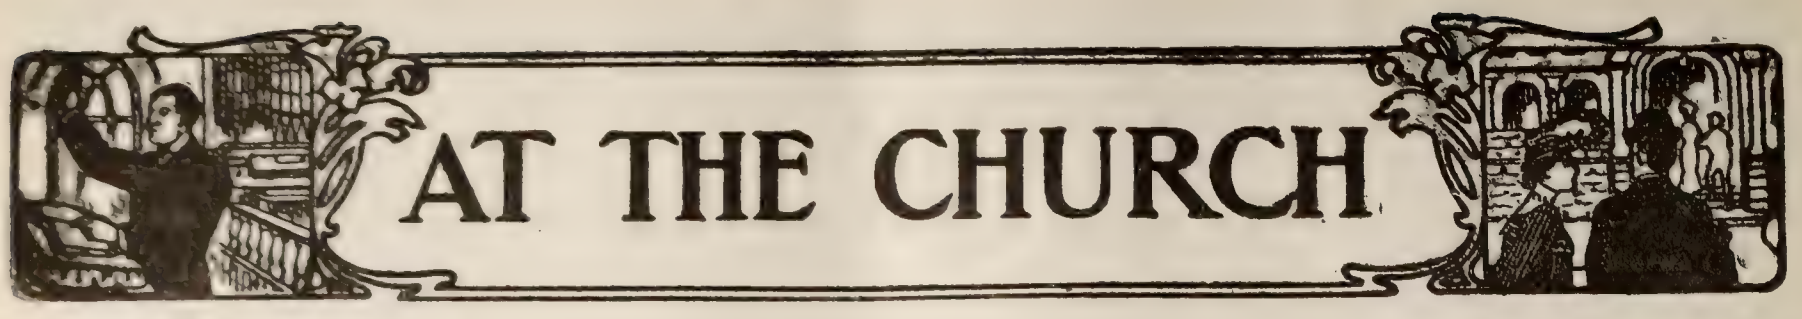
"Can I do anything for you, sir?" she inquired.

"A kindly man, by the name of Josiah Brown———" began Pierre somewhat diffidently, when the woman interrupted him with a smile and another curtsey—

"My husband, sir, and my son."

Pierre raised his hat again. "They were kind enough to suggest our coming to you for a slight rest———"

"Of course," interrupted the woman smiling, "a rest and a cup of tea. Come in, sir, come in, you and the young lady too."



"My grandchild," said Pierre in distinct tones.

"Bless her pretty face! Let me help her to get out of her little kerridge. You are tired, dearie, I can see from the little pale cheeks," touching them with a tender toil-worn hand.

Pierre looked anxiously after Camilla as she was borne away by her new friend. He, too, had noticed the pale cheeks and the slight hollows under the eyes. Did it portend anything serious? His heart misgave him at having made her travel and camp out under the damp night dews.

"What is fitting for me is scarcely fitting for her," he murmured as he unharnessed Chicot and tethered him to a spot where the rich grass grew in abundance.

Sunday School Lesson

LESSON FOR SEPTEMBER 12.

Paul's Third Missionary Journey (Concluded). Closing Scenes. Acts 21:1-7.

Golden Text—The will of the Lord be done.—Acts 21:14.

Outline of the Lesson.

Paul sails from Miletus.
He finds disciples at Tyre.
Their protest and prayerful parting.
Goes on to Cæsarea, where he finds Philip and his family.
Prophecies and warnings against his journey.
A united appeal to him.
He goes on and is welcomed at Jerusalem.

Notes on the Lesson.

1v. And had launched. From Miletus.

2v. Finding a ship sailing. Navigation in those days was largely a matter of wind and weather.

3v. Landed at Tyre. A city with a history. In the Old Testament Tyre is generally an object of prophetic wrath, see Ezek. 26: 14. Jesus came into the coasts of Tyre, Mat. 15:21.

4v. Finding disciples This is the first mention of disciples in Tyre. Who said to Paul, etc. Here we see how apprehensive the disciples were regarding the results of the journey to Jerusalem, and not merely because of human fear, but through the movings of the Spirit. A great crisis was at hand, and the Spirit had not left them in ignorance of it. But if we construe this utterance through the Spirit as a positive command to the apostle not to go, it puts Paul in the position of disobeying the voice of the Spirit. He must therefore have considered it a warning and an expression of solicitude rather than a command. Barnes says, "The meaning is, that he should not go unless he was willing to encounter danger, and the hazard of his life as a consequence, for they foresaw that the journey would be attended by this hazard."

5. With wives and children. A new phrase in the record. They had the Spirit, they loved Paul and they took their wives and children with them. We kneeled down on the shore and prayed. Pathetic and beautiful—the voice of prayer mingling with the voice of many waters beating and booming on the shore. We took ship, and they returned home again. A picture of life, it is full of partings—one goes on the long journey, and another goes back home and looks through tears at the empty place, and listens in vain for a familiar foot-fall.

8v. Caesarea. When Paul came to this city again he was in chains, and for two years he was its prisoner. Philip the evangelist. In the last mention which we have of Philip he was preaching in "all the cities until he came to Cæsarea.'

9v. Which did prophesy. See chap. 2:17. It is to be observed that no mention is made of their prophesying in this case. Perhaps they were wiser than the men who prophesied to Paul in vain.

10v. Agabus. In chap. 11:28 Agabus foretold a famine which came to pass in the days of Claudius Caesar.

11v. Bound his own hands and feet. After the manner of the old prophet, see Jer. 13:4, and Isa. 20:3, 4. Bind the man, etc. He does not command him not to go to Jerusalem. In this instance prophecy meant prediction. The attempt to destroy this meaning does violence to the Scriptures, and not infrequently is part of the opposition to the supernatural.

12v. Besought him not to go. It was the judgment of all the good men around Paul that he ought not to go to Jerusalem.

13v. To die at Jerusalem. All commentators compare this utterance with that of Luther when on his way to the Diet at Worms. Paul was willing to die but the other workmen wanted him to live. His surrender to his sense of duty was absolute.

14v. Would not be persuaded. Paul had a mind of his own, an iron will. Nothing less would have carried him through the awful hardships of his career. We ceased, saying, etc. Why you should go to Jerusalem is more than we can understand, but we leave it to the Lord.

15v. Took up our carriages. They went on foot, which was not as fast as going in an automobile, but safer. The dangers to life in those days were from the wicked devices of men rather than from their ingenious inventions. And went up to Jerulem. One Mnason of Cyprus. A disciple of long standing, who was originally from Cyprus but now had his home in Jerusalem. With whom we should lodge. In such times of opposition it was good to have a hospitable home in which to remain. This was Paul's fifth visit to the city since his conversion.

17v. The brethren. Jerusalem was headquarters, as is seen from the verse which follows the lesson, of these brethren, James seems to have been the leader.

A Glimpse of Rhodes.

Next day the little vessel rounded the promontory of Cypus and sped on for Rhodes, where as they entered the harbor they would admire the proverbial fertility of the sunny island of roses, and gaze with curiosity on the prostrate form of its vast Colossus, of which two legs still stood on their pedestal, though the huge mass of bronze had been hurled down by an earthquake. The monstrous image, one of the wonders of the world, was a figure of the sun; and, with whatever lingering sympathy it may have been regarded by the Gentile converts, St. Paul would perhaps think of Dagon, "when he fell flat and shamed his worshipers," or point to it as a symbol of the coming day when all idols should be abolished at the returning down of the Sun of Righteousness.—Farrar.

The Little Jew Passenger.

To the skipper's eye cargo was the important thing; the little Jew passenger and his company were of small account. How blind we are, and how little we know what is great and what is small! How trivial material interests swell themselves out and loom large! How astonished that sailor would have been if he had been told that his passenger was the most important man in the world at that moment, and that his vessel would be remembered forever because that Jew had trod her deck!—Alexander Maclaren.

Paul's Return to Jerusalem.

The whole of Paul's journey to Jerusalem was punctuated with interrogation marks as to the reason for it. It bristles with the warnings of prophets and the remonstrances of friends. Agabus appeals to him like one of the prophets of old, and his companions plead with tears. The voice of inspiration was not wanting to tell him of trouble, and the voice of love laid siege to his heart. But in spite of all the warnings and protests, the pleadings and tears, and the dire consequences, the apostle went on to Jerusalem.

The reasons for Paul's journey to Jerusalem do not seem as clear as the objections. It resulted in most serious, not to say disastrous, consequences. So far as the records of the Acts go, it put an end to the great missionary journeys. We hear no more of churches founded, of the gospel planted in new cities and distant privinces. Nothing which called out a letter or left a name appears again in the historical record. There are letters, but they are written to churches founded before this journey; and there are great discourses, but they are made before judges, not to the people. Hereafter, with the exception of the little while that he was bound by a vow at Jerusalem, Paul is a man in chains. In the last glimpse given of him in this history, he is a prisoner at Rome. His supposed deliverance, and movements after that, are matters more or less veiled in conjecture, mixed with uncertainty. We do not say that there was no deliverance, and no second captivity. But we do say that this going to Jerusalem puts an end to the marvelous history of great missionary operations which Luke had so faithfully and enthusiastically chronicled.

What he expected to accomplish to outweigh these consequences, he does not state, except to say that he was carrying the contributions of his churches to the poor saints at Jerusalem. But it is not reasonable to suppose that the great apostle put himself in such peril to his missionary career in order to act as the charity agent of his churches. A greater object must be sought, and perhaps it is to be found in the doctrinal controversy which had broken out in the churches. How greatly Paul was disturbed by this controversy we all know; and how intensely he felt at this time is evident from his letter to the Galatians. This letter was written at Corinth shortly before he started to Jerusalem. It is on fire with the passion of a man who feels that everything dear to him in his churches and in his preachinng is at stake. The epistle to the Romans immediately followed that to the Galatians. It is more calm—the second sober thought of a great mind—but none the less intensely earnest, the tremendous utterance of a mighty man moved to the depths of his being.

That the controversy did, to some extent, quiet down after the apostle's imprisonment, seems clear from his own letters. The epistles to the Ephesians and to the Philippians are in another vein, more quiet, something of the calm when the storm is overpast.

Prayer Meeting

By Silas Jones

THE VALUE OF KNOWLEDGE.

Topic, September 8. Prov. 1:1-15; Job 28: 1-28; I. Cor. 2:1-16; Hab. 2:4.

The wise men of Israel set a high value on knowledge. The fool is the butt of their ridicule. He is the opposite of all that a man should be. The wise man, on the other hand, is in the secret counsel of God and is the support and glory of the institutions in which men live in right relations one to another and to God. To them, however, knowledge is something more than accumulation of facts; it is wisdom, insight. Men blunder because they have not the capacity to see the significance of events. This wisdom is not acquired by the study of books or by increasing in other ways the number of facts that can be named at sight. It is given to those who earnestly strive to do the right as they have come to see it. Men of this spirit have need of facts. They are aware that refusal to see the facts is a sin and that ignorant, blundering, sincerity may do a vast amount of harm. When Jesus said, "If any man willeth to do his will, he shall know of the teaching, whether it is of God, or whether I speak of myself," he included the will to know in the will to do.

The Consequences of Actions.

"As an ox to the slaughter" thus the wise man describes the fate of the man who is led into the sin of unchastity. He is a fool. If he had any sense he would not sin. The world abounds in wrecked lives of men and women who did not know they were playing with dangerous toys. Parents do well to trust their sons and daughters but they easily forget how little of some things young people know and how much help is needed by the inexperienced in order that awful mistakes may be avoided. You cannot convince a man that you are his friend unless you deny yourself something for his sake, but have you never found yourself complaining because some one doubted your friendship, although you could not name a single generous deed in behalf of the one of whom you complain? The love of man for woman and of woman for man grows not on tender words but on sacrifice. Nevertheless many who are incapable of making a real sacrifice wonder why they have not the joys of domestic affection. Then there are those who set at naught comfort and the good opinion of many whom they would prefer to have as friends and all for the purpose of gaining an office and they are grieved because they are not held in respect like men who have come to the office through service to the cause for which the office was created.

The Worldly Wise Man and the Formalist.

The knowledge of the worldly wise is superficial. It is exact in reference to the immediate demands of the age. The politician knows how to win the present election. But he is ignorant of the deeper currents of human feeling. He does not know that there is a disinterested patriotism latent in most men. Consequently he is utterly confused when the right sort of appeal is heard by men whom he has been accustomed to drive. The formalist is very wise in the matter of rules. He can do anything that can be done by obedience to a code. He is helpless when ethical insight is required. Jesus imparts ethical insight. He does not teach disrespect for law. He did not break the Sabbath that he might enjoy himself selfishly but that he might help people. The rigid code of his day interfered with his freedom to serve. The formalist does not see how it is possible for a man to break a rule and still retain his respect for law and right. The disciple of Jesus shrinks from lawlessness, but he will not allow the law to destroy his human sympathy. He goes above the law, not below it. A Paul, a Huss, a Savonarola knows when he ought to risk his life in defiance of ancient custom.

Knowledge and Progress.

That there are many evils which need correction is admitted by every man whose eyes are open. There is hardly one of us who cannot accuse the world of having withheld from us something which we ought to have. We have violated the laws of health through ignorance that would not have limited us in a better civilization. We have had instilled into us false notions of personal dignity and of personal rights. But, granting that the world needs improvement, what can we do for its betterment? It is a serious matter to advocate a reform. If people are superstitious, we must be sure that we have a faith that is better for them before we shake the foundation on which they stand. The roots of evil extend far. The attempt to correct a single bad habit brings us face to face with social and individual characteristics which at first seem remote from the habit with which we began. Wide knowledge is needed for the simplest reform.

Christian Endeavor Lesson

By W. D. Endres

SELF-CONTROL IN ALL THINGS.

Topic September 12. I. Cor. 9:25.

In these days the athlete is a familiar character to all young persons. He is the beau ideal in the university, the college, and the high school. He is the embodiment of all that is admirable in physical manhood. His training is a most rigid discipline. The kind of food, the amount, and the time of eating, are all prescribed. The hours for sleep, the time for exercise, the amount, and kind are all regulated. All kinds of dissipation which injure his body—and what ones do not?—are under strict taboo. Verily Paul's words: "Every man that striveth in the games exerciseth self-control in all things," describe him accurately.

Running the Race.

In a striking comparison Paul likens the problem of making a life—a problem especially vital to every serious minded young man and woman—to the running in a race. In this race all may succeed, provided there is the exercise of "self-control in all things." In other words, "self-control" is the essential equipment for success in life. The individual himself is the determining factor in the situation. He is the "monarch of all he surveys"; the architect of his own character, the maker of his own destiny.

The necessity of self-control is apparent in the most elementary functions of life. Eating is necessary to our existence. It restores the wear and tear of the body. It enables growth. It supplies strength and vigor. In a word, it sustains physical life. But poison as food must be rejected. Indeed, wholesome food must not be taken in improper quantities. The glutton destroys his digestion, undermines his health, and blights his life. He needs self-control.

Because we see the unspeakable evils of drink all about us we must not conclude that drinking is essentially bad. The reverse is true, The evil enters when we remove all restraint as to what we shall drink, and how much. Who thinks of condemning another for taking a drink of water when he is thirsty? It is when stimulants, such as alcohol, are taken into the system in such quantities as to break down the tissues of the body, dethrone the reason, and obliterate the moral and spiritual senses that drinking becomes wrong. Drinking to excess, and drinking the wrong kind of stuff, are the things which produce drunkenness in whose wake there is waste and disease, debauchery and crime.

Controlling the Emotions.

We have the same need for self-control when we pass to the realm of the emotions. Anger may be, ought to be, a conserving force in our lives. It may lead us promptly to oppose the unjust encroachments of evil and resist the aggression of those who would otherwise use us for their selfish purposes. But the moment we give it unrestricted sway, fly into a rage, speak falsely and abusively, and even resort to violence and crime, that which before was our help and protection becomes our enemy and the source of our undoing. In this case the master and the servant have exchanged ranks.

The young man or woman who has no self-esteem does not amount to much. They must take themselves seriously before anybody else will do so. Who respects a person who does not have self-respect? But also, who respects an individual who has no respect for others? Whose only pronouns are "I," "me," and "mine"? Who constantly relates his own expriences in which he figures as the hero? Who tells of the words of praise and appreciation which he has received? Who recounts the victories he has scored and the defeats which others have suffered at his hands? Such an individual you may be sure has blind spots for all his own weaknesses. Practically the avenue to larger growth is closed. He becomes a bore to his associates, and he narrows the circle of his influence. Conscious self-control should be his balance wheel.

Finally the whole range of one's possessions and prowess must be controlled with a view to the development of the higher life. It is quite possible for us to be fairly decent sort of folks with little aim in life more than to make expenses, train with the crowd, and have a good time. This is only following the line of least resistance; it is a very common way of killing time. The possession of knowledge, the sense of the Beautiful, the Right, and the True are inherent in the soul and therefore the ultimate ideals of life. For these all other things should become mediating agencies.

My Creed

I would be true, for there are those who trust me;
I would be pure, for there are those who care:
I would be strong, for there is much to suffer:
I would be brave, for there is much to dare:

I would be friend of all—the foe—the friendless:
I would be giving and forget the gift:
I would be humble, for I know my weakness:
I would look up—and laugh—and love and lift.

—Howard Arnold Walter.

The Book World

THE ANTI-SALOON LEAGUE YEAR-BOOK FOR 1909, by Ernest H. Cherrington. An encyclopedia of facts and figures dealing with the liquor traffic and temperance reform. This volume is issued each year by the National Anti-Saloon League. It tells all about the progress and the present status of the temperance reform in the United States. A directory of the Anti-Saloon League is given, the victories won during the past year and years (there are practically no real defeats in the League's record), the status of the reform in all the states, the relation of the reform to education, business, law, crime, medicine, etc. It is a compendium of information and should be in the hands of every preacher, teacher, editor, reformer, and all others who are interested in public questions. (The Anti-Saloon League of America, Columbus, O. 35c paper, 60c cloth.)

THE DEVELOPMENT OF THE STATE, by James Quale Dealy, Ph. D. This book is multum in parvo. It is a book for the student, but one need not be expert to both understand and enjoy it. It traces the development of the state from the earliest social and political institutions and through the differentiations of activities and agencies to modern democracy, in which Prof. Dealy finds that the end is "the development of an energetic, intelligent citizen body and high standards of social life." He finds the spirit of democracy bringing a broad and sympathetic humanitarianism, higher standards of moral life, and a kindlier religion. He believes that national greatness ultimately depends upon the intelligence of the whole body of citizens and that its development depends upon conditions of economic and intellectual life. "Progress comes by purposive modification of such conditions through a governmental policy based on scientific knowledge." As the state voices the collective will and interests of all the citizens, obedience is the fundamental duty of all. Private interests must be subordinated to the general good. It is as much the duty of a citizen to serve his country in office as in war. The book is written with the desire to enlighten citizens as to the nature and rise of government and to inspire them with a sense of duty toward it. (The Silver, Burdette Company.)

MENTAL MEDICINE, by Oliver Huckel, pastor of the Associate Congregational Church, Baltimore. The author of this volume is modest enough to admit that he does not know all about his subject. He talks of matters that have come into his experience and he is not always sure of their meaning. The absence of dogmatism is a pleasing feature of the discussion. We feel that the writer is a fellow learner with us. The book consists of a series of talks delivered before the Young Men's Christian Association of the Johns Hopkins Medical School. The publication of the talks is due to the high value set upon them by this audience. Dr. L. F. Barker of the Medical School, contributes the introduction. It is his belief that ministers and physicians ought to learn to understand one another and cooperate for the relief of suffering. He says that "a large proportion of nervous patients are victims of unhealthy emotional states." These emotional states may require the ministry of religion along with that of science. The subjects discussed are, Mental and Spiritual Factors in the Problems of Health, The Therapeutic Value of Faith and Prayer, Possibilities in the Control of Subconsciousness, Some Elements in Morbid Moods, and The Higher Factors in the Re-education of the Nerves. Those who are perplexed about mental healing and Christian Science will find help in this book. Dr. Huckel knows the value of religion in human life and he understands science well enough not to fall into the vagaries of emotionalism. (Thomas Y. Crowell & Company, New York, June, 1909. $1.00, net.)

THE PEOPLE AT PLAY, by Rollin Lynde Hartt. Here is a book that is as readable as a piece of fiction, full of humor, and saturated with humanity, and yet to the student of sociology a revealing treatise upon one of the commonest but most difficult to analyze of social phenomena. The people treated are those of the multitudes that have little to spend and must perforce seek that which is rollicking and primitive to get enjoyment. The "play" is that of the great city and runs the gamut of that which need not by nature be libidinous, though it all too often and very easily degenerates into that. Mr. Hartt treats the burlesque, the melodrama, the dime museum, the moving picture, the amusement park, baseball, the cheap show, and "society" i. e., the dance hall and the social centers for masses of the tenement dwellers and wage earners in the "downtown."

The author does not cover up the good or bad in his delineation, but does plead for charity of judgment. He would have us see things from the inner life of the pleasure seekers and know what the world is they live in and the minds are that they must appease to be themselves. We cannot apply our ideal to the multitude who live within narrow walls of brick and stone and labor without other aim than enough to eat and wear and an hour to bury the dull monotony when the day's work is done.

The volume is appropriately illustrated and is a genuine contribution to that growing literature that seeks to show to our eyes the humanity that is in the rough but is just as human as we are. (Houghton, Mifflin Company, New York. $1.50.)

THE CALLING OF DAN MATTHEWS, by Harold B. Wright, is an interesting interpretation of the church life of our day. Dan Matthews is a strong, virile man, reared in the wholesome atmosphere of the Ozark mountains; is educated for the ministry and goes from the Theological school directly to the pastorate of the church at Corinth. By his genuine worth and loving service, "Big Dan" wins the love of the people of the community; but his sermons do not ring quite true to the denominational notes, he is uncompromising in his opposition to unrighteousness, both within and without the church. He cannot bow to the pressure that is brought to bear upon him by the ecclesiastical ring, and is at last forced to resign. When he does so he gives up the ministry, as it is conceived by the ecclesiastical man, that he may realize the ideals which led him into the ministry through other channels. The argument of the book is that the church as she exists in many places today is not the embodiment of the ideals of Christianity, and that those ideals can be better served oftimes through other agencies. The conclusion may not be absolutely justified, and yet it cannot be doubted that the author here lays his finger upon a serious weakness in the work of the church today—a weakness that is perfectly apparent to all men who have ever been where they could look upon its life with unprejudiced mind. That it must ever be so the author would hardly contend, but he has rendered a valuable service by pointing out in this popular way this imperfection. The story is told with consummate art. When one has started upon the reading he cannot lay the book aside until he has reached the last line of the last chapter. So sure are the publishers of the success of the book that they have, even as the first edition of 100,000 copies comes from the press, arranged for the printing of a second edition. (The Book Supply Co., Chicago, $1.50.)

THE HEART OF CENTRAL AFRICA, by John M. Springer. This is an account of a journey from Old Umtali in Rhodesia to Lianda in Angola on the west coast. Old Umtali lies something like two hundred miles from the east coast and twice that distance from the mouth of the Zambesi and close to the nineteenth parallel south of the equator. The journey was for 1,500 miles to the north and west through the Tanganyeki country and its rich copper ranges and by way of the lower Congo country to the Portuguese Coast of Angola on the west coast, about the ninth parellel south.

Mr. Springer is a missionary and, with his wife, made this journey to explore the possibility of establishing a line of mission stations across the continent through Rhodesia and Angola, thus connecting the M. E. stations at either end of the journey. He found a country that offered, for the most part, neither climate nor dacial difficulties that are insuperable. Indeed he tells of plateaus where ice froze at night and where there is no fever but all that would prophesy of a white man's country ultimately. The copper country, the heart of which is at the intersection of the eleventh and twenty-sixth parallels of latitude and longitude, he describes as the richest in the world. The Cape to Cairo railroad is now at Broken Hill, within 200 miles of it, another line from Lobita Bay on the west coast is being pushed toward it, and a line is planned from a navigable branch of the Kassai in the Congo Free State, that will connect directly with the great Congo river. Thus here in the heart of subequatorial Africa the intercontinental railways of three nations will meet.

Mr. Springer finds the missionary opportunities such as to make the heart full of missionary passion bleed for both men and means to develop them. The book is very readable, there is a notable lack of bluster over hardships and adventure and an admirable account of the country. (Jennings & Graham, Cincinnati. $1.00.)

PROBLEMS OF TODAY, by Andrew Carnegie. In this volume Mr. Carnegie aims to set forth his views on wealth, labor and socialism. Besides those specific titles he discusses thrift, land, his experience with railroad rebates, and other subjects that bear on the general problems of the time.

Mr. Carnegie has a very readable style, adduces proof as well as gives opinions, and shows a broad spirit and much courage. It is rather surprising to hear the second richest living man plead so strongly for labor and the proper division of wealth. He declares that though salaries and wages have never been so large as today that at the same time the extremes between labor and capital income have never been so great and that never in the history of industry did the worker receive so disproportionately small a share of the total product. He declares "huge fortunes, so far as their owners are concerned, are as useless as the star and garter are to their possessors" and that "only competence is desirable—wealth non-essential—only a sacred trust to be administered for the general good." Socialism he finds to be of worthy aspiration, in that it is an expression of the universal desire for a competence, but thinks it can never be more than theory until men are made differently, and that it is wrong to devote oneself to mere theory while the world so much needs improvement in immediate and practical ways. He favors industrial co-operation and believes the time is coming when the industrious workers of the world will practically absorb the capital invested in the industries they work.

The book is the production of one who looks with philanthropic spirit upon the world from the mount of great riches. The chapter on "My Experience with Railway Rates and Rebates" reveals the apologist for the inequalities of great corporate business, those on labor and wages show the paternalistic philanthropist and lover of his kind, and the whole volume is an able defense of the property system but a plea even more able for its wide distribution. (Doubleday, Page & Company.)

THE STANDARD OF LIVING IN NEW YORK CITY, by Robert Coit Chapin, Ph. D. Here is a book that admirably illustrates the work that is being done by the Russel Sage Foundation. A committee from the New York State Conference of Charities set about investigating the standard of living among the working people of New York City. Dr. Chapin, who is professor of economics at Beloit College, was made secretary of the committee and the Sage Foundation furnished the means for conducting the investigation. Manifestly it would be impossible to investigate every workingman's family in the city, but the effect was reached by making careful selection of average families in each section and among various classes and nationalities and occupations. One little realizes the vastness, the scientific acuteness, the completeness of the undertaking until he goes through the scores of tabulations and studies the carefully drawn conclusions.

In a review no resume of the work that is adequate can be given. The detailed figures for each nationality, classified under the amount of income are given. Complete analytical tables follow showing the amount expended for each of the several articles of living, such as rent, food, clothing, car fare, insurance, etc. Many diagrams are arranged showing graphically the relation of the various expenditures to the rates of income, the housing facilities, and the savings or deficits. One or two items must suffice to show some of the more simple facts set forth.

It was found that the average income per family of five was but $2.70 per day, counting out Sundays and two holidays; that in one-half the families the father's wage was supplemented by income from the work of the children or from keeping boarders; that the average number of rooms per house was but three for a family of five in many cases one of these without light; that but one-sixth of the families enjoyed the luxury of a bath room; and finally that what was found to be adequate housing—four rooms and a bath—could not be maintained under an income of less than $900 per year (the average income was $833 per year).

This is a most valuable book to all students interested in the social problems of the time. It is a valuable contribution to the general information of the public that read newspapers and think at all on the questions of the day. It should be followed by like investigations in all labor centers until the general way of the Standard of Living for the workers of the nation is found. ($2.00, Published by the Charities Publishing Company, of New York.)

Every real thought on every real subject knocks the wind out of somebody or other. As soon as his breath comes back he very probably begins to expend it in hard words. These are the best evidence a man can have that he has said something it was time to say.—Oliver Wendell Holmes.

Life for the Czar

too, with a good deal of barbaric elegance, and Boris made up his mind that he must belong at court, for he had heard that the Czar was at Archangel for a few weeks' hunting. This surely must be one of his great lords.

"Well, you see, I am good for another bear fight yet, my lad, though may I have a surer spear staff next time I meet one. You saved my life, boy, and now how shall Alexis Pertrushke pay you? Come and see me tomorrow morning at the Czar s palace at Archangel, and I will see what can be done for you."

"Very well, baron gentleman, if you will show me the Czar I think I will come," said Boris. "But come in now and have some breakfast."

Before the stranger had time to accept or refuse the invitation they were subjected to a sudden interruption. There were shouts and bugle calls, and a party of horsemen rode into the clearing, trampling down the snow and gathering around the stranger, who stood regarding them with a curious smile on his grim lips. Boris noticed that each horseman, as he halted, pulled off his cap and sat bareheaded in the presence of the tall hunter, so he naturally lifted his and kept it in his hand.

"Well, my young bear-killer," cried the stranger, turning from the crowding horsemen to the wondering boy, "you need not wait till tomorrow, either to come to Archangel or to see the Czar."

The boy dropped suddenly upon his knees in the snow. "I knew you were a great man, and now I know you must be Czar Peter, himself," he said, "but I cannot go to Archangel today."

"Because I have to cut some wood for my mother," answered Boris.

"Is that all?" said Peter. "That need not keep you," and he ordered the horsemen all to dismount and help Boris collect his woodpile and prepare it for the fire. The bear, too, was brought in and skinned, and his haunches made a goodly dinner for the widow and her visitors.

After a hearty meal the Czar gave the widow a purse of gold "and now, my good woman," said he, "I am going to take your son to court and make a man of him. Some day Russia will be proud of Boris, the bear-killer."

And Czar Peter kept his word, as history shows, for Boris held the Czar's favor all his life and helped all through his wonderful career. Many of the noble families of Russia have in their veins today the blood of the brave young Boris Goulousky, who risked his life for great Czar Peter.

Church Life

Church Extension offering September 5.

J. D. Powell assumes charge of the work at Huntsville, Mo.

The Illinois state convention is in session at Eureka this week.

The Christian Century will give a full report of the Illinois convention next week.

W. B. Clemmer has spent the month of August at Pentwater, Michigan.

A very attractive year book has been issued by the church at Hiawatha, Kansas.

G. J. Chapman, formerly of Canada, has been called to the church at Auburn, Neb.

L. H. Bush was the preacher at the First Church, Warren, Ohio, July 29.

E. B. Widger has closed his pastorate with the church at Jefferson City, Mo.

Thomas M. Myers, of Kansas City, Mo., is the new pastor of the church at Princeton, Mo.

A new building to cost about $12,000.00 is to be erected by the Colorado Christian Home in Denver.

The seven hundred dollar mark was passed by the Central Church, Syracuse, N. Y., in their missionary offerings of the past year.

L. H. Otto, pastor of the church at Ottumwa, Ia., spent his vacation at Columbia, Mo.

Granville Snell has notified the church at Mound City, Mo., that he will close his pastorate there after ninety days.

J. Will Walters, Sullivan, Ill., has time for a three weeks' meeting immediately following the National Convention.

Nearly all the available rooms at the Hotel Henry, Pittsburg, have been engaged. Those still desiring room should address O. F. Jordan.

There have been twenty-nine additions to the church in the meeting being held at Vermillion, Kansas, by Edward Cluther, evangelist.

The church at Marcus, Ill., has extended a call to G. H. Stansberry to become their pastor. He has not announced his acceptance.

James N. Crutcher writes that he is delighted with the prospects of the work at Sioux City, Ia., where he has been at work about two months.

The Iowa Southeast District Convention meets at Delta, September 7 and 8. The Southwest District meets at Clarinda, August 31; and the Northwest District at Cherokee August 23.

The church at Louisburg, Kansas, is without a pastor. This church is located in a town of about fifteen hundred people, and is on the Paola branch of the M., K. & T. R. R.

The church at Bloomfield, Iowa, is to have a special meeting in November. They will have the help of an evangelist and singer. F. D. Ferrall is doing faithful work as pastor. Ferrall does that all the time.

B. S. Denny, Iowa's Corresponding Secretary, has been spending his vacation on a farm in Missouri. He writes as if he were not quite immune to the call of the field and the meadow.

Miss Ellen C. Smith, who has been assistant pastor of the church at Columbia, Mo., it is announced, will soon become Mrs. Elmer J. Allen, and will accompany her husband to the mission field.

Charles C. Morrison, Editor of the Christian Century, who has been staying close by his work all summer, has put off for Pentwater for a week or two of rest before the opening of the work of the fall.

H. H. Harmon, pastor of the First Church, Lincoln, Nebraska, was this season manager of the chautauqua at Fullerton, where he also delivered two lectures and gave several Bible addresses.

It will not pay to postpone the offering for church extension. Take it next Sunday, and forward it to G. W. Muckley. Make it a Centennial offering worthy of the strength of your church.

J. P. Givens closed his pastorate at Rossville, Ill., August 29, and began at Lexington September 5. He leaves Rossville reluctantly. It is a good church, has some splendid people. A pastor has been called.

The church at Lanark, Ill., will hold a meeting the latter part of November. A. I. Martin, the minister, will preach. Charles E. McVay, of Hardy, Nebraska, will be song leader and soloist.

The Oklahoma convention meets with the church at Chickasha, September 6-19. This is the second largest church in the state. Preparations have been made for a great convention.

Mr. and Mrs. W. J. Lhamon, were given a farewell reception by the people of Columbia, Mo., on the occasion of their removal to Des Moines, Ia., where they will make their future home. Mr. Lhamon will give his attention to evangelistic and chautauqua work.

W. B. Phillips has been supplying the pulpit of the West Side Church, Dayton, Ohio. Now comes the call from the church to remain with them as their permanent pastor. After such an acquaintance, both preacher and people may hope for that very desirable result a pastorate that extends over a very much longer period of years than is common.

J. K. Ballou, of Colusa, Cal., has been enjoying his first vacation for several years. He has visited the exposition at Seattle, and attended the convention of Northern California at Santa Cruz, and the Southern California convention at Long Beach, and will remain a week or two in San Francisco.

C. H. Morris, pastor at Marshalltown, Iowa, is spending his vacation in the lake district of Northern Minnesota. While the pastor is away work is progressing on the new building at home. The foundation is complete and the material on the ground for the superstructure. The Marshalltown church expects to send a delegation to the Pittsburg convention.

Royal L. Handley supplied the pulpit of the church at Gurnee, Ill., August 15. Mr. Handley has accomplished a commendable work with the church at Waukegan, Ill., during the past year. It has been a difficult task because of trouble which started three or four years ago, but which, under Mr. Handley's careful leadership, has been about overcome.

Austin P. Finley, late of Worcester, Mass., has accepted a call to the Bible Professorship in Drury College and will begin his work with the fall term. This is a great opportunity for the Disciples of Christ in South Missouri and Northern Arkansas, and young men preparing for the ministry should consider the opportunities offered at Drury College.

We have the following report of the Seventh Street Church, Indianapolis, of which Clay Trusty is pastor: "Thirty added since April 1. Thirteen confessions. A healthy growth in the work in general. The Sunday-school has been re-graded and reorganized. Three adult Bible classed organized, and a training class to start September 4. A delegation of twelve or fourteen will go to Pittsburgh.

There was no service in the First Church, Lincoln, Nebraska, Sunday, August 15, on account of the meeting of the state convention at Bethany Park. It was expected that nearly all of the members would be at the convention and those who could not attend the greater meetings of the convention were invited to worship at the Baptist church, which has been holding union Sunday evening meetings with the Christian church.

We are glad to publish the request of O. E. Tombs, pastor of the Church of Christ, South University avenue, Ann Arbor, Michigan, that parents and friends who know of young people who will attend the state university at Ann Arbor this year send the address to Mr. Tombs. Students who are members of the church should bring their letters with them and enter at once into the life and work of the church.

The churches of Chicago are preparing to co-operate with the Anti-Saloon League and other temperance forces in a great temperance parade to be held in the streets of Chicago, September 25. A similar parade was held last year, and served to impress the city with the power of the temperance forces. The showing this year will, it is believed, far surpass that of last year. The committees having the work in charge are urging the pastors to bring this matter before their churches at once.

We are in receipt of the Prospectus of the Centennial Convention. It is a beautiful piece of work, for which W. R. Warren and his helpers deserve great credit. The booklet is full of information about the convention city, and should be in the hands of every member of the church who expects to go to Pittsburg. Copies will be sent free to those who apply to the chairman of the Publicity Committee, J. A. Jayne. You should read his weekly letters in The Christian Century.

The church at Columbia, Mo., has responded heartily to the appeal of the Bible College in its effort to meet the proposition of R. A. Long that if the school will raise $50,000, he will give another $50,000.00. The offering from the Columbia church was over three thousand dollars. This is a fine example for other churches of the state, who should attend to this matter at once, for Mr. Long's proposition holds good only until October 1.

L. O. Lehman has done successful work at Gibson City during the last year. The plan adopted for raising the missionary offering is especially commendable. The pastor and the official board determined some months in advance just what amount the church should raise for the various missionary enterprises of the church. The total sum was $600. For a month before time for the offering the pastor gave his entire attention to preparation for this event. When the offering was taken it amounted to $725, thus surpassing the goal by $125. To plan the work, and then work the plan, succeeds in the church as elsewhere.

The following standard of excellence for workers in the elementary department of the Sunday-school, adopted by the workers of the First Church, Warren, Ohio, should mean progress during the coming year:

1. A Cradle Roll, and the pupils under thirteen divided into three departments: Beginners (3-5); Primary (6-8); Juniors (9-12 inclusive).

2. A separate room or curtains or screens for each of the three departments.

3. A blackboard in use in each of the three departments.

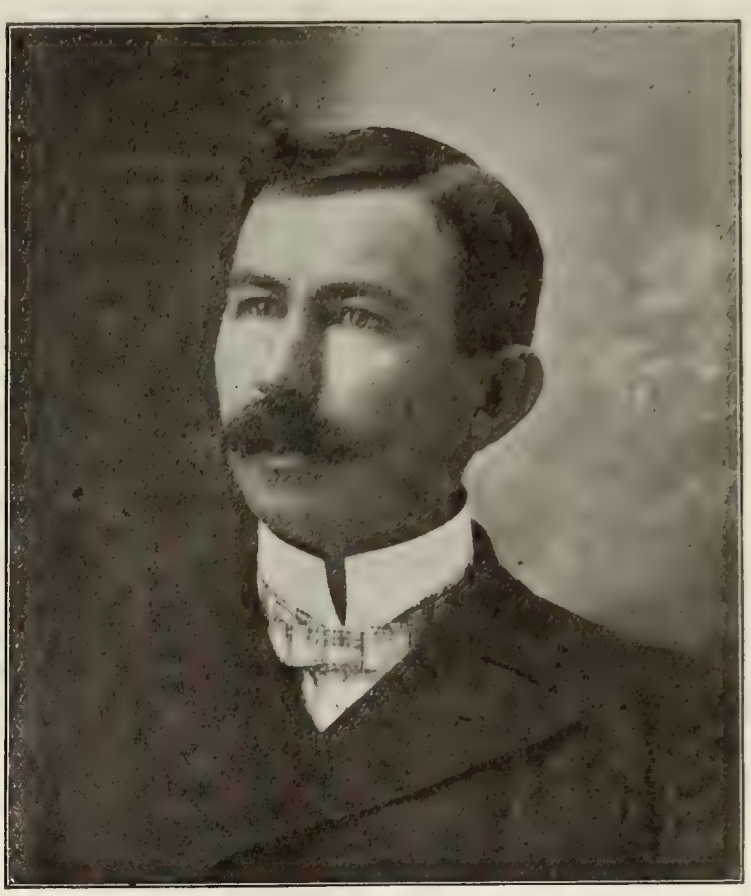
4. Supplemental Lessons, or Graded Lessons, taught in each department.

5. Beginners Lessons taught to children under six.

6. Each teacher studying a Training Course or a member of a Reading circle.

Chas. Reign Scolville spoke at Metropolitan Church, Chicago, July 11 and 18. Conducted Defiance County, Ohio, yearly meeting at Firmer July 25. Spoke at Pontiac, Ill., Chautauqua August 1; Charleston, Ill., Chautauqua, August 8; Zionsville, Ind., Chautauqua, August 15. Just starting meeting at Franklin, Ind., for the Churches of Christ in Johnson county. Forty added yesterday, seventy-four in the first three days of invitation. We have the finest and best lighted tabernacle we have ever had. People stood in every available place last night—fully five hundred were turned away. Report of churches co-operating next week.—Charles Reign Scoville.

Tahlequali, Okla.



Tahlequali, Okla, August 12, 1909.—Closed here last night. Organized with sixty-eight; confessions, seventeen. From other churches, eight. Others former members. Work will grow. Have some time not yet taken after October.—R. E. Rosenstein, C. W. B. M. Evangelist, Edmond, Okla.

The Annual Offering

And now comes the Annual Offering beginning Sunday, September 5. This is the last of the Centennial Offerings. Let us make it the best that has ever been given to Church Extension. Never more than 1,700 congregations have ever had fellowship in the Annual Offering for Church Extension. Order supplies at once, and LET US MAKE IT UNANIMOUS THIS YEAR. For information write G. W. Muckley, Cor. Sec., 500 Water Works Bldg., Kansas City, Mo.

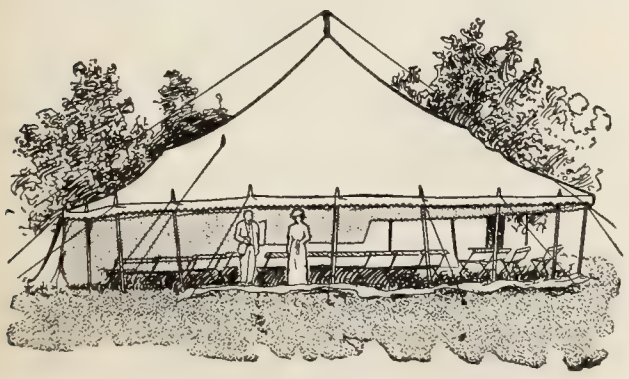
The Hub of the Empire State

This is the season of the year when such a let-down is experienced all along the line in our church work. Most of the members who can afford to go get away somewhere on their vacations, ministers included, while of the number who remain at home, only the true and tried support the services. One of the weakest aspects of Protestantism is the increasing tendency to capitulate in the presence of the summer problem.

J. Fred Jones.
Secretary of the Illinois Christian Missionary Society, Meeting in Eureka This Week.

Though central New York is one of the most delightful places to summer in, the lakes and mountains making it a haven for thousands of tourists from all parts of the country, yet peculiarly enough here is felt most keenly the effect of the summer. The struggle to maintain a satisfactory work seems to be one of increasing difficulty. While few, if any, of our congregations dispense with the regular services, most of them run under "a half head of steam." It is the breathing spell following the state convention in which opportunity is afforded for planning the activities for another winter's work.

The state convention left a problem on the hands of the State Board in the Elmira Church affair. This is the congregation which lost its fine new building through the inability of the members to meet the obligation of the mortgage, in consequence of which the holders of the paper foreclosed. For the past few months the members have been meeting in the church building, renting it from month to month. It is one of the best pieces of property our brethren have in the state, being centrally located and having a modern building. An appeal made to the Board of Church Extension for help by the convention was partly successful, it having voted to help to the extent of $7,000. The State Board has also voted to help secure a minister, signifying its willingness to defray a large part of his salary. The whole matter is now in the hands of the local congregation, where final action rests. With a membership of 300 this church ought to come out of the affray even stronger for the experience.



The contract for a new building of re-enforced concrete, to cost about $12,000, for the Second Church, Syracuse, has just been signed. It is to be finished by December 1, and will be a most complete workshop for

A Failure to Appreciate God's House

HAGGAI 1:1-11

"Is it time for you, O ye, to dwell in your ceiled houses, and this house lie waste?" Thus, Haggai, the prophet, spoke to the governor of Juda, who had the care of the Lord's people. In II Samuel, seventh chapter, it is recorded how David felt. His discontent is expressed thus: "Lo, now I dwell in a house of cedar, but the ark of the Lord dwelleth within curtains." Expressing his discontent to have anything better for himself than he was willing to provide for the Lord and His Work. In Psalm 132:3-5 David again speaks out of solid conviction and conversion. He had been neglecting the ark of the covenant which contained the presence and power of God in the midst of the people, just as our unhoused congregations do today. If, on Saturday night, before the first Sunday of September, which is the one Offering Day of the year for our Extension Fund, every disciple of our Lord should say as David did, "I will not sleep until I do my part to increase that fund which gives homes to our struggling missions," there would soon be houses for every new congregation born into the great brotherhood of churches. A failure to appreciate the need of houses for our homeless bands ought to breed discontent like unto that in David's heart.

Worshipping in a Tent is not Permanent

With some help from Church Extension we can soon be in a good church home.

In Haggai, sixth verse, we see the cause of so much leanness and lack of prosperity among some of our older churches. They eat and drink but are not filled. They do not prosper and wonder why. They earn wages and put them into bags with holes. The congregation has no sustaining power. They have not the growth and peace that passeth knowledge. They do not give off of their strength. That is the trouble. So let us all give liberally on Church Extension Offering Day, and we shall prosper under God.

this thriving young congregation. This organization of only five years standing has made the best record of any mission in the state for the past two years under the excellent leadership of C. R. Stauffer.

Kensington Church, Buffalo, the Centennial mission of the New York Christian Missionary Society and the living link of the State Bible Schools, has purchased a new lot and will build shortly. It is one of the growing suburbs of Buffalo and gives promise of an important link in our chain of Buffalo churches.

President-elect Arthur Braden and Field Secretary L. C. McPherson of Keuka College, have been conducting a vigorous summer campaign for students for the college and as a result secured thirty new students in less than four weeks. Many of these are out of the larger cities of the state. It is the aim of the committee in charge to secure at least fifty new students in this manner. The new college year promises to be the very best in the institution's history.

B. S. Ferrall is spending his vacation at Angola, Ind.; R. H. Miller in central New York; C. R. Stauffer among relatives in Illinois; H. H. Cushing in a summer camp along the Black River in northern New York: W. L. Fisher in Missouri; C. J. Armstrong in Kentucky. A number of our preachers are not taking any vacations this year.

The official delegate of the New York Christian Missionary Society to the Pittsburg convention will be B. S. Ferrall of Buffalo.

As state superintendent of Bible-schools I am conducting a series of Bible-school institutes among the schools of the state as opportunity affords. Last week I visited the thriving church at Harrisville in northern New York. Our own school here in Syracuse has had the largest summer attendance in its history, and we enter the fall with a strong organization.

Notes From the Foreign Society

John Lord reports ten baptisms at Vigan, Philippine Islands.

Last week the Foreign Society received $1,667.82 from the estate of the late Mrs. C. F. W. Haskins, Petersburg, Va.

Last week a friend in Virginia sent a direct gift of $500 to help out the fund for the two Bible colleges, one at Vigan, Philippine Islands, and the other at Bolenge, Africa.

A good man in Indiana, who has lived more than three score and ten years, has just given the Foreign Society $1,000 on the Annuity Plan. He expects to give another $1,000 in February next.

Last week a friend in Kentucky sent the Foreign Society a direct gift of $500. This is the second gift of $500 from this good friend this year. There have been more gifts of $500 this year than ever before.

Leslie Wolfe reports eighteen baptisms in Manila during the month of June, and 228 during the first half of 1909. We can take the Philippine Islands for our Lord if we will.

The Foreign Society is anxious to find a medical missionary under thirty years of age to take the place of Dr. Z. S. Loftis, who recently died at Batang, border of Tibet. The Vine street church, Nashville, Tenn., P. Y. Pendleton, stands ready to support him.

The receipts of the Foreign Society for the first twenty-four days of August amounted to $26,428, a gain of $13,933, or more than double the corresponding twenty-four days of 1908. This brings the total receipts up to $259,660, and the total gain to $58,047.

Bruce L. Kershner dedicated the new chapel at Baliwag, May 10, the fifth chapel finished and set apart to the Lord's work during the last five months. Leslie Wolfe says that they are keeping up the rate of one new chapel a month. This is a marvelous growth for Manilla, Philippine Islands.

A medical missionary is greatly needed for Africa. He should be not exceeding thirty years of age. He ought to be a man well equipped with the medical science and with a passion to win dark Africa to Christ. He must know the gospel and be delighted to tell the gospel story to the perishing millions.

Church Extension Notes

The Church Extension Offering begins next Sunday, September 5. The board confidently looks for its greatest offering this fall. The number of orders for supplies is unprecedented. This is our best indication for a good centennial offering. Let us make it unanimous. Use the best Sunday locally for your offering. The preachers are sensible, and we can look for them to use the best Sunday.

The past week we have received an annuity gift of $1,000 from Sister Elvira Mercer of Bowling Green, Ohio, on the annuity plan. Also, $1,334.49 from the estate of Mrs. Haskin of Petersburg, Va. We start into our offering with a gain of over $15,000 over last year at the same date. We must do everything possible to approach the million dollar mark by October 11.

The Sunday-schools and Endeavor Societies are asked to join in this Centennial Offering. This the board has a right to expect. All the Sunday-school offerings will go into the Sunday-school Named Fund. The Sunday-schools are asked to give one regular Sunday morning's offering in September. The Endeavor Society gifts will go into the Christian Endeavor Named Fund. Let all offerings be promptly sent to G. W. Muckley, corresponding secretary, 500 Water Works Building, Kansas City, Mo.

Kansas and Church Extension

The state of Kansas has been passing through a church-building period and there are now a score of churches in course of erection or enlargement. The growth of the congregations requires larger auditoriums and it ought also to impart the consciousness of larger responsibility for the common good. The state of Kansas has received from the church Extension Society three times as much as it has placed in its treasury. State pride and state prosperity should lead us to reverse this record and help others to the extent we have been helped. Church Extension Day, the first Sunday in September, should receive the attention of all Kansas churches. It will help even those churches that are building to make an offering to the general building fund.

The Centennial Offering to Church Extension

Since the beginning of Church Extension in 1889, Indiana has contributed $44,611.65; received forty-six loans aggregating $68,350; returning twenty-six loans aggregating $27,300; leaving unpaid twenty loans aggregating $41,050; or nearly as much unpaid as all the churches in the state have contributed in the whole twenty years of Church Extension work.

Not one of the forty-six churches thus helped would have been in existence today but for these Church Extension loans. These are the simple "facts in a nut-shell." This is about an average for other states.

A newly organized church with no place to meet, is a stillborn babe—dead from the beginning. A shelterless church—old or young—is a dying church; while a decently housed church will live, and win.

Now what are we to do? Build houses to shelter our unsheltered flocks, or drop all Home and State Missionary work? The latter would be a crime. The only alternative then, is for every church—and every preacher see that the church does it—to take a Centennial Church Extension offering, that will put under roof every unhoused congregation in the land, and provide for those yet to be organized. Brethren let's do it.

T. J. Legg.

Kentucky and Church Extension

The time for the annual offering of the Board of Church Extension draws near. It is a matter of interest to us as relates to the needs of our own state. During the existence of Church Extension Board twenty-four houses of worship have been made possible by the help given. Doubtless many of these would never have been built but for the timely aid given. We have contributed during the history of this work $63,212.16 and the Board has loaned to these twenty-four churches $15,665. Of this amount the churches have paid back to the Board $8,925. Last year only forty-nine churches gave anything; the year before fifty-four congregations contributed. Brethren of Kentucky, that is not a creditable showing for us. Only about one-twentieth of the churches gave anything. This ought not so to be. Let us double the number of contributing churches on September 5, and then we need not be proud of ourselves. Large numbers of houses are yet to be built in Kentucky that will need imperatively the help of the Board of Church Extension. For the sake of our state, as well as the work in every part of our country, let us make a long stride forward in supporting this work.

Brethren Must Act Quickly

Only a few weeks remain for closing the Bethany Centennial Endowment Fund. It is now probable that at least $125,000 will be raised, $100,000 by the brethren generally, and $25,000 by my friend who has offered to give $25,000 for every $100,000 raised by the whole brotherhood. It is greatly to be regretted that $400,000 should not be raised by the brotherhood, so as to secure $500,000 for the college, but if we get $125,000 to add to the $160,000 already secured, Bethany will be fairly well equipped for future service. But we must raise at least $30,000 within the next month, or before the first day of October, or the whole effort will fail. This would be a lasting shame, and it must not be. I firmly believe the brethren will not allow it. Undoubtedly many have delayed sending their subscriptions simply because they have put the matter off from time to time, thinking they would do so before the Centennial, but they must do so before October 1, as that is the extreme limit of the proposition of my friend. Now without any further delay, I hope that there will be a regular whirlwind canvass from this time until October 1. Subscriptions may be sent,

FROM THE BENCH
A Judge Commends Pure Food.

A Judge of a Colorado Court said: "Nearly one year ago I began the use of Grape-Nuts as a food. Constant confinement indoors and the monotonous grind of office duties had so weakened and impaired my mental powers that I felt the imperative need of something which neither doctors nor food specialists seemed able to supply.

"A week's use of Grape-Nuts twice each day convinced me that some unusual and marvelous virtue was contained therein. My mental vigor returned with astonishing rapidity; brain weariness (from which I had constantly suffered) quickly disappeared; clearness of thought and intellectual health and activity, which I had never previously known, were to me the plain results of a few months use of this food.

"Unhesitatingly I commend Grape-Nuts as the most remarkable food preparation which science has ever produced so far as my knowledge and experience extends."

The judge is right. Grape-Nuts food is a certain and remarkable brain builder and can be relied upon. "There's a Reason."

Enroute to Africa

By Royal J. Dye.

The contract price of the builders calls for the bare boat with its machinery, engines and every equipment necessary, for its running. It being thought, by the Field Committee at Bolenge, best to fit the cabins and the other general and special equipment in private "memorials." The noble churches of the little Brotherhood of Oregon have pledged practically four-fifths of the entire cost of the steamer's building. There remains the fitting of special rooms. Already friends of Des Moines have signified as a "Nellie Jaggard" Circle their desire to memorialise a cabin for their circle. They are raising money for it now. Equipment for the kitchen and dining room, linen, dishes cutlery and the numberless things for housekeeping. (For you understand that the steamer will carry passengers, your missionaries traveling backwards and forwards and onwards to their work going from two weeks' to doubtless two months' trips at a time.) So we will live on board A Travelling Mission Station.

There is the name of our sainted "Dr. Harry Biddle," our first missionary in Africa, to give his life, as his share in Africa's redemption. For whom better could the "hospital cabin" be named? Then there is our beloved and heroic Ella Ewing. Her name could well be given a place as a continuance of the influence of her life through the steamer evangelizing the people whom she loved so well and who learned in so short a time to love her. Other cabins there remain two, and these could be consecrated to special friends or memorialized for loved ones who loved His cause and Kingdom.

While speaking at the Long Beach convention last year, a little old gentleman came up after one of the meetings and said "I had the joy of giving the money to pay the transport of the 'Henry Reed' steamer to the Congo." How happy he was in the knowledge of having had a share in the great work that steamer had accomplished for God and the regeneration of a people and the progress of the gospel in those twenty-eight years. I was glad I had mentioned it just for his satisfaction though I had not known of him. He had invested $2,000 in the Kingdom in that way. Have we a man of like spirit and vision who will do the same now? It will cost at least $3,000 to pay the freight. Our boat is much larger than the little "Henry Reed," which had to be carried on men's heads in sections for there was then no railroad around the cataracts.

There need be no gatherings at the convention. There are still three months before it convenes and now is the time to make your gift count mightily. With the opening of new stations, with the clamoring of still more distant villages and people for the Message of Life; with the still farther lands to be possessed; with your workers breaking in health because of exposure in the frail native dug-out log canoes; with our Centennial ambitions almost realized, every gift now adds to and encourages every other. "Speed the Oregon." May God grant that it shall not be for lack of funds many months ere we shall see the smoke and hear the glad whistle of our steamer on the mighty Congo and its vast net-work of tributaries. We confidently look for it.

"This is the gospel of Labor—
Ring it, ye bells of the kirk!
The Lord of Love came down from above
To live with the men who work.
This is the rose he planted
Here in the thorn-cursed soil
Heaven is blest with perfect rest,
But the blessing of earth is toil."

Centennial Bulletin

By John A. Jayne

From all parts of the country come frequent inquiries, "How may we help the brethren in Pittsburg in preparing for the Centennial?"

It is the object of this Centennial Bulletin to answer as far as possible that letter.

First of all, brethren, pray for the Centennial, and all who have its work in charge. Unless one is right on the ground, he cannot know the immense amount of work that is being done.

Brother W. R. Warren, our faithful Centennial Secretary, is working sixteen hours every day endeavoring to get things in shape so that when the hosts of the Lord assemble in Pittsburgh there will be no confusion, dissatisfaction or lack of thorough enjoyment on the part of anyone. At present writing he is in Boston, overlooking the printing of the program that will be the finest ever issued for a religious gathering of any kind in the world.

Brother E. A. Hibler, the evangelist for Western Pennsylvania, has been loaned to the Centennial Committee for three months and is ably seconding the work of Brother Warren. He is giving all of his time to the work and is not sparing himself in the least to the end that when the convention assembles there may be no confusion or dismay in any heart.

Brother O. H. Philips, the genial chairman of music, is filling in the hours arranging and rearranging the songs, locating singers and arranging for great rehearsals. Brother F. M. Gordon, who has charge of the enrollment of the delegates, is at his desk from early morning till late at night mastering the gigantic problems connected with his work. Brother C. L. Thurgood, who has the sight-seeing plans in hand, is pushing at his work with his well-known ardor and vigor. Brother Garnet Winn, who has charge of the ushering of the Convention, Brother Wallace Tharp, who has the communion service in hand, and Brother S. E. Brewster, who is at the head of the exhibits, all are doing everything in their power to make their part of the work a splendid success. In addition to these, the Publicity Bureau is open continually and is helping in the dissemination of the convention news.

In addition to all these there is an office force of six stenographers and two messengers, who, with but one exception, are all members of our local churches, and who are all thoroughly imbued with the spirit of the Convention and that for which it stands.

A force like this needs the sympathy of the brotherhood, the prayers of all. The first thing, therefore, brethren, that you may do to help the convention and its committee is pray earnestly for them.

The second thing that you may do to help the convention workers is none the less important, though second. And that is: Register in advance and secure your place of entertainment. Already a goodly number are doing this and more will do it when once their attention is called to it.

By registering in advance one saves himself the confusion of coming to a crowded registration hall, having, possibly, a long wait at the booths and a tiresome street car ride after the wait.

Registering in advance, one is able to go directly from the train to the home assigned him for the convention period, rest, arrange his toilet and begin the enjoyment of the various good things that have been prepared for.

But more than this, they who register in advance are sure of receiving the centennial program, the centennial badge and the centennial certificate of registration.

The Centennial Program is not an ordinary affair. It is a genuine work of art. Should one attempt to purchase a book of this character in the stores, for the blank book alone he would pay at least one dollar.

This souvenir program is a book that will be held in high estimation with the passing of the years.

Its splendidly bound, highly calendared, gilt edged pages, filled with the choicest of Convention matter, will make it the treasured of many hearts for years to come.

It has halftones of many of our great men and women both of the past and present, many of our larger churches, beautiful descriptions of Pittsburg, all embellished with the highest specimens of the printer's art, and a history of Pittsburg written by Pittsburg's distinguished son, Colonel Harden Church, himself a grandson of the illustrious Samuel Church, who founded the first church in Allegheny.

In addition to all this, besides the fifty pages of convention music and many pages of interest to Disciples everywhere, there is a great monograph by Archibald McLean, on "The Pioneers of the Reformation." In this monograph Brother McLean is at his best. He rises very frequently to sublime heights, while at all times his pure spirit is enflamed with the richness of his subject and the worthfulness of his theme. This monograph alone is worth more than one dollar. If it had been published elsewhere it could not be had for this sum. It is a marvel of historic information and purity of English, while for breadth of vision and real spiritual power it cannot be excelled.

The centennial badge is a real work of art. It will be a treasured heirloom in many families. It has embossed medallions of the pioneers on the base, while the bar is ornamented with the word "Pittsburg" and a small representation of the Brush Run Church, together with the figures "1809" and "1909." Many men are preparing to wear it as a watch fob, while some of the ladies are arranging to have it made into brooches and pins of various kinds.

The centennial registration certificate is worthy of a place by the side of the program and the badge. It is a most beautifully printed statement of the fact of registration and shows that the bearer had the love of the cause at heart, in the fact that he registered and made the work of the Convention Committee lighter and more easy to bear.

IT WORKS

The Laborer Eats Food that Would Wreck an Office Man.

Men who are actively engaged at hard work can sometimes eat food that would wreck a man who is more closely confined.

This is illustrated in the following story:

"I was for 12 years clerk in a store working actively and drank coffee all the time without much trouble until after I entered the telegraph service.

"There I got very little exercise and drinking strong coffee, my nerves grew unsteady and my stomach got weak and I was soon a very sick man. I quit meat and tobacco and in fact I stopped eating everything which I thought might affect me except coffee, but still my condition grew worse and I was all but a wreck.

"I finally quit coffee and commenced to use Postum a few years ago and I am speaking the truth when I say, my condition commenced to improve immediately and today I am well and can eat anything I want without any bad effects all due to shifting from coffee to Postum.

"I told my wife today I believed I could digest a brick if I had a cup of Postum to go with it.

"We make it according to directions boiling it full 20 minutes and use good rich cream and it is certainly delicious."

Look in pkgs. for a copy of the famous little book, "The Road to Wellville."

"There's a Reason."

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true, and full of human interest.

All of this, one is sure of having if he registers in advance for the convention.

And you will register if you come!

Then why not register now, and have it done with?

All you need do is write a brief letter to the Centennial Committee, Bissell Block, Pittsburg, stating the kind of a room you want, the price you are willing to pay, and enclose one dollar, either bill, check or money order, the latter preferred, and you will be sent a beautiful certificate of registration that will entitle you to the souvenir program book, the souvenir badge and registration in the world's largest religious convocation of modern times.

Will you help the committee in this way by registering at once?

PRE-CONVENTION POINTS.

It looks now as though there would be an enrollment of 50,000.

All of the churches of the city are asking for good men to fill their pulpits on Centennial Sunday.

The papers of the city are preparing for superb reports, and some of them will run special editions.

A complete stenographic report of the Convention will be taken by the committee in charge, which will be beautifully embellished with special photographs and sold at a nominal price.

Our venerable brethren, L. L. Carpenter, John W. McGarvey, C. L. Loos, W. T. Moore, J. B. Briney and a host of others are planning for a great meeting at the Veteran's Camp Fire.

The prospectus is now being sent out. If you want one drop a card to the Centennial Committee.

Finally, brethren, help your committee by praying for them and registering early for the convention.

Sincerely yours,
JOHN ANDERSON JAYNE,
Chairman Publicity Committee.

Church Extension a Friend of New York Missions

New York State is one of the greatest missionary fields in America, especially so because of the fact that it is a state of large cities that send forth an urgent call for the gospel of Christ. The Disciples of Christ are nobly answering the call when we consider their strength in this great state. There are at present twelve mission churches in the state receiving aid from our various missionary boards, all of which are in cities of more than ten thousand population. The great problem confronting most of these missions is how to become properly housed in order that they may do effective work in their community. The solution of the problem in many instances has been Church Extension. During the past twenty years the churches of New York State have contributed a total of $17,448.71 to Church Extension, while Church Extension has loaned to the New York mission churches in the same period of time a total of $33,800, of which $8,100 has been returned, leaving at the present $25,700 of loans not yet returned. These figures speak volumes for Church Extension in New York. Some may say that we need many times to properly house themselves and indeed we do. Church Extension would gladly heed our call if the money was at their disposal. They have all sections of our great land to deal with and can not show partiality to any. Arouse! Churches of New York. Let every church respond during the month of September with a liberal Centennial offering for Church Extension. Let's raise our share and a little more of the $300,000 this year that we may reach our Centennial aim of a million in our Church Extension fund.

On Talking Religion

The Pastor's Delicate Problem When Out of the Pulpit

While we are restoring pristine Christianity we would do well to bring back the early art of talking religion.

Primitive Christianity was a religion of talk.

The new experience Christ gave men was bound to show itself in every form of expression. And since words are the most immediate channels for expressing the inner life we will not be surprised if such a dynamic as our Christianity makes the utmost use of speech.

And from the beginning it has been so. The most characteristic phenomenon on the day the church was born was the gift of tongues. The Christianity of those early disciples was a talking religion. When they were persecuted they went everywhere preaching the word.

Nobody understood that a certain "order" of men were to do all the talking. Everybody had a story to tell, an evangel to proclaim, the good news of salvation to pass on to his neighbor.

Probably the weakness and conventionality of modern religious life is nowhere more clearly exposed than in the conspicuous absence of religion from the conversation of Christian people.

Religion has gotten itself stiffened into a technique whose vocabulary may be spoken intelligently only by an especially equipped profession. The average church-member assumes that his pew rent or his offering goes to pay a man to do his religious talking for him.

And this man who is paid by the church to talk for it as well as to it finds himself shut up virtually to the public exercise of this function. One of the most disheartening experiences of the pastor is the discovery that in visiting a home if he undertakes to talk religion he finds himself talking a monologue.

Oftimes he girds himself for the afternoon of pastoral visitation with the determination that these few hours of face to face opportunity shall bring forth some spiritual gain to his parishioners and to himself. He is impressed with the barrenness and triviality of most of his "pastoral work." In a hundred calls he has done little more than exchange courtesies. His parishioners would be offended if he did not show them some attention. Casual attendants at his church might be made to feel more at home and perhaps induced to join the church through a social call from the minister. And the trifling character of this kind of "work" seems below his dignity as a minister of Christ.

So today he will speak to men and women the words of eternal life. He will exercise his true function as a guide and helper of the souls of his people. He will find out what their inner problems are, what their doubts and temptations are, what perplexities they are having about God since grave trouble befell the household. Perhaps some perplexing passage of scripture they have been reading he can explain, and use it as the point of departure for opening up a higher view of life. Perhaps some newspaper sensation about a noted preacher's doctrine or a university professor's strange view of the Bible, or a new book that has been much discussed—a hundred texts and pretexts he is able to anticipate as the basis of helpful conversation.

But his heart is sore as he returns home. He seemed unable to stimulate a conversation on religion. He could talk pleasantries. His wit and social cleverness were enjoyed greatly—probably more than they merited, due, likely, to the fact that he was a clergyman and therefore not expected to be either funny or graceful. He could awaken interest in the organizations of the church—the Ladies' Aid, the new Men's Club, the Young People's Society, the gymnasium they were just instituting or the social that was to come off next week. At one home he undertook to help the deacons out by securing a pledge for the support of the church, and was gratified at the readiness of response his suggestion brought. But in each instance that he attempted to carry the conversation over from the mechanism of religion into the field of religion itself, he was left to carry it alone. The parishioner stared blankly at him. His talk sounded to his own ears like a declamation. He knew that this was no time to preach so he desisted, and asked how the baby was getting on with its teeth.

No doubt there is more than one reason why the pastor finds us dumb on the big matters of religion. But two reasons are fundamental to all the rest.

First of these is our probable lack of a genuine religious consciousness.

Many of us come into the church without the exercise of our religious intelligence in any but a formal fashion. Social ties drew us, or family tradition or clerical flattery, or social respectability actuated us, or revival excitement overwhelmed us.

Whatever was the psychology of our act, with many of us, no doubt, it was hardly the clear perception of spiritual truth that moved us. Social imitation likely played a larger part than individual perception.

Naturally, therefore, our minds would be barren of religious ideas. With large numbers of us there would not be sufficient religious intelligence to so much as ask a question, to say nothing of nurturing a persistent but healthy doubt.

Another reason for the failure of his parishioners to talk religion with their pastor is that he probably had not learned that delicate art of talking religion in terms of life; he probably talked in the vocabulary of his profession.

In reacting from the superficial social character of the present-day pastoral call the minister need not go, all the way back to the old-time custom of holding a sort of miniature church service in the parlor. His conversation should be a conversation, not a sermon. And if he will patiently go about among his ever so unresponsive people, forgetting his text-book problems and facing their life-problems earnestly, and talking about them in concrete terms, he will find that in the course of years there will grow up a religious intelligence among them that will make religious talk the chief joy of their intercourse together.

Here as everywhere Christ is our preceptor. He was the ideal pastor. In untechnical phrase he cultivated the spiritual perception of his little flock. He not only solved their problems, but made problems for them. He brought them not only faith, but doubt that lead to deeper faith.

It is hard for those who know Christ best to think of him as a preacher. There was no "swing" in his eloquence. You would hardly call him eloquent at all. He was the quiet friend and teacher of those the Father had given him.

His teaching was mainly in conversation. No doubt much of the conversation has been lost to us—the circumstantial elements, the human setting for the glistening gem of truth that has survived. No doubt there were many words concerning the passing values of this life as well as those concerning the abiding value of the eternal life.

It is not likely that Jesus talked religion all the time and nothing but religion. He entered fully into human life. But He approached every subject "under the aspect of eternity." His conversation always illuminated the life that is life indeed.

By the Master's method the pastor of today may open to his people's souls a world of interests and values of which they now do not dream. By quickening their perceptions of life he will change their speech. Citizens of heaven, they will speak in heaven's vocabulary.

And all their common speech will take on new purity and sweetness because they have learned to speak the words of religion.

Let us lay hold of the happiness of today. Do we not go through life blindly, thinking that some fair tomorrow will bring us the gift we miss today? Poor mortal, when thinkest thou then to be happy? Tomorrow? What is tomorrow? How is it different from today? Is it not but another today? Know thou my heart, if thou art not happy today, thou shalt never be happy! Today it is given thee to be patient, to be unselfish, to be purposeful, to be strong, eager, and to work mightily!—Anna Robertson Brown.

The Trend of Events

By Alva W. Taylor

"ULCERS UPON THE BODY POLITIC"

Thos. Jefferson is quoted as saying with prophetic warning that "the cities of our country may prove to be ulcers upon the body politic." De Tocqueville believed that the final test of our democracy would come in our cities and he did not reckon with the vast foreign populations that greatly enhance the probabilities of his judgment being well taken. Bryce sees democracy still in the crucible in our municipal government, though he does not think at all that it is threatened. The final result will doubtless be a modification of our methods of applying democratic government to the municipalities by a wise discrimination between the manner of selecting the administrative and legislative agents of municipal government or by treating the city more as a business corporation and less as a government. The new way is to govern through a small body of men with direct responsibility to the people and as nearly as possible a non-partizan election while the old goes to its extremity in a double legislative body and a large number of petty elective officials.

The corruption in our cities justifies the citing of such a prophecy as that in Jefferson's warning. If De Tocqueville's judgment is applied to the problem today it may be well called significant. But it will not only try our democracy, it will prove it. Municipal corruption and the city political machines are awakening the whole land to the danger points in democracy and we are hastening to correct faulty methods and be warned by our mistakes. The result will be a strengthening of our democratic form of government. It is one of the undulations in the gradual ascent of democracy by the use of republican forms.

If the city should become the "ulcer on the body politic"—or perhaps we had as well acknowledge that politically it is just that—we have great need of a cure; for the city will soon outnumber the country. If democracy fails in the city American government will be tried indeed, for the corrupt city will soon be able to rule states by sheer majorities in legislatures; and the nation by electing a majority of congress. In the first century of our national history the population of the nation multiplied twelve times, while that of the cities multiplied eighty-six times. In 1800 the cities furnished 4 per cent of the population. In 1840 it had arisen to 8 per cent, in 1870 to 20 per cent, and is now about 35 per cent. It is thus easy to compute that by the time we celebrate our one hundred and fiftieth anniversary one-half our population will be urban.

All this might be true and yet not create so great a problem in democratic polity were all these city dwellers Anglo-Saxon. But in the past seven years 10,000,000 foreigners have come into the country and 90 per cent of them have crowded into the cities. They know little of self government and are the pawns of the briber. Cities like Chicago and New York are from 80 to 90 per cent foreign born, or of foreign born parents. Here is some significant statistics for one ward of one of them—one church for every 290 voters, one bakery for every 127, one grocery to every 62, one saloon to every 7 1-2 voters. And the saloon is not American.

THE COST OF MUNICIPAL HOUSEKEEPING

New York City has a debt of $672,000,000. It amounts to $156 for each man, woman, and child of its population. A part of this is bonded indebtedness for such municipal activities as the dock management, and should be discounted, from the fact that it represents utilities that will pay their own way and not be chargeable to taxes. The annual cost of governing the city is about $39 per capita each year. That of Chicago and Philadelphia is about $31 each. Paris expends $21 and London but $17 per capita.

General Bingham, Ex-Police Commissioner of New York, says he could have made $600,000 annually had he been willing to take the graft offered him. He charges that $100,000,000 in graft and blackmail changes hands in the metropolis every year. A recent investigation of the cost of public works revealed awful waste and dishonesty in the contract system and in the direct municipal activities in matters of public building. London's municipal activities are much more vast, but in London there is no Tammany. A seat in the council there is a compliment to honesty and public spirit, while in New York a man who can be elected to the council is under suspicion because of the character that body has borne so long, and one amply justified by the results in city administration.

Chicago is promised a searching investigation of graft at the hands of the State's Attorney, John E. W. Wayman. That it exists no reputable citizen of Chicago doubts. Mr. Wayman can make himself of great service if he will fight, like a Folk or Heney, until all is laid bare. Chicago is accorded the right to float $16,000,000 in bonds for municipal improvements. The exposure is all the more needed on this account.

CRIME IN THE GREAT CITIES

The foreign born and their children of the first generation produce almost twice as large a percentage of criminals as do the native Americans. Singular to note the increase in criminals, however, is not among the foreign born, but among those of foreign parentage. It is doubtless due to the fact that the foreign born are under the restraints of their old country habit of regard for law; while the first generation are reared with the morale of old country life of the lower class and then are without the restraint of old country law in the new land. Another factor that cannot be weighed is the fact that most of the old country people that come to America are reared in the country, while their children are born in our cities and thus under the influence of city immorality. But whatever the causes, the fact remains that the city produces the criminal classes most largely and that the growing population of the city does not promise well for public safety. Our crime is increasing three times as fast as our population.

Nor can we boast that our methods of dealing with the petty criminal and first offender are calculated to stay the fearful increase of crime. Of 8,000 sent to the House of Correction in Chicago in a given time, 4,000 could not pay a $5 fine and 1,174 could not pay $1. Of the 8,000, one-half had been committed before from one to two hundred times. Well may Judge Cleland ask what sense our law displays when it sends for the two-hundredth time some habitual criminal that 199 terms in the House of Correction had not cured. The Judge found that, while one-half of those sent go back again, he could keep 90 per cent from being sent both the first and second time by his parole system.

HOW THE SUNDAY-SCHOOLS PROSPER

The Sunday-school has never received so much intelligent attention as today. There have been eras of enthusiasm for numbers and systems that unified the schools of all denominations and of all the world, but the interest today is a deep desire to make them more effective as teachers of the Bible and more adept as training schools for social service in the church. To this end the attention of the leaders and the teachers of the teachers is being focused upon methods of teaching and a better understanding of the nature of the child. When we have but one short half-hour once each week to teach the Scriptures, we need efficiency in instruction. All this does not have great interest for those to whom religious activity means a wave of enthusiasm only and that kind of enthusiasm which counts numbers only. There may be an enthusiasm that is not of the wave order, a deep glowing enthusiasm, one that would reckon the final total of good as a thing of two dimensions, quantity multiplied by quality.

The Teacher Training crusades have had the right of way the past two or three years. They have done great good, but they have not been so much teacher-training as popular training in elemental Bible facts. When the part of the study relating to pedagogy was taken up the classes generally melted away. This must of necessity have been so for those who can become teachers are a select number and no church could expect to find scores and hundreds who could be trained in that art. Teacher Training needs the deep enthusiasm, not the wide wave that must of necessity imply superficiality.

TEMPERANCE NOTES

The temperance movement is growing in Germany. The Societies now have 90,000 members. They had 35,000 six years ago.

The liquor dealers propose to make a test of Gary, Ind. Gary promises to be one of the largest industrial centers and it has started by banishing the saloons. It is reported that certain merchants are drumming trade by offering a free drink with each dollar purchase of goods and that agents are circulating among the men to induce a large number to leave because of their thirsty condition. In Illinois to give away a drink is equivalent to selling it.

The railroad companies are instructing their agents regarding the new interstate law regulating shipments of liquor. It has been common for mail order liquor firms to express or freight packages without label to some fictitious names in "dry" territory and have the agent delivered the same C. O. D. to any one signing for it. Under the new law the contents and size of the package must be plainly marked on the outside, and any one delivering such a package to other than the consignee whose name appears on the package, is liable to a fine of $5,000 and imprisonment for two years. Meanwhile the crusade before congress for complete protection for "dry" territory will go on.

The Seattle Fair is absolutely "dry." It is not failing either artistically or financially. The average attendance thus far has been above 25,000 per day.

The closer the matter is investigated the more deadly does the indictment of insanity hang about the neck of the liquor traffic. Dr. Gregory, of the Bellevue Insane Hospital of New York, testifies out of eight years experience and the treatment of 30,000 cases that if the saloon was driven out of business half the insanity would be prevented. To his analysis of his patients he has added an investigation of "dry" territory as the source of insanity. Thus his judgment.

Twenty-one counties in South Carolina, the residue that maintain the Dispensary System, voted on the same day in August on the question of "dry" or county dispensary. Fifteen of the twenty-one joined the remainder of the state in favor of complete prohibition. The six remaining will not long defeat total state prohibition.

Out in Washington they are in the first days of the elections under the new town and city local option law. The liquor men sought to start a wave their way and circulated the petitions for the first three elections on the first day on which voting could be had. All three went against them. Others are on the way.

Alabama shows no signs of a receding wave. The most drastic prohibitory law that ever graced a statute book has been enacted to enforce the state wide prohibition law. It provides that soft drink establishments shall keep no intoxicants in their places for any purpose, that clubs shall abolish "lockers," that an internal revenue license is prima facia evidence of guilt, that any frequenting place of numbers of men may be raided upon suspicion, that all "wet" goods found must be destroyed, that no car containing liquor shall be left on a track in the state, that the word saloon must not be used, that corporations asking charters shall promise to conduct no traffic in liquor and shall have their charters annulled if they do, that officers failing to do their duty shall be summarily dealt with, and that any stuff having the taste, odor or color of intoxicants shall be construed as liquor. Alabama is not merely throwing a "sop" to the "fanatics."

Under normal increase there would have been 300,000,000 gallons more of liquor sold the past two years than the two years preceding. Instead, there was a decrease of 90,000,000. The difference is 390,000,000 gallons. The difference amounts to 2,000,000,000 drinks of whiskey plus 5,600,000,000 drinks of beer. It means a difference of $465,000,000 over the bar.

Harper's Weekly, the special pet of all the Bourbons, whether of capitalism, democracy, or whiskey, acknowledges that prohibition must do some prohibiting, because there has been a decrease of $8,000,000 in internal revenue receipts.

Editorial

IT IS with sincere pleasure that we note the publication in the Christian Standard of September 4, of the correspondence between Z. T. Sweeney and Professor Willett on the subject of miracle. The material runs to eleven pages, and is one of the most interesting features that has appeared in that journal for many months. It will enable readers of the paper to review the subject as it has appeared in the pages of the Christian Century. If the recent subscribers to this paper wish to have the earlier portions of the discussion, which is concluded in our present issue, they can secure it by sending to the Christian Standard, Cincinnati, for a copy of that paper. In one feature alone is the Standard correspondence disappointing. It omits Professor Willett's reply to Bro. Sweeney's last letter, the reply which we announced in our issue of September 2, and print in our "Biblical Problems" department today. In what manner Bro. Sweeney could have gained his own consent to forward the correspondence to the Standard, including his last article to which no reply had yet appeared, we do not quite understand. If he was impatient for its appearance, or wished to assume that his letter was unanswerable, a line to this office would have secured him information regarding the causes of Professor Willett's delay. We assume that both Bro. Sweeney and the editor of the Christian Standard will wish to print the complete correspondence at once.

WHAT is the matter with the churches? This question has been put to a number of the leading church men of America by Theodore Dreiser, editor of the Delineator. Their replies published in the October number of that magazine are suggestive reading. Cardinal Gibbons declares that the American people are at heart a religious people; but admits decreased attendance upon church services. He believes the remedy "will be found by giving to the people in the churches something of God, some spiritual gift, some good which it would be impossible for them to get elsewhere. Let the minister of God speak as one having authority, and our religiously inclined people will throng the temples of Divine worship."

Dr. Charles H. Parkhurst calls attention to decreasing interest in doctrinal formulas and increasing interest in life, and concludes: "While, then, it is not to be denied that the Christian Church is the most powerful organization anywhere for the uplift of the race, its power would be tremendously enhanced if church members would realize that church privileges are mated with church obligations, and if they would not allow the Church to be considered so close a corporation as to exclude those who ought properly to be in it, but who are at present kept out by barriers of misapprehension and tradition."

Especially suggestive are the words of Dr. Emil G. Hirsch, Chicago: "The truth is, the function which the pulpit might fill in these days is largely preempted by the sociologist, the social engineer. Settlements and similar institutions devoted to the betterment of social conditions and the bridging of the chasm between the masses and the classes have usurped the place erstwhile held by the Church.

"Would the Church reclaim its lost ground, it must adapt itself to the prevailing sociological obsession and act as the go-between for the separated components of society. To the men of means it must bring home the feelings and views of the less favored. To those upon whom the burden of the social conditions is heavier and heaviest, it must bring the message of fraternity. The Church must democratize itself. The distinction between the clergy and the laity must be minimized. The clergy shall grow to be a body of trained experts, not in archeology and old languages, but in philanthropy, using this oft-abused term in the larger connotation, as embracing whatever affects the life of man in its individual and socialized relations.

"Theology must be replaced by ethics, dogma by deed, the ancient books by the inspiration of the living realities, and all this lit up by the passion of human love and the consciousness of man's inherent nobility and the sublimity of high ethical ideals toward which humanity is progressing with sure foot, coming nearer and nearer, perfect justice and all-sanctifying righteousness. The church of good-will will, in measure as it finds its vocabulary, regain what influence in other ways the Church wielded over men. It will be both teacher and mediator, the prophet of better days to come and the inspirer of nobler lives and deeper love among men."

Whatever may be our answer to the question; all will admit the general feeling that something is wrong. The church does not feel quite at home in our modern world. She stands hesitant before the problems which confront her. This hesitancy and uncertain does not open purse strings nor inspire great deeds. This condition more than any other is turning the best young men from the ministry. What shall be done? Many reply "nothing," and by them the church is given up for dead. But the man with larger horizon knows that all this restlessness simply means that the church has come upon a time that demands readjustment. To make this readjustment is the inspiring task confronting the American church.

Biblical Problems

By Professor Willett

Z. T. Sweeney Concludes His Correspondence on Miracles

Text: "When the soundness of any christian teacher is challenged, it is not only his privilege, but his duty, to make himself understood."—H. L. Willett in his Confession.

Dear Brother Willett: It was upon the above quotation that I have been largely relying in my efforts to induce you to make a clear statement of your belief about miracles and harmonize that belief with the Bible. But I am beginning to learn that "you can lead a horse to water, but you can't make him drink." It has been comparatively easy to induce you to state your position, but I find it utterly impossible to induce you to harmonize that proposition with the word of God. When you retained my manuscript from the twelfth day of April till the third day of June before publishing it, I had reason to expect you to give it a thorough review. But your readers, as well as myself, can all clearly see that you made no attempt to answer me, and I can take a hint. I can read very clearly between the lines that you think this correspondence has been carried far enough. I have no disposition to criticize you in this. The Century is your paper and you must study the wishes and welfare of its readers. I thank you for the courtesy with which you have treated me, and I desire to say that our correspondence has not been clouded by a single ill-feeling on my part. I only desire sufficient space to present some conclusions, which I have drawn, and I think drawn legitimately, from the positions you have taken in our correspondence. In order that our readers may perceive the fairness of my conclusions, I will re-state the positions you have taken.

First: "The apparent chasm which separates miracles from the uniform course of human events, under the reign of law, must be bridged or it will be a fatal hindrance to the acceptance of miracles."

Second: "The redemptive facts in Jesus' life are independent of miracle."

Third: "Miracles are the normal activities of a human life at its highest and best."

Fourth: "The resurrection of Jesus was the ripe fruit of the life he lived."

Fifth: "There is no intervention of a supernatural power in the realm of natural law."

Sixth: "Jesus was not a messenger sent from heaven, bearing its supernatural character and delivering a special message direct from the Father."

Seventh: "God, in dealing with us, is limited to the laws by which this universe is being governed."

I have stated everyone of these positions as briefly as possible, and yet as fairly as I know how to do it. I have no disposition in this article to controvert one of these positions; but I wish to show the consequences of acknowledging them. It is not fair to hold any man responsible for the consequences of his teaching, but it is fair to hold his teaching responsible for the consequences. There are certain things that follow the acceptance of the above views as naturally and legitimately as the stream flows from the fountain.

1. Your positions eliminate all idea of the special personal providence of God from Christianity. Many of your readers have doubtless taken comfort from the fact that they were children of providence. They have said, "There is a divinity which shapes our ends, rough hew them as we may," but they must bid good-bye to that faith when they accept your positions. The thought of a personal interposition on the part of God in human affairs cannot be harmonized with the idea that God is limited in his dealngs with us to the laws by which this universe is being ruled. There certainly is and can be no special providence in those laws.

This does not prove your position to be false, but it does prove either that your position is false or that the idea of a special providence is false.

2. Your positions eliminate all idea of divine answer to prayer from Christianity. What do the laws which govern this universe care for human petition? and what answer have they for man's prayer? They will answer the prayer of the infidel as readily as the prayer of the Christian. The only way to receive a blessing through these laws is to conform to them, and this requires neither faith nor un-faith. Many of your readers have doubtless gained much strength through prayer. They have often sung:

> "O, how praying rests the weary,
> Prayer will change the night to day,
> So when life seems dark and dreary,
> Don't forget to pray."

But can they get any comfort out of praying to the unchanging and unchangeable laws by which this universe is being governed?

This does not prove you to be wrong in your positions, but it does prove either that you are wrong or that your readers are mistaken when they pray to a divine Father for personal help and guidance. It also proves that you are mistaken when you say "prayer releases energies in the universe, which cannot be set going in any other way."

3. Your positions eliminate from Christianity all idea of grace, pardon, or forgiveness of sins. What do the laws, by which this universe is being governed, know of forgiveness or pardon? What connection have they with the idea of grace? They have an unchanging and unchangeable tendency to bless the obedient and punish the disobedient. According to the scriptures, grace is a system by which forgiveness and remission of sins can be extended to the sinner, but only by the intervention of a higher power in the realm of natural law. But if you are correct this intervention cannot be, and therefore, there is no such thing as grace, remission or forgiveness.

This does not prove you to be wrong, but it does prove, either that you are wrong or that all idea of grace, mercy and pardon must be eliminated.

4. Your positions eliminate from Christianity all idea of a revealed religion. It is an utter absurdity to speak of God revealing a plan of salvation for guilty men through the laws by which this universe is being governed. If there is any plan of salvation in them, it must be "discovered," and I know of no one who has made the discovery as yet. Jude speaks of the gospel as "faith once for all delivered to the saints." But no faith has ever been delivered through these laws. Christianity has either been delivered by the intervention of a supernatural power in the realm of natural law, or it has been evolved from man through the laws by which this universe is being governed. My dear brother, you can hold to the Gospel as a revelation from God, or as an evolution from man, but you can't hold to both at the same time. Your friend and colleague, Prof. Geo. B. Foster of Chicago University, has gone a little farther along the road you are now traveling than yourself, and is beginning to see the consequences of his premises and acknowledges their logical conclusion when he says: "More and more people are giving up the idea that their religion is something handed down to them from a divine source. People are cultivating it just as they cultivate music, language, science and morality." Dr. Foster is no simpleton. He can see that when certain premises are acknowledged, certain conclusions must follow. And when we accept the premises that God is limited in his dealings with us to the laws by which this universe is being governed, if we are logical, we must accept the conclusions, that a revealed religion is a delusion. I want to call your attention to a significant fact. There is not a scientific man living on the earth today, or that ever did live who limits God to the laws by which this universe is being ruled, who believes in a divinely revealed religion. And if you believe both of these, you are without company among scholars and scientists. The Apostle Paul believed in a revealed religion, as the following quotation will show: "Things which eye saw not, and ear heard not, and which entereth not into the heart of man; whatsoever things God prepared for them, that love him. But unto us God revealed them." But Paul did not believe these things came through the laws by which the universe is being governed. If they had, eye would have seen them; ear would have heard them, and they would have entered into the heart of man. Paul tells us how these things come, "Which things also we speak. Not in words which man's wisdom teacheth, but which the spirit teacheth."

Now, my dear brother, this does not prove your positions to be false, but it does prove that, if they are acknowledged, we must eliminate the idea of a religion coming by a revelation from God.

5. Your positions logically eliminate the work of the Holy Spirit from Christianity. If there is anything clearly taught in the New Testament concerning the Holy Spirit, it is that he is an intervention of a supernatural power in the realm of natural law. All teachings about him must be "honey-combed" if that is not true. Now if God is limited to the laws by which this universe is being governed, there is no place for the illuminating, enlightening, guiding, comforting and consoling power of the Spirit of God, among men today. And if not today, there never has been, for Nature's laws are unchanging and unchangeable.

Again, my dear brother, this does not prove you to be wrong, but it does prove that, if your premises are correct, we must give up all idea of the Holy Spirit intervening in the affairs of man.

6. Your positions logically eliminate from christianity all idea that Jesus Christ is a messenger sent from God, bearing the supernatural character of heaven, to teach us the way, the truth and the life. In fact, you have most earnestly protested against the idea of Jesus being sent as a messenger from Heaven, bearing its supernatural character. Now Jesus was either a messenger from Heaven and a visitant to this earth, or he grew out of this earth. If he grew out of the earth, then we must trust in an earth-grown human being for atonement, reconciliation, guidance and intercession. If you offer him worship, it is one human being worshipping another, and that is idolatry. Now this does not prove you wrong, Brother Willett, but it does prove that if you are right, Jesus is only a human being just like yourself. And it would seem that you hold that view about him as witness the following from your pen: "There is a certain type of the supernatural that will not stand the test. There is a supernatural view that the work of Jesus was the work of a supernatural person with supernatural effects. I confess that I do not understand that principle or the reason for it."

7. Your positions logically eliminate the idea of a personal God from Christianity. They take God to the back door and bow him out and tell him that if he wants to hold any more communication with you, he must go around to the front door, and enter through the laws by which this universe is being governed.

We all have our times when we feel very near to God and that God is very near to us. We lift up our voices in prayer and utter the inspired statement, "thou God seest me." We lift up our voices in song and say,

"What e'er I do,
Where e'er I be,
Still 'tis God's hand
That leadeth me."

But we must change the hymn book again. If we accept your premises, we must sing,

What e'er I do,
Where e'er I be,
'Tis Nature's law
That leadeth me.

Again, this is not saying that you are wrong, but that either you are wrong or that the idea of the fatherly guidance and help of Almighty God is a delusion.

Now, my dear brother, if the seven eliminations do not de-nature Christianity, I don't know how it could be done. In fact, there is not enough of it left to sweep up and throw on a dust pile. If Christianity is not a supernatural thing founded upon a supernatural conquest of a tomb, it is nothing. As a system of teaching, it centers in and around Christ, as the teacher. As a system of law, it centers in and around Christ as the law giver. As a kingdom, it centers in and around Christ as the King. As a life, it centers in and around Christ as the divine model. If Christ is human, Christianity is worth nothing more than the ranting of our college professors from Maine to California. If Christ is divine, Christianity is divine, and stands infinitively superior to the teachings of all human philosphers and professors. If Jesus Christ rose from the dead, he is divine. The battle ground of the centuries has been over the tomb of Jesus Christ, and it will stay there till "the kingdoms of this world are become the kingdoms of our Lord, and of his Christ."

A great French infidel once went to Talleyrand and complained that nobody would believe in his philosophy, which he boldly asserted was superior to that of Jesus Christ. The French diplomat quietly remarked, "perhaps if you get some one to crucify you and bury you and you rise from the dead on the third day, they may possibly believe in your philosophy." He knew the crux of the whole matter.

You are a young man, Brother Willett, almost young enough to be my son, and it is in the nature of youth to listen to the siren and be deceived by the seductive power of great words. And I call upon you, in fatherly counsel, to look well to the conclusions before you adopt the premises. Whether you realize it or not, the whole trend of your teachings is to eliminate the supernatural from Christianity and to reduce it to a system of pure and unadulterated rationalism. You will rob it of all historic basis; neutralize its saving power.

I have preached the simple Gospel for forty years. My father before me preached it for seventy-five years, as likewise did his father. All my brothers have given their lives to it, and I love it with every heart pressure of my life. I have seen hundreds of young men start upon the same premises you are now building upon, and invariably they have either disavowed them or gone into the rankest of infidelity. If you do not one of these things, you will be the exception among thousands. When the fox came to the door of the lion's cage, he observed that the tracks were all pointing inward and none returning. He was wise enough not to go in, and we should be as smart as a fox.

In a few days, I will be on my way to Canada for the summer. While during this discussion I have steadfastly insisted that the discussion should not be shifted from your position on miracles to mine. I beg to say in conclusion, that I have no views on this subject that I am afraid to investigate. I will return in the fall and if you think then a discussion of my position on miracles would be of interest to your readers, I shall be glad to hold myself at your service.

With a sincere prayer that our loving Father may touch our eyes with light and lead our feet in wisdom's ways, whose ways are pleasantness and whose paths are peace, I am,

Sincerely and fraternally,

Z. T. SWEENEY.

Columbus, Ind., June 9, 1909.

The above letter of Bro. Sweeney has waited somewhat too long for attention on my part. In the pressure of duties which have weighed heavily of late on mind and heart, I have left all but the most imperative matters to times of greater leisure. Yet had it seemed possible to pursue with profit the exchange of opinions which Bro. Sweeney began, I should have been encouraged to give the subject the promptest attention in every instance. It has been quite apparent, however, both to myself and the readers of the Christian Century that Bro. Sweeney did not wish to commit himself to any positive opinions, but to pursue the less responsible course of asking questions and raising difficulties. To this course on his part I have only the fundamental objection that it obscures the vital issue, and fails to make progress toward definite conclusions. I am glad that Bro. Sweeney at length perceives the profitless character of such a correspondence. It is necessary that both sides, in such an exchange of opinions, should work in the open, and with full acceptance of responsibility for the views advanced or assumed.

I asked Bro. Sweeney at an early moment in this correspondence to define himself on three points.

1. The meaning of miracle as he construes it.
2. The value of the miracles in Jesus' ministry.
3. The present value of the miracles of Jesus as aids to faith.

These points are the heart of the entire subject in consideration. On each one of them I have made my own position perfectly plain. More than this, in every instance I have shown that position to be in absolute harmony with New Testament teaching on the subject. When Bro. Sweeney asserts the contrary, the force of his statement is merely to show that my views on miracles do not satisfy his particular interpretation of scripture. When two varying views of the word of God are set in contrast, it must ever be the duty of their respective defenders to make explicit declaration of their convictions and leave the matter for the decision of those interested. Having done my part of this work in the simplest and most direct manner, possible in the space available, I am glad to leave the question, if it must be left, at just the point it has now reached, and for reasons which I wish briefly to suggest. I shall not take time to criticise Bro. Sweeney's attempt to set forth my views in the first seven propositions in his article. In many regards I would not change them. In others correction has been made more than once in previous papers and need not detain us now.

I could not ask a more convincing vindication of the thesis I have maintained than the interesting series of items Bro. Sweeney has included in his seven formidable heads above, emphasized by italics as they appear. Leaving all the more direct proof I have given in previous papers, on the character of miracle as no contravention of law, but the use of law, which is merely God's accustomed way of working, at its higher level, I should be quite willing to leave the entire discussion to stand or fall by its relation to the seven items of the foregoing category. Indeed Bro. Sweeney's theory of miracle, or what he has led me and his readers generally to regard as his theory appears at its weakest in the light of these items of Providence, Prayer, Pardon, Revelation, the Mission of Jesus, and the nature of God. I have no desire to make capital of Bro. Sweeney's amusing love of covering all the subjects in theology in a few paragraphs. There is, no doubt, a certain advantage in this method, as it absolves one from the necessity of remaining near the fundamental issue, or of examining the details of a subject. It is not the method I should prefer, but I wish to point out some of its advantages in the present instance, and to call attention to the fact that even the majesty of italic letters, so freely invoked, cannot obscure the essential weakness of the statements. It is as if Bro. Sweeney, powerless to invalidate my position by candid investigation of facts, had recklessly gathered up all the available arguments against the Christian faith and charged them to me. The humor and futility of this precedure become more apparent as the seven items are reviewed.

1. Waiving the false and outworn distinction between "special" and "general" providences, the modern view of nature and of God puts marked emphasis upon the unique relationship of the redeemed soul to its Creator and Savior, in virtue of which all things work together for its good in ways to which each new period of human experience is giving fresh and vital meaning.

2. No theory of prayer, however inadequate it may be, can ever defeat the reverent and worshiping soul in the exercise of its divine right of communion with God. Yet our later conception of prayer as being less a series of requests to God than actual intercourse of the human spirit with the divine; no longer an attempt to induce God to fracture the laws of the world in our behalf, but rather an urgent and sincere effort to gain divine assistance in the employment of those laws, has opened to us a constantly widening and inspiring experience of the power of prayer, and its efficacy in securing the needed dower of blessings from the Father's hand.

3. So far from denying the values of the divine grace and pardoning love, the view of which I have spoken insists upon the vital meaning of forgiveness, not as a mere legal declaration of the freedom of the Christian from the penalties of violated law, but his actual transformation from the life of sin to that of holiness by the imparted virtues of his Lord. The mere contemplation of the greatness of the genuine Gospel view of forgiveness in contrast with the older forensic theories would be sufficient to prove the immeasurable superiority of the vital conception of religion as over against the formal and mechanical.

4. The case grows clearer and clearer as we proceed. God has never left himself without witness among any people. Yet in the Hebrew prophets he spoke to men as never before, and in the life of our Lord that disclosure of his character and purpose came to its climax. These lives were lived in fullest conformity to the laws by which God organizes and rules the world. In fact these lives, and most of all the life of Christ, are themselves the chief vehicles of that revelation which God has made to men. And they make clear to us the fact that God's employment of the laws of the universe in all his disclosures of his nature no more imposes limitation upon him than does the free action of any rational being in conformity to his ideals and habits impose limitation in thought and conduct.

5. Passing over Bro. Sweeney's unhappy effort to define the Holy Spirit, it is enough to say that not a single item in the New Testament statements on this theme is abridged or controverted by the modern view of miracle. As a matter of fact the doctrine of the Holy Spirit is as little affected by one's theory of miracle as is the value of the solar spectrum by the binomial formula. Bro. Sweeney might as logically have charged me with denying the reality of wireless telegraphy on the ground that I do not believe in a habitable moon.

6. I know as little as Bro. Sweeney or any other man regarding the "supernatural character of heaven." I have steadily sought to avoid the unbiblical and wholly ambiguous term "supernatural," which has served such a convenient purpose in theological discussion, meaning much or little as the individual chose. As I showed in an early paper of this series, if one means by it the divine order, the totality of God's purpose in the universe, the heavenly aim and goal of all divine activity and human effort, then I should insist upon it as strongly as its most ardent defender. But if by "supernatural" is meant the upper stratum of a dualistic universe, I find no apology for such a scheme of things either in the Bible or in modern philosophy. I have protested and still protest against any attempt to make of Jesus a "visitor" or "stranger" or "alien" in the world. If the New Testament has any message regarding our Lord it is to show how completely he was implicit in our humanity; how he manifested God in human flesh, thereby revealing both the human life of God and the divine possibilities of man. This no more implies his "growing out of the earth," whatever Bro. Sweeney means by such terms, than it does his arrival from some other planet. But it insists upon the reality of his human life and his relations with men as fully as upon his sonship to God and his vital relations with the Father. It is this Jesus of the Gospels, this Christ of human experience and of divine power that the church has adored and the world comes more and more to revere as the Lord of Life. No "supernatural visitant," pale and ineffectual, touching for a brief space upon the frontiers of our human life, satisfies for a moment the believer. What is wanted is just what the Gospel supplies, an Elder Brother, the Firstborn of the household of God, bone of our bone and flesh of our flesh, living our life by our side and showing us how to make it divine. This is one who was "born of the seed of David according to the flesh, but was declared to be the Son of God with power, by the Holy Spirit, through the resurrection from the dead."

7. If Bro. Sweeney has not consciously left for the last of his seven items the weakest and least defensible of his non-sequiturs, he has at least been betrayed by his desire to accumulate items, or by his love for the sacred seven, or by the idea that he was in some manner reaching a climax. He closes his list with an assertion so manifestly self-contradictory, that it needs only an instant's regard to meet the dismissal which its absurdity invites. I have insisted from the first upon the revelation which God has made of his nature in the universe and in our Lord. Therefore, says Bro. Sweeney, I eliminate the idea of a personal God from Christianity. I have pointed out the fact that God's nature as thus revealed in the world and in Jesus is one of righteousness, love and harmony. Therefore, says Bro. Sweeney, I eliminate the idea of a personal God from Christianity. It has been my contention that the gracious means by which God rules the world, and which we are accustomed to call the laws of nature, are adapted to all the needs of the universe, both physical and spiritual. Further, that there is neither indication nor need of the fracture of any of these laws in the manifestation of the divine purpose. Therefore, says Bro. Sweeney, I eliminate the idea of a personal God from Christianity. I believe that the miracles of Jesus were done in perfect harmony with the laws of nature, using those laws at the altitude to which Christ alone could reach. Therefore, says Bro. Sweeney, I eliminate the idea of a personal God from Christianity. This is really too bad. It is, I believe, the contention of even the oldest text-books on logic that there ought to be some sort of relationship between premise and conclusion. But Bro. Sweeney's statement is as innocent of logic as of fact. It appears to be one of those comprehensive dabs at the universe of which he is so fond. It is as if he had charged me with belief in spiritism on the ground of my rejection of the doctrine of free silver.

A position that attempts to vindicate itself by summoning such statements is weak beyond all defense. And this is the essential difficulty with Bro. Sweeney's view of miracle, which he has assumed from the first, but would neither define nor defend. I ask him what he means by the terms he uses. He responds with the irrelevant statement that those faiths which have denied miracle have come to nothing, which statement is obviously nothing to the point. I ask him what he considers the value of Jesus' miracles today as evidences of our faith. He responds by asking about Balaam's ass and the three Hebrews in the furnace of fire. I ask him what he considers the present value of the miracles of Jesus as aids to Christian living. He responds with an interesting account of an amiable lady who, though entirely unskilled in modern science, knows more of God than all the scientists.

These are simple evasions of the issue, and the sort of evasions which, practiced in many pulpits, in Sunday-school classes, even on public platforms, and, worst of all, in some college class rooms, have gone far to unsettle the faith of the young men and women of this generation. If there is one thing above another which the reflecting person desires on the part of a teacher of religion, it is a frank and honest meeting of the facts—all the facts—of the Bible and the world about us. If Bro. Sweeney imagines that the theory he assumes regarding miracle or the treatment he has accorded the question in these papers, can reassure the minds of the young men and women who are facing the facts of nature and the Bible in the colleges and universities of America, he is very wide of the mark. And these young people are representative of a vaster host, made up of workingmen and laymen, who are not hostile to the Bible or Christianity, but who are wholly unsatisfied with the attempts which some preachers make to bolster up the authority of discredited dogmas about the Bible. The attempt to quicken faith in the miracles of Jesus by appeal to their contra-natural and supernatural character grows daily of less value. The appeal for faith in them on the ground of their reasonable character, as the expected and natural acts of one who lived at Christ's altitude awakens response and confirms confidence in the Scriptures. The age when intelligent men could be held in the chains of a theory that God rules the world by laws which he found it necessary to break in the first Christian century for the purpose of proving our Lord to be His Son, has passed. Such views neither accord with the facts as God has revealed them to us, nor do they yield convincing fruits in Christian character.

Bro. Sweeney refers to his long and honorable service as a preacher. If I were not convinced that upon the essentials of our holy faith, Bro. Sweeney is loyal to the Gospel, there would be less pleasure than there has been in exchanging views with him upon this theme. It merely shows how a man of ability and enthusiasm can preach effectively a message which has some badly outworn factors in it, and can even persuade many of his hearers that those items which a growing faith has most fully discredited are absolutely essential to their salvation. This is one of the humorous aspects of religion which does not in the least impair the vital seriousness of its central theme.

I can assure Bro. Sweeney that my pleasure in this correspondence has been genuine, and if I do not emphasize, as he does, the courtesy which has marked it, it is because I can conceive of no other spirit in which two brethren could approach a living theme. In conclusion, I can assure him that among the dangers quite as much to be feared by the church as the direct attacks upon the faith of the past, are the subtle elements of resistence to new and interpreting truth which the world has tested, welcomed and appropriated. May the good Spirit of truth save us from both dangers, and help us to contend earnestly for the faith once for all delivered to the saints, and at the same time to seek with open mind for all the new truth the widening years can bring.

To give happiness and to do good, there is our only law, our anchor of salvation, our beacon light, our reason for existing. All religions may crumble away; so long as this survives we have still an Ideal, and life is worth living. Nothing can lessen the dignity and value of humanity so long as the religion of love, of unselfishness and devotion endures; and none can destroy the altars of this faith for us, so long as we feel ourselves still capable of love. —Henri F. Amiel.

A Study of Conditions and Problems Confronting the West Side Missions

By Orvis F. Jordan

Our churches on the West Side of the city nearly all lie on a straight line from the Metropolitan to the Maywood congregation. This line is south of Madison street. North of the line, we have nothing for several miles and south of it is only the Douglas Park Church and the "anti" congregation on Kendall street south of the Cook County Hospital. The churches are all separated with a mile or two miles of space except the Metropolitan congregation and the Jackson boulevard. These are only two squares apart. The division of the old West Side church occurred under the ministry of J. H. O. Smith. No other great religious body in Chicago has two churches occupying the same territory.

The Douglas Park Church. School Building in Background.

The churches on the line west are: Monroe street, West End, Austin, Oak Park and Maywood. The Monroe street church erected the best building that our people have ever put up in Chicago though it still carries a heavy burden of debt. The Austin church was burned a year ago but a new building on a new location is now in the process of erection. The Oak Park church rents the armory for church services, their membership has decreased so that there is but little more than a score of resident members left.

The westward movement of the foreign speaking people is a fact to be reckoned with by our people. One by one our churches are feeling the squeeze. One of the largest Catholic churches in Chicago has been erected near our Jackson Boulevard church. All around it there is an increasing number of foreign peoples. What of the future of Jackson Boulevard, our largest church? If it is to be alive twenty-five years from now, it must take steps to win the English speaking children of their foreign neighbors. They already have a class for the Chinese in the Sunday-school. They will doubtless be able to elaborate a program that will be attractive to the new neighborhood that is forming.

The churches on the West Side receiving missionary aid are Douglas Park, West End and Maywood. Each field has its own problem which will serve to illustrate phases of the Chicago situation as a whole.

In Douglas Park we have been helping for fourteen years. The congregation has not grown into self-support nor has the Church Extension debt been paid. The people are more than usually tenacious in their devotion to the little church. They are mostly wage earners and none have any particularly large amount of this world's goods.

In their neighborhood in Douglas Park are other churches, some of them organized since we went in there. Both Methodists and Presbyterians have beautiful and commodious buildings but recently erected. Our own building is a little larger than a box car and would be taken by the casual observer for a tool shed. It is probably worse than no building at all. Contrasted with the surrounding buildings, it seems a hindrance to the development of the real estate interests of the community.

It is true that in Douglas Park, there are a large number of Jews; but they are recent comers. There are many Bohemians. The success of the Methodists and Presbyterians, however, demonstrates that we have simply not worked at the job right. They put enough outside money in gifts to insure the building of adaquate places of worship. They immediately departed from a position similar to ours, and came into a position of real effectiveness in the community. A new church building rightly located there would save the day yet. With no money in our care for building purposes, however, we must stand helplessly by and put money into the salary of a minister whom we compel to make bricks without straw.

Douglas Park has cost us nearly five thousand dollars. We will not say the money is wasted. The Sunday-school alone and its influence on the children is worth the money. The sermons preached even to the few have led men and women into the kingdom of God. We regret, however, that a wiser policy did not allow the larger success. Five thousand dollars in a building fourteen years ago would have brought a new opening to the church so that long since it would have been self-supporting and helping to build other churches.

At Maywood, we not only have a mission with the handicap of doing its work in a hall but also facing a local situation of much seriousness. Maywood is a suburb of small homes. City men have moved their families here and have bought homes on the installment plan. This class of men will never pay out except with the most rigid economies. One of their economies is not to give anything to churches. As they have personal pride, they will not use an organization which they cannot support. Hence they are alienated from the church by the very sense of pride.

The Maywood church has also illustrated in the past the factious tendencies that characterize most of our city life. We are so divided in language, manners and customs that in all social groups the keenest rivalry between factious leaders becomes apparent. The principle of "majority rule" becomes established in a congregation only after the local pope is removed from office and sometimes from the church. There have not been lacking popes in Chicago so absolute in their infallibility that the preacher must consult his superiors about the hymn numbers.

Maywood is a factory town. The people who do not work in Chicago, work in the great factories here. The hand-workers of Chicago are alienated from the church and suspicious of the preacher.

Maywood has had a number of additions the past year and has developed in every way. It will require much patience, however, to make it a self-supporting church.

The West End Church is the youngest of the West Side missions. It is in a predominantly American community which gives the church a great chance. These communities recruited from the country districts, are sometimes in the greatest moral danger. They come to the vanities and temptations of city life very much unprepared to meet them. The cheap theatre in the West End district has mobs of people besieging its doors for admission while the church is but half-filled. It is notorious in Chicago that it is not the city-born child that goes wrong for he has come to understand his environment but the country lad or lass who suddenly faces problems too large for them.

The West End preacher, C. M. Kreidler, declares that there are more unchurched disciples in this neighborhood than are in the church. Why will they not take membership in a church of undoubted orthodoxy? Why will former elders and deacons live isolated from the church? The pastors down state may never have notified the city pastor of the arrival of the new member and he grew cold and isolated. Perhaps the down state man never had a personal experience of religion. His city environment brings this to the light. He may have come into the church on a wave of emotional evangelism and is not able to work without the hurrah. In any case our West End church would now be self-supporting if only the members in the community would do their duty.

On the West Side we have two churches that have come into self-support in ten years. New buildings have been erected. The cause has advanced. But what we might have done is a thought that takes the triumph out of our recital.

Next week we shall study the South Side where we have the most churches and the biggest problems.

The Disciples and Other Religious Bodies

An unfortunate chapter in the history of the Disciples has been the partisan and controversial relationship between them and other bodies of Christians. It was not the original place or purpose of the founders of the movement to array themselves against the rest of religious society as a rival and antagonistic party; but rather to operate among, and as far as possible, in coöperation with, existing religious parties as a reconciling and peace-making agency.

Thomas Campbell professed, in the Declaration and Address, the most fraternal attitude toward his brethren "throughout all the churches," "of all denominations." "Our attitude, therefore, with respect to all the churches of Christ is perfectly amicable. We heartily wish their reformation, but by no means their hurt or confusion." He defined the Christian Association of Washington as a "society formed for the express purpose of promoting Christian unity, in opposition to a party spirit."

The Original Impulse.

The original impulse of the movement, if we consult the Declaration and Address, the centennial of whose publication the Disciples are about to celebrate, was a desire for Christian union. The earliest declaration of the Disciples as to other religious bodies was that they are essentially Christian. The notion that they are not Christian came as a legal fiction and technicality in the course of sectarian warfare, a full generation after the writing of the Declaration and Address, and was never affirmed by either the Campbells or any acknowledged leader of the progressive wing of the movement. The legalism that defined Christianity as an "external order of things," and identified the church as an institution by external marks, and that fixed the status of the Christian by his relation to a visible organization, was repudiated by the Disciples when they repudiated the principle of the anti-organ and anti-missionary party. Alexander Campbell, once for all, placed the emphasis upon the spirit of scripture, instead of the letter, upon real instead of formal discipleship, when in 1837 he defined a Christian as "one that believes in his heart that Jesus of Nazareth is the Messiah, the Son of God; repents of his sins, and obeys him in all things according to his measure of knowledge of his will." That definition Christianized at once the whole pedobaptist brotherhood, and was a clear confirmation of the view and spirit of the Declaration and Address.

A People of Open Heart.

If I were to fashion in marble a statue to represent the original and fundamental purpose of the Disciples, it would be the representation of Fraternity, the figure of a man with extended open hand, ready to grasp the hand of another. Such is the interpretation I am obliged to make of their historic literature. From the beginning they have stood in the attitude of one conscious of the presence of another. They have no meaning apart from other Christians. The very terms of their leading principle of union, imply more than one of a kind. They came because there were other Christians; their reason for being is the being of others.

The Disciples, therefore, can not go on in the world as if there were no other Christians. Any other body of Christians, as the Methodists or Presbyterians, might do so and not stultify themselves, but not so the Disciples. No other people in the religious world are committed by their origin and purpose to the principle of religious solidarity. The logic of their principles lands them in a position of ecclesiastical socialism. They dare not live unto themselves, and then preach against the sin of separatism. They incriminate themselves when they do so. They must keep faith with the religious world, and be true to the meaning of their existence. The ignoring of other churches or Christians in the community—avoiding them as if they were aliens, proselyting from them as if they were apostate, compassionating them as if they were outside the covenanted mercies of God—is conduct utterly unjustifiable in a Disciple. The Disciples are in every community to make religious peace, not to declare religious war.

A Peace Society.

The Disciples are a peace society; what have they to do with the issuing of declarations of war in the form of challenges to debate, or with forging the implements of religious conflict and instruments of denominational torture? What business have they sharpening the horns of a logical dilemma on which to hang a Baptist, or with which to gore a Presbyterian.

The Disciples are a peace society; why should they refuse to coöperate with any other peace society, or withhold approval from any other peace plan? Why should they make war on a peace program just because it did not originate with them or agree in every particular with their program? The end in view is peace, not a peace program or a peace society. The program and the society are but means to an end; the sacred thing, the divine thing is peace.

When the Disciples Fail.

Others can fail in Christian courtesy, in ecclesiastical friendship, but not the Disciples. When they fail in friendliness and fraternity toward other Christians, they have failed utterly and have forfeited all claim upon the respectful consideration of men. They advertise themselves to the religious world as discoverers of the divine, the revealed cure for sectarianism. Thou who sayest that thou hast found the cure for sectarianism and division, art thou sectarian? Art thou divided? Thou who hast boasted all thy days that thou hast been chosen of God to lead all his children into brotherly fellowship and coöperation with each other; art thou always brotherly in thy fellowship with his children, and art thou always found cooperating with them when they federate to strengthen the kingdom of God in a community?

Above all Christians the Disciples should be brotherly toward others. That is their peculiar business in the world. They ought to have been studying and practicing all the acts of brotherly love and fellowship during the hundred years of their existence, and be ready now to demonstrate to the world their mastery of their profession. Every Disciple should be the embodiment of Christian fraternity, and count himself appointed a fraternal delegate in Christendom. He should be spreading fraternity among the churches as a contagion. He ought to know the whole vocabulary of Christian brotherhood, and be able to quote every fine sentiment in secular literature and every passage in sacred scripture bearing upon the theme. He should know its entire anthology, as he knows his alphabet; and be able to express it in tone of voice, beam of countenance, and magnanimity of conduct.

Preaching and Practicing Unity.

During the last hundred years the Disciples have been talking about their plan and principle of Christian union as if it were something that ought to be easily caught by other Christians; they should begin at the opening of the second hundred years so to preach and practice it as to make it "catching." It should be made to work such wonders among their own churches and in the lives of their own people that others would feel an irresistible need for it. I have heard Christian union preached in such bitterness and antagonism of speech as to make it positively hateful. It ought to be made to appear what it really is: a sweet and delightful thing. It can be so presented, even in speech; but, when the speech is reinforced by the life and conduct, the theme can become doubly persuasive.

If the Disciples really believe in the greatness and divineness of their mission to the religious world, as reconcilers and peacemakers, they should lose no opportunity and spare no effort to impress it upon the world. If they have failed heretofore in making an impression of single-hearted devotion to unity and fraternity it is because they have not always practiced what they preached.

The record of a hundred years of effort to persuade the people of God to be reconciled to each other on the basis of a restored primitive church does not look reassuring for the success of Christian union. A hundred years of effort, with one notable achievement to their credit in the union of the followers of Stone and Campbell, with many failures in negotiations with Baptists, Free Baptists, and Congregationalists, do not afford great encouragement on first thought. At this rate the unification of Christendom is likely to cost many centuries. Suppose it does, it is still worth all it costs. No great achievement ever comes quickly or easily.

The Disciples have not always realized it, but the task they are working at is the task the church has been engaged in since the day of Pentecost. It is no less than the bringing in of the kingdom of God. Unity will come no faster than the kingdom of God comes. If that be true, then God has had many agencies at work on the problem of union through all the history of the church. Whoever or whatever hastens the coming of the kingdom helps on the final unity.

Religious Education

By Harry F. Burns

The Primary Purpose of the Sunday-school

What is the primary purpose of the Sunday-school? A clearly defined answer to this question is of first importance. Clearness of aim will determine what we shall teach and how we shall teach it. Confusion or error in our purpose will inevitably result in confusion or error in all the work of the school.

When Robert Raikes gathered the children from the pin factories of Gloucester, England, in 1784, his purpose was two-fold. He sought first, in a small measure at least, to provide for the educational training of these poor children, who were denied all other opportunities to learn even the rudimentary subjects. As of scarcely less importance was his purpose to keep the pupils from the evils to which Sunday, with its freedom from factory work and with no other entertainment, strongly tempted them.

The first tendency of the Sunday-school when it was introduced into America, immediately after the revolutionary war, was to take the direction of the schools in England, and to gather in only the poor and unfortunate children. But the church saw her opportunity and incorporated the Sunday-school as a part of her regular work, not only for the poor children, but for those of all classes. Thus the Sunday-school has come to be a regularly organized part of the many-sided activity of the church. What of its purpose as it exists today? It is given a place of equal if not greater importance than the preaching service, or the prayer meeting. How does its purpose differ from these? What is its peculiar function?

The Teaching Service.

Is it not that in the preaching service and the prayer meeting the primary purpose is worship, inspiration, with instruction as only a secondary aim; while in the Sunday-school, instruction is primary with worship secondary? The element of worship must find a place in the Sunday-school service. There must be the singing of songs, prayer, and the devotional spirit, or the school comes short of its opportunity; but instruction must be given first place. The Sunday-school is then, or should be primarily an educational institution. Its chief, primary, fundamental purpose is educational.

The Sunday-school differs from other educational institutions in that its primary aim is religious. Religious instruction is not provided by the public or state schools and in some instances direct religious instruction is expressly prohibited. The Bible may not be read in the Chicago public schools, nor taught in some of the leading state universities. But the religious development of the human spirit is a part of a well-rounded education. It is the most important part. This particular phase of education which is neglected by the public schools, is the special task of the church. It is her task and her opportunity. To accomplish this task then is the primary purpose of the Sunday-school.

Confusion of Aim.

One who is acquainted with the facts will hardly urge that this aim has always been kept clearly defined in the mind of the church. Other and less worthy ideals have sometimes been given the greater prominence. So often has it been sounded in our ears that eighty-five per cent of the people who join our churches come from the Sunday-school, that many times the church has lost sight of the higher ideal and thought of the Sunday-school chiefly as a recruiting agency for the church. The Sunday-school is made the means, of which a strong church organization is the end. But this is to make the mistake of thinking that the child exists tor the church rather than the church for the child. The harm that results is like that which always follows when men are made mere means instead of ends. It is to use personality, the thing of greatest worth, to attain ends of much less worth. The answer to the position is, "the Sabbath was made for man and not man for the Sabbath."

The name "Bible-school," often applied to this educational institution of the church, indicates another confusion in our thought of its purpose. The purpose of the school is not primarily the teaching of the Bible, but rather religious education. The Bible must have a large place in that work; but it will be used only as a means, of which the religious education of the youth is the end. Where the purpose of the Sunday-school, as defined above, is clearly held in mind, the Bible will not be thought of as so much milk or meat to be given the child at each meal; but as a great store house to which the teacher can go and select the special kind of food needed for her particular pupil or class. The child, its interests, its abilities, will determine just what shall be brought it from this store house; for not everything here is equally adapted to its needs. Skill in teaching consists in knowing those needs and being able to select and present just the things that are needed to satisfy them.

The Place of Emphasis.

Some years ago, Professor George A. Coe pointed out in his book, "Education in Religion and Morals," that there are three elements in all educational work, viz., an immature being to be educated, a goal or end of education, and a mature being to help the immature being reach that goal. In the middle ages the emphasis of the church was upon the goal which was conceived as eternal salvation. More recently the chief thought has been of the mature being. The thoughts that were interesting and valuable to the mature person were thought to be good for the child. So we had the catechism as a statement of what the mature person thought true. This was to be presented bodily to the child. What torture for the child! Children were forced to eat meat because meat was good for the older person. Today the emphasis has changed, and the child is the center of educational thought and activity. It furnishes the standard of educational procedure. The laws of its being are the laws of education. The teacher's first studies her class, its needs, its capacities, its characteristics; and then chooses what she will teach and how she will present it. Its development is the end which she seeks.

The church has taken the same point of view, and the best thought of the church today is focused upon the religious development of the children who are in her care. The child is the center, it furnishes the norm, its development is the end of the educational work of the church. Better then, is a small school which accomplishes this end for its pupils, than the large school which fails in this its primary purpose. Even though the latter brings a large number into the church, that does not prove its success, for the end is not church membership, but the development of the child. Nor is the child's knowledge of the Bible always necessarily a test of the success of the school. It may be able to name the books of the Bible, repeat the names of the apostles, give an account of the ten plagues of Egypt in their order, and yet not have gained much that helps it in its religious development.

Means Not End.

It may be that we can attain the ultimate purpose best by teaching the Bible. This is doubtless true. No other material is so rich in spiritual value. But it is means and not end.

With this purpose—the religious education of the child—before us, what questions press for answer! What are the characteristic needs, capacities and interests of the child at each period of its development? What part of the Bible should be presented at each period? How can this be best presented? What is the injury done by presenting unsuitable material to a child at any given time? Where shall we get the teachers to do their work as here viewed? Where can we get the helps these teachers and the pupils will need for this sort of work? And the man able to superintend such a school—where can we find him? How can he give it the necessary time? Does this look to a time when the churches shall have a teaching minister as well as a preaching minister? These and many similar questions will be faced in this department, "Religious Education." Next week we shall present the plan of the international Sunday-school committee for a new graded curriculum.

"As Good As Gold"

The day that I was five years old
I though I'd be as good as gold.
I promised mother, as I stood there,
All dressed up, on a parlor chair,
That I would do my very best
To act as well as I was dressed.

She told me when my party came
To think of others in the game,
To let my visitors go first,
To take the smallest piece and worst,
And see that others had enough,
And not be greedy, cross, or rough.

But I forgot it once or twice,
And then my manners were not nice.
So when they'd gone she shook her head;
"As good as silver," mother said.
But—when I grow to six years old,
I know I'll be "as good as gold."

Sewing on a Button

"Marian," called mamma from her chamber, "will you sew the button on grandpa's coat, please? My head aches so I can't."

"Won't another time do?" answered a doleful voice from the depths of a book. "I've just come to the last chapter, and it's so exciting!"

"No, dear," said mamma, "grandpa is going to town in a few minutes, and must have his coat. He saved the button. It is in one of the pockets."

Marian often sewed on grandpa's buttons. She was proud of knowing how. Only today, she would rather finish her story first. Reluctantly she got her workbag, threaded a big needle with coarse black thread, found the button in the pocket, and taking the coat in her pink gingham lap began to sew.

But her head was still full of her story, as she took the first stitches. Then she came to herself with a start.

"Oh, dear!" she exclaimed in dismay, "I've sewed clear through the coat! And I've put the knot on the wrong side instead of on the right, under the button."

But she was so anxious to get back to her book that she would not stop to cut if off and begin over again.

Through and through the four holes of the button, and way through the cloth to the wrong side, flashed her needle. Then she fastened the thread on the wrong side too in big stitches, and snipped it off.

"There!" she said, "it's on!"

But she never had sewed on one of grandpa's coat-buttons like that before. Not a stitch ought to have been visible on the wrong side any more than on the right. Marian knew that. "But it won't show," she assured herself.

"Thank you, my dear," said grandpa, as he hurried on the coat. "I don't believe every little girl can sew on a button as well as you can." And he rushed off to catch his train.

Marian sat down with her book again. But she didn't enjoy the chapter as much as she had expected. Grandpa's last words haunted her. She hadn't sewed on that button as well as she could.

"Captain!" a voice hailed grandpa on the city street. "We want you to get your picture taken."

"What for?" demanded the captain startled.

"To put in the paper," explained his friend. "They are going to give a history of our regiment, Memorial Day, and your picture must go with that." For grandpa had been the hero of his regiment.

The captain objected. But the other prevailed, and he unwillingly found himself before the photographer's camera. Just as he sat down he unbuttoned his coat and threw back the lapels. He felt more comfortable so.

"An excellent likeness," every one said, and Marian was eager to see the Memorial Day paper. There was the fine old face she knew so well, and there——

"Oh!" Marian caught her breath with a gasp. There were all those clumsy stitches for every one to see! "And I thought they wouldn't show," she sobbed; "because they were on the wrong side, I thought it wasn't any matter."

"It's all right," comforted grandpa. "I don't care about a few threads."

But Marian was not consoled. She cut grandpa's picture out of the paper and pinned it up where she could see it every day. And after that, when she felt like being careless about a thing because she thought it wasn't going to show, a look at those pictured stitches was enough.—Alice M. Farrington, in Sunday-school Times.

Jacko's Kitten

Jacko, the monkey, had ideas of her own as to the proper treatment of cats. When this queer little monkey, which had been brought all the way from Africa, first entered her new home there was no cat in the family.

Soon, however, a Persian kitten arrived. It would have been natural enough if Jacko had shown jealousy, but she did not. The sight of the kitten seemed rather to please her than otherwise. One day the kitten strayed out on the back porch, where Jacko lived. Beauty eyed the monkey doubtfully, and then crept along close to the wall, so as to pass her at a safe distance. Jacko chattered, grinned, stood up, and rubbed her head, which is her way of asking for what she wants. Then she stretched out her arms toward the kitten, dancing and straining at her chain in wild eagerness. But arms and chain together were a trifle too short to reach Beauty, who had stopped to see what all the fuss was about. Still Jacko chattered, grinned, jumped up and down, rubbed her head, and stretched out her arms in vain; for all this did not bring the kitten any nearer. She sat quietly against the wall and winked at poor Jacko, as if to say, "No, thank you. I would rather stay where I am."

By and by Jacko put on her thinking cap. She suddenly remembered that she had a very useful tail. So down she flung herself on the floor, stretching out her chain at one end, her tail at the other. In one second more the tip of that tail curled round an astonished kitten. Then she was hauled in like a flash at the tend of a line, until the delighted Jacko clasped her safely in her arms. Beauty squealed and struggled, but Jacko held fast.

"Oh, ma'am," called the cook. "Jacko has got the kitten!"

The mistress hurried to the spot, fearful for her gentle little Persian, and what do you suppose she say? A kitten hugged closely to the monkey's bosom in the most motherly fashion possible, while Jacko's delighted face was being rubbed gently over its fur. A happier monkey never was seen. Her eyes gleamed and her usual loud chattering was lowered to a crooning chuckle. Jacko's mistress looked on, almost as much pleased as Jacko herself. But the monkey feared that the kitten would be taken from her, so she stood up, still hugging her captive and stroking its fur softly and gently.

"O Jacko!" laughed her mistress. Jacko grinned, chattered, and continued to clasp the kitten with one hand, while with the other she rubbed the top of her head very, very hard indeed, and her comical brown face was full of entreaty.

Beauty by this time had ceased to cry or struggle, and instead was nestling against Jacko and purring with all her might. Their mistress looked on for some time, full of interest and amusement. Then she left the strangely matched pair together, but still kept them in sight. From that day Jacko took the kitten under her protection, adopting her as her daughter, and the kitten was more than contented to have it so. Every day, and all day, Beauty kept close to Jacko; sometimes hugged up in Jacko's arms like a baby, sometimes nestled against her. Every night when bedtime came Jacko tucked the kitten under her arm and carried her up the pillar to her bed, where the two slept happily together. As the weeks rolled by Beauty became too heavy for Jacko to carry, but by then she was able to climb the pillar for herself. So time passed on, and still Jacko and Beauty were always together. For their bed in cool weather a nice moss-lined box, with a roof to keep out the rain, was placed on the roof of the porch.

One morning Jacko sat on the edge of the roof, and chattered as hard as she knew how. She talked excitedly to the cook and then when no attention was paid to her, scolded her well. Presently the mistress came out on to the porch, and then Jacko's excitement rose higher and higher. She chattered, grinned, danced up and down, ran to the box, looked in, and chattered faster than ever.

At last she thrust her arm into the box and ran back to the edge of the porch, hugging something to her bosom—a tiny, tiny kitten. Back went Jacko and brought another to show to her mistress. Of course the box was lifted down on the porch and then Beauty, her kittens, and Jacko were happy together. It was a comical family party. Of course Jacko helped to bring up those kittens. Was not their mother her adopted daughter, and therefore were not the kittens her grandchildren? When the babies crawled out of their box, it was Jacko who tenderly put them back. When their mother went out for a walk, it was their grandmother Jacko who stayed at home and took care of the babies. When the kittens were big enough to eat, Jacko shared her meals with them. She loved them, but she loved Beauty more.—McCall's Magazine.

The Flowers on the Teacher's Desk

EMMA C. DOWD.

"I'm going to carry Teacher some pinks tomorrow," said Grace. "We have a big bed of them in our yard." "I'm going to take her some beautiful roses," said Clarice. "Mamma says I may go to the greenhouse and select them." Antonie did not speak. She was wishing she had some flowers to give the pretty teacher, to whose room she had just been promoted; but she lived in a flat, and there was not a bit of ground anywhere about. When she reached the great entrance, she said good-by to her schoolmates, and ran quickly upstairs. She was so glad they did not ask her if she was going to carry flowers to the teacher.

That afternoon, when she and Mamma were out for a walk, she repeated what Grace and Clarice had said. "Can't I buy just a few roses at the greenhouse?" she begged. "I am afraid I cannot spare you any money for that," Mrs. Bradin replied. "But never mind, I have thought of something even better. I think the wild flowers are not all through blooming yet. We will walk out toward the country, and see what we can find." "There won't be any roses; will there?" asked Antonie, sadly. "No; it is too late for wild roses. But I recollect seeing some tansy by the side of the road, the other day, when I took the trolley to Wallingford." "Oh," cried Antonie, "I'm afraid we can't find anything pretty by the side of the road!" "Tansy is pretty." "How does it look? Did I ever see any?" "I presume you've seen it. The blossoms grow on a tall stalk—a cluster of little gold buttons." "That sounds pretty," said Antonie, brightening a little. Antonie and her mother did not mind long walks, and after awhile the city street merged into a country road, and finally in the distance Mrs. Bradin spied the big clumps of tansy. At first Antonie feared they were not just the right kind of flowers to carry to the pretty, new teacher; but her mother was so sure that she would like them that she gathered a large bunch of them. The leaves wilted a little before they reached home, but the next morning they were as bright as ever, and the little girl carried a few stalks of the yellow blossoms—by her mother's advice, not quite as many as she would have chosen. "Seven are better than seventy," Mamma had said; so Antonie had only seven. "Oh, that beautiful tansy!" exclaimed the pretty teacher, when it was put into her hand, and she buried her nose in it at once. Now Antonie did not quite like the odor, and she was greatly surprised to see the teacher drawing in deep breaths of the pungent fragrance. "Did you gather this for me yourself?" the young lady asked. "Mamma and I," answered Antonie. "Well, I had been wishing for some; but I didn't know where to find it. It grows in my home up in Vermont and I hadn't seen a mite since I came away. Thank you ever and ever so much. I think I shall have to beg an invitation to go with you and your mother on some of your country walks." Then, of course, Antonie said that they should be delighted to have her with them, and she went to her seat in a flutter of joy. The pinks and the roses had place on the teacher's desk beside the tansy, but Antonie fancied that it was the tansy which she looked at oftenest and most lovingly.

Woman's Sphere

—Dr. Anna Gloss of the Mission of the Methodist Woman's Board in Peking, was for fifteen years family physician to the late viceroy, Li Hung Chang. She is a woman of great ability, keeping abreast of her profession even at that remote post, and in recognition of her services Lady Li established a free dispensary for women and children in Tien Tsin.

—The wife of Asquith, the British Premier, is believed to have furnished the model for E. F. Benson's "Dodo." The book contains many speeches suppposed to have been quoted literally. The portrait of Dodo, as given by the author, is that of a shallow, irresponsible woman, with impulses of kindliness, but with no real feeling. Mrs. Asquith has placed her husband in a number of embarrassing positions and recently roused the ire of British tradesmen by turning the official residence in Downing street into a show room for Parisian gowns and millinery. Parisian models were brought over to exhibit the "creations" under the eye of an eminent man milliner, invitations were sent out to a select company, and tea was served while the fashions were studied, the French models also being served. It called forth scathing denunciations from many mercantile and manufacturing firms who denounced the proceeding as unpatriotic and opposed to the interests of the British working classes. Between embarrassment at home and suffragette pickets abroad, the path of the premier is not strewn with roses. Mrs. Asquith is a sister of Mrs. Henry M. Stanley.

—Mrs. Charlotte Carmichael Slopes has just been appointed lecturer on fossil botany in the University of Manchester. Mrs. Slopes first gained her degree in botany in Edinburgh and was the first woman to attain a degree of botany at the University of Munich which was conferred on her in 1892. She then went to Japan traveling its "unbeaten tracks," usually alone, occupied in exploration in which she made scientific discoveries of such importance that her reports have been collected and arranged for publication by the Royal Geographical Society. She is conceded to stand first in the world in her knowledge of fossil botany.

—Mrs. Kelly, a dressmaker in Crawfordsville, Ind., has but one arm and that the left. The right arm was crushed when she was a child six years old and had to be amputated. Losing it so early in life she learned to get on without it. She was so successful that she had to employ three or four assistants, and her customers were obliged to send in their orders several months in advance. She did all the cutting and fitting herself, the customer assisting by holding one end of the tape measure for her. Her memory was as remarkable as her pluck and skill, for all the measurements for a fitting were taken and jotted down afterwards. The fine sewing, shirring and gathering she also did herself, never leaving this to her assistants. She threaded her needle by running it into the empty sleeve to which she also fastened her work when she sewed. She is a young woman of slight physique and not robust strength, but she is an example of what one can do under almost hopelessly discouraging circumstances.

The Hero

One who never turned his back, but marched breast forward,
Never doubted clouds would break,
Never dreamed, though right were worsted,— wrong would triumph,
Held we fall to rise, are baffled to fight better,
Sleep to wake.

—Robert Browning.

The Sunny Side

The kine lie on the leeward side,
  The lambs and chickens in the sun;
Old Puss and Carlo sit bestride
  The streak of light their choice has won.

So should it be with humankind,
  In matters of the heart and life;
Crowd out the darkness, light to find—
  Seek peace amid the rage of strife.

Our lot deep-shadowed may have been,
  Our way hedged up through loss and shame,
But faith and hope the day will win—
  Our God forgives in love's dear name!

Cares, sorrows, troubles multiply,
  And we resolve for good each day;
But resolutions fade and die—
  The heavens are brass whene'er we pray.

Our sunniest face we all should wear;
  Our sweetest thoughts the heart should fill;
Our kindest speech dear lives should share,
  And thus all souls with pleasure thrill.

Life is too short to waste in tears,
  When joy and gladness wait to guide;
There is no health or strength in fears,
  No cloud but has its silver side.

The dark is needful as the light,
  The rain and cloud as sunny skies;
Misfortunes, trials, clear our sight,
  Whatever good their voice denies.

If in our hearts, our friends, our lot,
  Our search should be for brighter things;
Such should we find, nor dearly bought
  Would be the joy such wisdom brings.

THE FINDING OF CAMILLA

By Lucie E. Jackson, author of "Feadora's Failure," "For Muriel's Sake."

CHAPTER XIV (Continued)

They Meet a Friend.

Then, followed by his dogs and with Taras in his coat, he walked up the pathway and stepped into the cottage.

The sight that met him cheered his heavy heart somewhat. Camilla was seated by a glowing fire of peat and wood, a basin of hot bread and milk lay beside her, and on the table close by was a loaf, half a pound of butter and a steaming teapot of tea.

"Come in, sir, and sit ye down. It's lucky the kettle was boiling and the milk all hot in the pan just over from our own breakfast. The little miss looks better for it a'ready."

"She does indeed!" The Frenchman spoke in such an unmistakably heartfelt fashion that the good woman was moved.

"It's ye, too, sir, that need something warming. Sit ye down, sit ye down." And as Pierre seated himself at the small table, she hospitably placed before him a cup of hot tea and buttered and cut with a lavish hand a slice from the loaf.

The color crept into Camilla's cheeks and the brightness to her eyes, seeing which Pierre grew more content.

The good woman was not satisfied until she had seen the whole party supplied with food. Bread and milk were produced for the dogs, and Taras crept willingly out of his shelter when he smelt something good to eat.

Payment she would accept of none, though at the close of the meal Pierre tendered it with the delicacy that only a Frenchman can.

"My husband and son be in good work; they be employed on a big job that will take them over a year, at Mr. Sinclair's," she announced, pushing away the coins that Pierre had produced.

The Frenchman rose from his seat at her words; they but filled him with a desire to push on his way. What might not happen if the crafty-looking Italian learnt that those who had fled from him had halted at the cottage in the wood! He would surely follow at a pace that would soon overtake them.

"Deary me! deary me! you ought to rest awhile longer," the good woman pleaded, seeing as she spoke Camilla's look of patient resignation as she slipped off her seat.

Pierre saw it too, but, though sorry for her, he remained firm. They had many miles to go, he said, and must set out at once if their generous hostess would permit them to do so.

"Well, well, if ye must go, ye must, and it's not for me to say ye nay," she returned, helping to wrap Camilla in her cloak again.

So Chicot was untethered and re-harnessed, Mrs. Josiah Brown herself putting Camilla into her seat and tucking the rug warmly round her knees.

"A little queen in her kerridge she looks, the dear! If ever ye come this way again, sir, mind ye look on me and Brown. It'll pleasure us more than I can tell ye," were her parting words.

And with her motherly voice ringing in their ears the procession started on its way again.

The sight of her unexpected visitors filled Mrs. Brown's thoughts all that day, and when evening brought her husband and son home she was full of what had occurred in the morning.

During a pause in her talk her son said quietly—

"I think, mother, if ye be willing, we'll say naught more about the little maid and her grandfeyther."

Josiah looked up wonderingly. "What's amiss, lad?" he inquired. "But ye be always a quiet chap and can't abear chatter."

"It ain't that," returned his son. "But maybe 'tis my quietness that bodes good to some folks. It be only this, that there's a gentleman—a dark, furrin'-lookin' gentleman—stayin' up wi' Mr. Sinclair, who be ter'ble interested in them. I can't say myself that I likes the looks of him. The master was givin' me his orders for to-morrow's work just afore I left, when the furrin'-lookin' gentleman bursts in, and, says he, in a voice loud and full of anger, as seemed to me, 'I knew the fellow was a villain. They left the place last night, I am told, and no one knows where they have gone. I suspected him of some such design. The landlady of the inn directed him to bring his rascally dogs here, but he knew better than to place himself in such a trap.' And then he swore in some furrin' language.

"I don't know what made me think of the old man and the little 'un; perhaps it was his mention of the dogs, but I knew in a minute that he meant the campin'-out party as we passed this mornin'.

"Mr. Sinclair turns sudden to me and arsks whether I'd seen them. I didn't tell him no, and I didn't tell him yes. I said me and feyther comed through the wood this mornin' and not by the high road. He didn't arsk me no more, and they went out both together, the furrin'-lookin' gentleman seemin' ready to foam at the mouth with disappointment."

"You be a queer chap," said Josiah, regarding his son half admiringly, half curiously. "There's many a one who'd up and say just what he'd seen, if on'y to have the pleasure of hearin' his own voice."

"May be, but they was your visitors, feyther. You'd arsked them to take a rest and a cup o' tea at your house, and 'twasn't your son who was goin' to split on them. If the old man's done evil, then he'll be caught some time or other, but if he's done naught wrong, 'twon't be my hand as does him harm."

"'Tis right you are, son," said both his parents.

And the matter dropped.

CHAPTER XV.

The Man in the Black Cloak.

It was evening once again, and Pierre's party were still winding their way through the wood. The Frenchman was in no hurry to leave it. The sun had risen hot through the day, and Camilla had begged to be released from her carriage. Hither and thither she had flown, picking the delicate wild blossoms that grew in myriads around.

At noon they had halted to rest and to eat the midday meal which Pierre had supplied himself with before leaving the inn: bread and cheese for himself, bread and ham in sandwich fashion for Camilla, and plain bread for the animals. But the bread was stale, and Camilla only nibbled at it, much to Pierre's concern.

"'Tis surely because you are tired, cherie," said he uneasily. eyeing the sandwiches, however, with much disfavour.

But Camilla shook her head and drank thirstily from the bottle of milk he held out to her. The hands that touched his as she returned him the half-empty bottle were hot and dry.

Pierre was miserable. What was he to do? Assuredly the night dews were answerable for that feverish touch. He determined to risk all and step into the main road, which he had been skirting the whole morning in the hope of encountering fewer people than he would otherwise do on the public highway.

But just as he had made up his mind that a roof must cover Camilla's head for that night, the sound of horses' feet, rising and falling in measured tread on the road below, made him pause and hold his breath.

Jacques' head was raised and his bristles rose, but his master's uplifted finger warned him that a bark from him, or from either of the other dogs, would meet with summary punishment.

Trot! trot! trot! It sounded like two horses in the distance, and Pierre felt his heart suddenly filled with a vague alarm.

"Mon enfant, mon enfant, depeches toi, a moi," he called softly to Camilla, who had wandered a few yards nearer the road.

Obedient as one of his animals, and as swift as a hare, the child fled back to him. Pierre pointed silently to the quantities of bracken that grew around. Quick of understanding, Camilla curled herself down amongst it drawing the dogs close beside her. Chicot and the carriage Pierre disposed of behind several thickly-growing trees and gigantic bracken.

Then the Frenchman climbed hand over hand into one of the tallest trees that commanded a good view of the road. There, through his leafy screen, he watched the riders draw nearer.

Two mounted constables in full uniform were riding past and talking loudly, and, as they swept along, their words were wafted to Pierre on the breeze.

"It's my full belief that the old man has doubled off the other way. I expect he is as full of tricks as a hare."

"Or as one of his own dogs," laughed the other. "However, we'll go a little further, and if so be we don't meet him——"

The remainder was lost to Pierre as the two men galloped on.

He drew a long breath. Without any doubt they were chasing him for no other reason than to rob from him the child that had been entrusted to his care.

"And it's no one's doing but the Italian's" said Pierre between his set teeth. "Would that I had never been near the place. He seems to be another villian from whom I must run; or can it be that he is in league with the other one?"

He had been climbing down from the tree, and as he reached the ground Camilla crept out of the bracken and her soft fingers clasped his hand.

'What is it?" she whispered. "You look —you look so fierce, Pierre. You make me frightened."

"Frightened, cherie! Never be frightened at thy Pierre. If I looked fierce, mon enfant, it was for thy sake and for one one else's. Mo foi, I would that I had thee landed safe with thy grandparents. I could then wag my little finger at all our pursuers. But till then we must hide our heads, petite, and feel our way cautiously."

As he finished speaking his sharpened ear caught the sound of other hoofs, coming from the direction that the constables had followed.

Back to her hiding-place Camilla stole, gathering the dogs in a large embrace, and Pierre sprang into the nearest branch. A solitary horseman was riding leisurely along with his gaze fixed straight ahead of him. Pierre could see him well, himseelf unseen.

One glance at the dark face of the rider, one look at the thin lips half hidden by the black moustache, and the Frenchman's heart jumped into his moutn, for the rider was no other than Roger Densham.

The sight of him—of the very man that he had been warned to avoid—made the muscles of Pierre's frame tense and rigid. He would fight—ay, fight to the very death before he abused the trust laid on him that memorable night.

But what was Roger Densham doing there? Was there, then, any connection between the Italian and Rexington Falconer's enemy.

It was with a heavy heart that he desided at length on spending another night in the forest. He felt safer there than on the high road. He looked earnestly at Camilla as he came towards her and made the suggestion; and when the child, with fingers holding his, said he was to do anything, oh! anything that would not part her from him, he reluctantly made up his mind that he could do nothing better.

"But she must sleep in my big coat tonight," decided Pierre, regarding the delicate face beside him with a pang. "Perhaps she wasn't warm enough the night before, for the wind blows cool when the dew falls, and I—why, I am tough and strong, with never an acne in my body, and I can well do without the coat."

So the evening stars came out, and the moon again looked down on the camping party. Camilla lay fast asleep in her carriage, with her cheek resting on her hand, her cloak enveloping her, with the warm rug tucked round her feet and Pierre's overcoat thrown lightly on the top of all. Jacques lay at her feet, obeying his masters word of command, and inwardly resolving to keep his ears open for every sinister sound that might come their way.

Pierre was lying on freshly-gathered twigs and leaves, forming a rough bed, but one that kept him high off the ground. Taras lay cuddled up in his coat; Chicot loy close, so close that through the long hours of uneasy slumber Pierre sometimes found his head resting on the goat's warm body; and Jules and Bebe lay at their master's feet.

CHAPTER XVI.

At Redhill.

That same evening, in the well-lighted library at Redhill, Mr. Sinclair sat with his two guests, Mr. Bartoletti and the newly-arrived visitor, Roger Densham.

The dark faces of the two gentlemen formed an odd contrast to their frank, fair-faced host, and one might have been excused for wondering what freak of fortune had brought these three together.

"You have heard me speak of Densham, I daresay," was Mr. Sinclair's easy introduction to the Italian. "He and I met on the Continent some years ago, and I am glad that he has at last found occasion to pay me his promised visit."

"To give a houseless wanderer room for one night is what I beg," returned the new visitor, showing his fine white teeth in a prominent smile.

If Roger Densham did not know the name of Mr. Bartoletti it cannot be said that the name of Roger Densham was unknown to the Italian, whose unmistakable start at his host's introduction was almost too patent to escape notice, especially the notice of so keen an observer as Roger Densham.

The gaze of Anita's uncle was quiet and searching as Mr. Sinclair and his new visitor talked, but his brain worked hard all the time. This, then, was the Roger Densham that he had heard so much about from his sister as being the evil genius of Rexington Falconer's life! Was this man in league with the Frenchman, and might it be with him that the child Camilla was hidden, of whose death Mr. Bartoletti would have given worlds to be assured.

Oh! to have actual proof that the child was no more! He would attempt to wheedle out what knowledge he could get when a favourable opportunity should occur.

Fortune was kinder to him than Mr. Bartoletti expected. Mr. Sinclair excused himself for leaving the two together at an urgent call from his bailiff, and the Italian drew himself together so as to lose no time.

"You were in that ill-fated vessel, I believe," he began, "The Fair Nancy, that struck on the Goodwin Sands a short time ago?"

Roger Densham nodded an affirmative, and Mr. Bartoletti continued in his musical voice—

"The fate of that ship concerned us very nearly as a family" (Mr. Bartoletti was always proud of linking himself with the Falconers.) "My late sister's brother-in-law met his death on that same occasion."

"Indeed!" Mr. Densham's politeness was growing exhausted. What cared he for this foreign-looking fellow's relatives?

Mr. Bartoletti's sharp eyes detected something of the other's thoughts, and his voice dropped to an insinuating tone as he said—

"You may perhaps have seen or known something of him, since you and he were fellow passengers."

He paused, and Mr. Densham's dark eyes looked into his with a bored expression.

"The man I mean was called Rexington Falconer," shot out the Italian at length, after a silence of half a minute.

The sudden start his companion gave amply repaid him for the half-insulting indifference just accorded him.

"Rexington Falconer! What do you know about him?" Mr. Densham questioned.

"What I told you just now," returned the Italian with cold deliberation, and watching the effect of his words. " He is—or, more correctly speaking, he was—my late sister's brother-in-law. You remember him on the boat?"

Mr. Densham again nodded an affirmative.

"Perhaps you knew him in days gone by?" continued Mr. Bartoletti with a crafty look.

"I did, sir. And what then?"

"Merely that it is interesting to meet with those who have been friends of our youth," said Mr. Bartoletti in his oiliest manner.

Receiving no reply he continued, his eyes fastened keenly on the other's face: "A child was with him on board that ship—his only child, a little girl. She was not drowned, we are assured of that but she disappeared on the night of the wreck, and has not been heard of since."

The Italian waited for some reply, but as none came he went on—

"She is supposed to have been carried off by a young Frenchman who was on board the ship, and who swam with her to the lifeboat. But on the safe return of the lifeboat to the shore the Frenchman and the child disappeared, and neither has been heard of since that night."

Still no reply, and Mr. Bartoletti was confirmed in his suspicion that the really guilty person was there before him. He little imagined that he was imparting news to the very man from whom, had he known, he would willingly have withheld it.

"There are those who would perhaps welcome the knowledge that the child is dead," continued the Italian in a half pondering tone, but the steely glitter in his eyes belied his apparent indifference.

Perhaps these same people would connive at her being put out of the way," said the other, with a barely perceptible sneer on his thin lips.

"Yes, if needs be," was the unexpected reply.

Roger Densham looked at the man before him. His somewhat callous nature stopped appalled at the calm cruelty uttered just now, disguising as it did in the flimsiest fashion something of the ferocity of the tiger. He himself had rarely shrunk from wrong-doing. He had gloated in the thought that he had help Rexington Falconer towards a downward course, but there was a limit to his badness, and Roger Densham drew the line a long way from murder or at the conniving of murder.

For some reason or other this foreign-looking gentleman with the Italian name had hoped to gain an accomplice in him; but there was no need to tell him at once that he had mistaken his man; rather would he encourage him to talk, and thus let him expose himself in his true colours. One thing Mr. Densham was assured of, and that was the Italian's unconcealed dislike to Rexington Falconer's child. There must be some reason for it; if possible he would draw him out.

In pursuance of this thought he leant back in his chair, saying calmly—

"And who are these that would wish the child out of the way?"

For once the Italian's astuteness deserted him. He had met his match in cunning without being aware of it. Believing he had gained an accomplice he replied without hesitation—

"Those to whom the inheritance falls if the child dies."

Not a quiver of the eyelid escaped his questioner. Putting his hands thoughtfully together he asked—

"And those are?"

"I would rather not mention—just at present," returned the Italian.

"No, not until you have 'cotched' your murderer." thought Densham to himself. "You haven't the slightest idea, I suppose, where the child is?" he said aloud.

Mr. Bartoletti looked keenly at him, but Densham's face revealed nothing. The Italian would have given worlds to know what lay behind that seeming impassiveness.

He spoke hesitatingly, weighing as it were each word. "I cannot say that I have—at least not now. I thought I had a few hours ago, but I think I may be wrong.

"How so?"

The Italian struggled with himself for awhile. The tables seemed turned; it was he who was now being questioned. He had no objection to it if matters fitted in as he wished, and if he could gain for himself so valuable an assistant as he knew Roger Densham might prove, if only because of his dislike to Rexington Falconer. It was on this solely that the Italian traded.

"You don't know yourself where the child is?" he summoned up courage to ask.

Roger Densham slowly shook his head: adding, however, with some energy, "I only wish I did."

"So do I." The Italian was again deceived. He augured too well from the energetic tone. He determined to explain matters. Roger Densham might prove to him a man of resource.

"An old musician has been visiting this village in company with his troupe of dancing dogs, a monkey, and a goat. The goat, when not performing, draws a small carriage in which is seated a little girl, a child of just about the age as the one I am seeking."

"She is the old musician's grandchild, I suppose?"

"So he says. But I have my doubts, for the child is reported to be very superior looking, and altogether different from what one might expect to see in the child of a street showman. Why may not that girl be Rexington Falconer's child?"

"Has she his face?" asked Densham.

"Ah! there I am at fault, for I cannot tell you, having never seen him."

"Describe the child," said Densham, abruptly.

"I cannot do that either, for I have not seen her."

"Pshaw! Then why make this ado? A traveling showman with his dancing dogs and his grandchild is surely not such an extraordinary thing to meet with nowadays."

"The fellow that took charge of her off The Fair Nancy had a perfomning dog—a poodle," returned Mr. Bartolleti somewhat doggedly.

"And this old man?"

"Has a performing poodle, too."

"What color?"

"A reddish, yellowp sort."

"The Frenchman's was white."

"He could dye it," returned the Italian, obstinately.

"The Frenchman was a young man. You say this one was old."

"Y—yes," returned Mr. Bartoletti, reluctantly.

"The Frenchman—I heard him speak on the ship—was truly French. What say you of this old man?"

"He talks the purest English," replied the Italian with still greater reluctance.

"And he seems old?"

"Almost infirm."

"Pooh! my dear fellow, you are knocking your head against a stone wall. Leave that old traveling showman alone, and look elsewhere for Rexington Falconer's child. What direction did you say they took when they left this village?"

"As near as I can make out they started on the Culworth Road. I did put the police on their track, but up till now they have not been able to discover them. These local police are so heavy and slow."

Mr. Bartoletti was beginning to think that perhaps his new acquaintance was right, when Mr. Sinclair came back, and the conversation turned on other things.

The next morning Roger Densham took his departure.

"Take my advice," he said in a low tone, as he shook hands with the Italian, "and look out in some more likely direction for the child you seek."

"I'll think it over," Mr. Bartolletti replied shortly. A night's rest had brought him to the unenviable state of thinking that he had been too expansive in his conversation to this briefly introduced acquaintance.

Mr. Densham read something of what was passing in his mind, but he only smiled as he mounted his horse and cantered down the avenue. Reaching the lodge gates, he threw a hasty glance over his shoulder towards the house, and, with a smile still about his lips, he turned his steed's head in the direction he had come last night.

"My time is my own," said he. " There would be no harm done if I followed the Culworth Road just to see if that scoundrelly foreigner's ideas are correct. What a cunning devil he is! I' faith, it wants a devil to match a devil, and I think the Italian met his match last night. He's a clever fellow to put two and two together in that way, but then he has something at stake."

CHAPTER XVII.

Guy Joins in the Search.

Guy flung his quoit into the air, and caught it before it fell.

"I've won!" he cried. "Algy, old chap, I'm sorry for you, but awfully glad for myself."

"Why?" asked Algy. "Pooh! it's hot. Let's go and sit under the shade of the mulberry tree."

"Well, now," he said, as his brother sat down beside him, "what's made you so glad to win that game. I never thought you could, you know. So infernally hot too!"

He fanned himself vigorously with his hat as he turned to look at Guy.

The latter's eyes were sparkling; his lips smiled.

"The sole reason I played," he said, "was to see if I had got back all my former strength. There is something in doctors' stuff after all. I'm proud of having beaten you, and you are no mean opponent, old chap. I said to myself, 'if I can beat Algy even by one point I shall know that Richard is himself again.'"

"Awfully pleased if my losing has made you so jolly," replied Algy with a laugh. "But for the life of me I can't understand why it has given you so much joy."

"You would understand fast enough if you could realise what I have endured just lying idly about the place at the doctor's orders, when I have been simply longing to assist in the search for Camilla," returned Guy.

"I wish I could go with you," said Algy, wistfully. "But that is impossible. Father has only given his consent for you because he thinks that the moving about will do you good. Oh! who's that coming along? It's Anita! And she's making straight for us. What a bore!"

Guy's face looked as if he echoed his brother's words, but he said nothing for his cousin was close upon them.

"Good morning, Anita," he said, rising from the bench beneath the mulberry, and doffing his straw hat. Guy was nothing if not scrupulously polite.

Algy gave her a nod, and continued to fan himself with greater vigour than before.

Anita Falconer was fifteen years of age, but her manners gave one the impression that she was a couple of years older. She was good looking, and bid fair to be tall and graceful. Something of her mother's Italian blood showed in her dark face, and she had inherited much of her uncle's secretive nature.

"How hot you both look," was her remark, as she sank gracefully down on the bench. "I suppose you have been playing quoits with the thermometer at 75."

"Oh, lor!" ejaculated Algy, "to think we've been such fools. Feel my pulse, Anita. Is it galloping too fast? I hope I'm not in for a fever."

"I hope you're not in for the lunatic asylum," returned Anita with a scornful curl of her upper lip. "Guy, how absurd of you to play on such a hot afternoon."

"He took a bet with himself, and he has won," said Algy, as Guy did not seem disposed to reply.

"A bet! About what?"

Algy shrugged his shoulders. "Ask him. He is—not of age, but he may yet tell you."

Anita turned inquiring eyes on her elder cousin, and Guy answered.

"Merely that this afternoon has proved to me that I am out of the doctor's hands, and I can now do what my heart has long been set on doing."

"And that is?" asked Anita.

"To join in the search for our lost little cousin Camilla," returned Guy, quietly.

An ugly look came into Anita's eyes, making her look curiously like her uncle Nicolo.

"As well set yourself to look for a needle in a hay stack," she said with a shrug of her shoulders. "My dear Guy, what can you do if everybody else has failed?"

"No matter. I'm going to set myself the task," returned Guy still in his quiet tone.

"Nothing venture, nothing win, Blaze away, and don't give in."

quoted Algy with a sly glance at Anita.

"Of course, one must wish you all sorts of luck," replied Anita, her eyes still betraying her resemblance to Mr. Bartoletti.

"I wish I were going with Guy," put in Algy. "Two heads are always better than one, you know, even though one of the two is a sheep's head."

Anita did not reply. Her gaze was fixed on the turreted gables of Rosslyn Towers, seen through the purple haze of a summer afternoon. A portion of the terrace, gay with flowers, caught her eye; then the spraying fountain, where the dappled shadows cast by sun and shade were reflected in the lily pond; and away in the distance of her mind's eye saw the rich park, and the fenced-in paddocks, the well-filled stables, and the beautiful home farm.

She was an artist by nature. All things beautiful appealed to her. But with this sense was another, and a still stronger one. Whatever appealed to her, she coveted; what she loved, she desired to possess. At this moment, as at all others, she desired to possess Rosslyn Towers, and all that accompanied it.

She suddenly looked at her watch. "I must be getting back," she said rising. "Uncle Nicolo is leaving home again this afternoon. Don't let me disturb you. I shall go in and say goodbye to Grannie first." With a little nod she walked away, and both her cousins looked after her.

"She doesn't like the idea of your going, does she?" half whispered Algy.

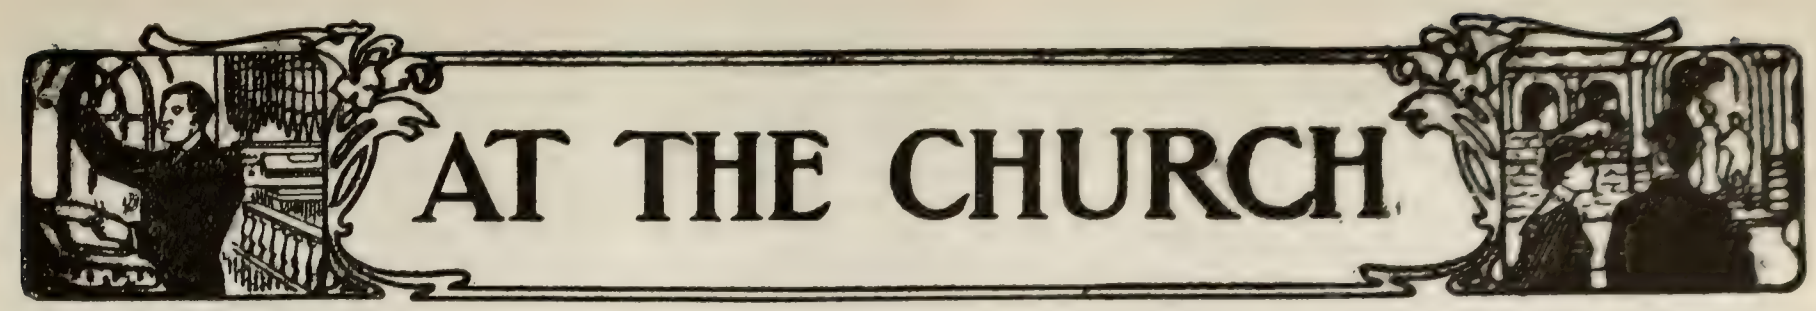
Guy shrugged his shoulders. "She is a strange girl," he answered. "I don't think any of us understand her. Her ideas so much resemble her Uncle Nicolo's. She isn't a bit like any of our family."

"Let's toss," said Algy. "Tails, Camilla is found; heads, she is lost." He flung a bright halfpenny up into the air as he spoke, then catching it as it fell enclosed it between his two palms, and holding out his hands to Guy cried, "Heads or tails?"

"Tails, of course," replied Guy scornfully.

"And tails it is, by jupiter! Here, qeep the halfpenny, Guy; it's a lucky one. I've always had a lot of good luck with that bright halfpenny whenever I've wanted to worst Mr. Bartoletti."

"Then let it worst Mr. Bartoletti once again," said Guy with a laugh, as he slipped the copper into his pocket.



The Gift of Gratitude

Thanksgiving is the heart a-flower—
From all the seeds of grateful thought;
'Tis melody in life's bright bower,
The birds of joy to us have brought!

Thanksgiving is the little child—
With glow of gladness in its face;
It is the man all undefiled—
Who shows to God manhood's grace!

—William Brunton.

Prayer Meeting

By Silas Jones

HOW TO TREAT THE ERRING.

Topic, Sept. 15. Gal. 6:1-10.

The church is a society of people who are trying to help one another and the world to do the will of God. For it, right is not an abstraction. A man is right when he is at one with the purposes of God as these have been made known to men. The good man seeks the highest welfare of persons. He asks what will help the one who does wrong, not how to put the sinner out of the fellowship of the church. If the sinner is not conscious of guilt, the good man does what he can to show him the injury he is doing to himself and to his fellow men. If it is weakness of will that accounts for the sin; the stimulus of companionship with noble spirits is sought for the offender.

"Looking to Thyself."

Sympathy is the key that unlocks the door to the heart. Mere prudence, which provides for escape from possible disgrace in the future, does not assist the understanding. Paul would be the last man to urge prudence as a sufficient reason for giving aid to one who has made a mistake. He has a deeper reason. An acquaintance with ourselves and our own weaknesses takes away the feeling of self-righteousness and makes us one with all who err in conduct. We can then appreciate the strength of the temptation to which another has yielded. We know the shame and the discouragement which came to him is a consequence of his sin. We can speak the word that enlightens and strengthens. On the other hand, if we have no sympathy for a man, the less we say of his faults, the fewer will be our misrepresentations of him. If you doubt this, listen to what an enemy of your dearest friend says about him. You will discover that he is blamed for circumstances over which he has no control. You will discover that deeds prompted by the purest motives are said to have had their origin in the mind of the angel of the bottomless pit. You are ready to call your friend's enemy a liar. A better thing to do is to reflect on the course you have followed with respect to persons whom you dislike and see, whether you have always spoken that which is right. Look to yourself that you may be fair and kind toward the erring.

"Bear Ye One Another's Burdens."

There are faults due to perversity of will, and there are faults due to ignorance. The church's business is to deliver men from both kinds. The immoral man and the unmoral man need help. Every one of us does wrong knowingly and every one of us omits duty because he does not know. Guilt attaches itself to conscious wrong. The word of the church should be clear and emphatic concerning the sin of neglecting known duty. No man lives who does not need the sharp spur of sound public sentiment to hold him in the path of rectitude. The best men display the weaknesses of the group in which they live. The church is commissioned to address the conscience. If it busies itself with ceremonies and abstractions of theology and has no certain message to the conscience, it is of all institutions the most contemptible. It has no right to exist if it allows men to sin without feeling the sting of its rebuke. But it has another work to do. It is an educational institution. People are defiling themselves and living gross lives because they are ignorant. They know not the holy love of God manifested in Christ. They must be instructed by the church. And this means that Christian people are educators. They must use all their wisdom and all the means science has put into their hands to instruct the ignorant in the right ways of God.

"Each Man Shall Bear His Own Burden."

The forgiveness we offer to another is not forgiveness unless it strengthens his moral purpose. The end of all our endeavor is character. The sinner must become able to look the world in the face, not because he has hardened his heart, but because he has recovered his self-respect. Love shows itself in demands for renovation of life that carry with them the assurance that they are perfectly reasonable and just. Weeping over sinners may confirm them in their bad habits. The Master was not often in tears. But his word restored the sense of spiritual dignity to the outcast. Can his church make that word effective today?

Christian Endeavor Lesson

By W. D. Endres

TOPIC FOR SEPTEMBER 9.

Pilgrim's Progress Series: IX Vanity Fair. Eccl. 1:12-18; 2:1-11.

Anything is vain which is unsubstantial, unreal, and does not give a genuine satisfaction. I mean a satisfaction which does not rob and sting and blight the life later. Vanity rises out of an inherent and legitimate love of self. A certain amount of self-esteem is necessary for the accomplishment of our best work in life. It is when this personal salvation is raised to a magnitude greater than the real worth of the individual is able to support that it takes on the nature of vanity. When there is no foundation on which to rest our pride and self-esteem it becomes unreal, false, vain. Such a state of mind is altogether undesirable in any individual.

Marks of Vanity.

Vanity manifests itself in an exagerated conceit with respect to one's personal power and worth, and an inordinate desire for notice and approval from others.

But this over-balancing of the mind manifests itself not only in the personal estimate which one places on himself, but in the things which he evaluates and persues. In these times when custom and tradition have more or less circumscribed the sphere of woman's activity her chief mode for attracting attention has been through ostentation. Too often she has fallen a victim to her desire and given her self over to idle adornment. Frequently she sudsides her own best gifts and powers for a few spangles, a scrap of ribbon, a bit of chiffon or a box of paint. Forgetting that when there is a beginning there must be an end, she in the gaiety and satisfaction of the moment, scorns the things of real worth. "Away with them," she cries, "Success, success is mine. All the world pays me tribute." But like the meteor which blazes across the sky and quickly passes from our vision and our memory, so a vanity-cursed woman wakes from her dreaming to find that the dazzling career of her life, measured by the great reality of things was but the light of a self-consuming fire and that she too, is gone and forgotten by the world whose life she failed to enrich.

Not Peculiar to Women.

But let me hasten to say that vanity is not a trait peculiar to woman. The pursuit of anything which is idle and empty, trifling and visionary, fruitless and unsubstantial is vain. Certainly this includes us all. The pursuit of pleasure which dissipates the body, robs a man of his time and position, and outrages the soul certainly is as true of men as of women. Moreover he who is pursuing blindly the accumulation of wealth to the neglect of companionship with family, his personal integrety, his citizenship, and his obligation to society, to say nothing of regard for the spiritual ideals of our Lord, leads a life of vanity.

Christian and Faithful found it necessary to pass through the city of Vanity on their way to the Celestial City. The trials and persecution incidential to it they had to meet. In like manner does every Christian today have to meet the temptations of all vain things. The worthless flattery of companions, the adorations of an attractive but an impotent suitor, and the applause of a gay but an insincere world are snares before us all and we cannot successfully escape them unless we have a wide vision, a poised intelligence, a moral conviction, and a heroic courage. Nor do we get these qualities for the asking. We can possess them after long training and culture. They are the result of self-denial and hard honest toil.

An Endless Task.

Again the task is never done. Moral choices must be made every day. Besides problems are deceptive in appearance and subtle in their trend. Many times, therefore, matters of grave concern are passed upon quickly and thoughtlessly, and later bring their train of awful and terrible consequences. It is no mere jingo to say that he who maintains his poise today, in the midst of the storm and stress, the glare and glammer, the trial and temptation, in this busy and distracting world, in a word, be true to his own moral ideals, is quite as much of a hero as men and women who faced physical torture and persecution in earlier days.

Great and sacred is obedience; he who is not able, in the highest majesty of manhood, to obey, with a clear and open brow, a law higher than himself, is barren of all faith and love, and tightens his chains in struggling to be free.—Martineau.

Church Life

September—Church Extension month.

The address by J. H. Gilliland at the Illinois State Convention has been commended on every hand.

Have you taken the Church Extension offering—the last offering of this Centennial year? Surely you will not fail.

We can furnish extra copies of the "Pittsburg Number" of the Christian Century, which will appear next week, to all who order them.

The Disciples of Illinois, who are putting their money in Chicago missions, will find interesting reading in O. F. Jordan's articles describing the conditions under which these missions work.

Professor Herbert L. Willett was compelled to be absent from the Illinois State Convention last week on account of the serious illness of Mrs. Willett, who is in Pentwater, and is, as yet, unable to make the journey from there to their home in Chicago.

* * *

Harold H. Griffis moves from Kalespell, Mont., to Middletown, Ind.

Lewis F. DePoister has accepted a call to the church at Gerlaw, Ill.

J. W. Kilburn, pastor of the church at Mt. Carmel, Ill., is president of the Illinois Christian Convention next year.

A. A. Doak is in his second year with the church at Colfax, Wash. He has been pushing the work vigorously during the summer.

"The Hoodoo Dinner" is the announcement of a social gathering by the Philathea Class of the First Church, Seattle. Wash.

The First Church, Louisville, gave their pastor, E. L. Powell, a great home-coming service the first Sunday in September.

Edward E. Cowperwaithe closes his work at Billings, Mont., September 5, and goes to River Edge, N. J.

B. F. Cato, of New Albany, Ind., has accepted a call to the First Church, Beaumont, Texas, and will begin work at once.

C. D. Haskell, of Frederickstown, Mo., became pastor of the church at Tarkio, Mo., the first of September.

"Thompson, the Egyptian," has been holding a meeting and setting things in order for the church at Effingham, Ill.

Charles E. McVay will sing in a meeting at Mayview, Mo., beginning the first of October. Arthur Downs, the minister, will do the preaching.

A. J. Saunders, pastor of the church at South Chicago, was among those receiving the degree of B. D. from the University of Chicago, at the September Convocation.

Mrs. Immanuel Sellers of Cuba, Ill., was elected president of the Illinois Christian Woman's Board of Missions at the state convention last week.

Professors Silas Jones, E. E. Boyer and A. C. Gray have returned to their work in Eureka College, after having spent the summer in study at the University of Chicago.

L. O. Ferguson, of Modesto, is highly commended for his services with the West Side Church, San Francisco, during two weeks in August.

Homer W. Carpenter the successor of T. S. Tinsley at Shelbyville, Ky., begins his work September 1. This unites a gifted preacher and a fruitful field of work.

J. J. Castleberry of Union City, Tenn., begins work at Mayfield, Ky., the 15th of September. Kentucky wins a strong preacher from Tennessee.

J. R. Perkins, until recently pastor of the church at Fresno, Cal., will assume his duties as pastor of the West Side Church, San Francisco on the first Sunday in September.

F. W. Pinkerton, of Kenton, Ohio, supplied the pulpit of the First Church, Seattle, August 22. His sermon was "The Secret of a Great Life."

J. G. Waggoner and wife of Canton, Ill., spent their vacation at Eldorado Springs, Mo., returning in time for the state convention at Eureka.

Eugen H. Holmes had a vacation of two weeks as an interim between the closing of his work at Plano, Texas, and entering upon his duties at Dalhart.

The church at Galveston has been at work during the summer; having paid on their Church Extension Loan, $104, and at the same time raising $75 to install electric fans in the church.

H. H. Guy has entered upon his work as Dean of the Bible College, Berkeley California. The enrolment is the best in the history of the Institution. Among the students enrolled are twenty-five Japanese.

T. F. Tinsley's first month with the Third Church, Louisville, happened to be the hot month of August. but the Sunday-school averaged 200. There were ten additions to the church and he bought a horse with wedding fees.

A debt of $2400.00 has been raised by the church at Pendleton, Ind. Fine work for the centennial year. The church has at the same time made improvements in the building costing more than $400.00.

J. L. Hill has resigned as pastor of the Central Church, Cincinnati, Ohio. For about a year Mr. Hill has been preaching for the church without salary while he made his living through business interests.

George A. Miller, pastor of the Ninth Street Church, Washington, D. C., together with his wife, and her sister, Miss Vandervort, spent August at Bethany Beach, Delaware.

George L. Snively, evangelist, Lewiston, Ill., is scheduled to dedicate the new Pine Wood Church at Toledo Ohio, and will follow the dedication with a mid-winter meeting. Mr. Snively is now in a meeting with J. M. Vawter and his church at Sullivan, Ill.

J. W. Reynolds assumed the pastorate of the First Church, Lyons, Kans., June first. The audiences have been good during the summer, and the church is planning its fall campaign which includes the raising of a small indebtedness remaining on their new $20,000.00 building.

Richard W. Gentry, associate pastor of the Hyde Park Church, Chicago, was given the bachelor's degree from the Divinity School of the University of Chicago at the September Convocation. He and Mrs. Gentry will spend the month of September visiting in Columbia and Sedalia, Mo.

R. Graham Frank, pastor of the church at Liberty, Mo., writes as follows of his vacation and plans for the winter:

"I am returning from a restful vacation in the Rockies, and feel ready for a great fall and winter work. H. O. Breeden is to assist me in a meeting at Liberty, beginning Sunday, Oct. 24."

The "Martin Family" musicians with Richard Martin, evangelist, have just closed a meeting at Humboldt, Kans., with over fifty additions. They are now in Harper, Kans. Already eighteen additions have been enrolled with seven confessions one night.

I. N. McCash was given a unanimous call to remain with the First Church, Berkeley, Cal., for five years. His reply to this action was that he would remain with the church indefinitely, provided they would at once get to work to erect a suitable house of worship. It is reported that a committee is already on the hunt for a building site.

Miss Virginia Hearne, whom Chicago is glad to claim as one of her daughters, is moving things for a great Centennial offering from the women of the C. W. B. M. in Texas. She is expecting every member of the organization in the state to keep after the offering during the entire month of September.

On a recent evening the official board of the Findlay St. Church, Seattle, Wash., and their wives, were entertained at dinner by Mr. and Mrs. J. W. McConaughey, members of the church. Such occasions are none to frequent in the calendars of our churches. Why should not men and women who have so much in common form a most congenial social group?

T. W. Grafton, has been strongly urged by his old church at Rock Island, Ill., to return to them as their pastor. But the church at Anderson, Ind., protested strongly against giving him up, and so strong and unanimous was their protest, that Mr. Grafton decided the path of duty to be with this great church which he has led so successfully for the last few years.

A new $20,000.00 building is to be dedicated at Petersburg, Ill., September 26. F. M. Rains will have charge of the service. Following the dedication the church will hold a series of meetings, in which it will have the assistance of W. J. Lhamon. The present pastor, B. H. Sealock, gives the credit to his predecessor, W. M. Graves, for the erection of this beautiful, and thoroughly modern building. Mr. Sealock has been with the church since last April.

F. F. Walters preached eighteen evenings during August in an open air meeting for the little church in Villa Heights, East Joplin. J. W. Famuliner has been the pastor since the beginning with thirty-two members two years ago. It's a hard field for a pastor—poor people paying for little homes, most of them miners or teamsters. Many who respect church very little. Mr. Famuliner has worked faithfully. There are now 125 members.

The preachers of North Central Missouri, have organized an association with Walter M. White, Mexico, president; W. A. Fite, Fulton, first vice president; G. H. Bassett, Salisbury, second vice president; S. B. White, Moberly, secretary and R. B. Helser, Centralia, treasurer. Moberly is the permanent meeting place of the organization. Burris A. Jenkins, Kansas City, addressed the association at its second meeting which was held in Moberly, September 2.

A. C. Rankine, of Adelaide, Australia, one of the ablest preachers in Australia, is coming to the United States to attend the Centennial. He proposes to remain in this country a year, or part of a year. While here he would like to hold some evangelistic meetings. Mr. Rankine was educated in Lexington. He has done a great work in Adelaide. He has the evangelistic temper and will do good work for any church that may employ him. He can be addressed in care the Foreign Christian Missionary Society, Box 884, Cincinnati, Ohio.

A welcome and farewell service was held at the First Church, Youngstown, Ohio, Sunday, August 29. The occasion marked the close of the very successful pastorate which John Ray Ewers has held with this church, and the welcoming of L. G. Batman, and wife from the First Church, Philadelphia. Mr. Batman preached the sermon at eleven o'clock; subject: "God's Fellow-workers." Mr. Ewers' subject in the evening was "I Call You Friends." Thus the change in the pastoral relationship is made without loss of time, and without the distracting influences so often incident to such a change, and the great church at Youngstown goes forward with her work. Mr. Ewers began work with the East End Church, Pittsburg, the first Sunday in September.

The First Church, Fort Wayne, resumes its Sunday evening services, September 19.

In a few nights' meeting at Valley Center, Kans., held by E. W. Allen, there were fifteen accessions.

Joseph L. Garvin, pastor of the First Church, Seattle, has been preaching a series of Sunday evening sermons on "Ten Commandments in Modern Life."

C. H. Altheide and H. T. Burgess closed a three weeks meeting near Milford, Ill., the last week in August. The church asked the evangelist to return for another meeting next year.

F. A. Bright, minister at Waynesburg, Pa., spent the last two weeks of his vacation in a meeting with the church at Champion, Ohio. There were forty accessions to the church. J. B. Pickell is the pastor at Champion.

There were 115 additions in twenty-one days' meeting held by R. H. Fife and sons at Brownwood Texas. After this meeting closed Robert and Earl returned to college. Clyde and his father begin a meeting at Woodbine, Iowa, September 12.

J. M. Lowe of Des Moines, Iowa, has reentered the evangelistic field. For several years Mr. Lowe was in the evangelistic work and was one of our most successful evangelists. For the past two years he has been in the pastorate. Mr. Lowe is one of our strongest and best men both in and out of the pulpit.

The Whiston & Longman evangelistic team of Nebraska begins a meeting at Carson, Iowa, September 5. They will attend the Centennial, remaining for a meeting at Everett, Mass. In January they begin at Grangeville, Idaho. They expect to hold six meetings in Idaho and Oregon. This team conducted eight meetings in the northwest last year.

Friday evening, September 10, has been reserved as the date of their "first fall meeting" by the members of the First Church. Fort Wayne, Ind. The evening will be devoted to "sociability, pleasure and business. All are to enjoy the evening, with music and refreshments provided, and there is to be no appeal to the purse. Earl M. Todd began his work as pastor of this church last spring.

The following word from E. W. Allen as he leaves Wichita, Kans., will interest the entire brotherhood: "Closed my work with the Central Church last Sunday. Great audiences—twenty-one additions. There have been 150 additions at regular services since the close of the Scoville meetings last October. It is a great church and a mighty power. It numbers now over 1,200 members and during the past three years has given more than $5,000 to missions. During this time there have been 850 additions, half of which came at regular services of the church. Unity prevails and an increasing desire to be serviceable to the Kingdom. The church has called W. S. Priest of Columbus, Ohio, who will find a magnificent opportunity."

Dedication

A building representing an outlay of $25,000, and one fit to grace a street in a city of 20,000 people, is practically completed at Kansas, Ill. Z. T. Sweeney will dedciate it October 3. There is now a congregation of 400, and a fine body of people they are, too. The work has prospered under the leadership of F. B. Thomas, pastor.

Gifts to Eureka

Eureka College has received between $80,000 and $85,000 in bequest during the past year. It has been reported in the papers that Mrs. Henrietta C. Pheasants of Buffalo, Ill., left Eureka College about $65,000 in her will. This estate will be settled within two years and the college will come into possession of the property at that time. Several years ago Stephen A. Hoyt, of Forest, Ill., gave Eureka College one-sixth of two-thirds of all his personal property and real estate. His will has been probated and the college will probably get from $10,000 to $14,000 from the estate. His wife also remembered the college in a special manner. She left in her will $6,000 to be set aside as the "Stephen A. Hoyt Memorial Fund." The trustees of the college are to invest the money in permanent securities and use the interest only each year in carrying on the work of the college. The will specifically states that the income is to apply on current expenses. These three bequests make the aggregate between $80,000 and $85,000.

With the inspiration that necessarily comes from this, the Endowment Campaign now on will be carried on more aggressively than ever. H. H. Peters has raised within the past year in addition to the above amount, about $25,000. He begins another year the first of September with bright prospects. It is expected that at least $100,000 will be raised within the next twelve months.

Four things a man must learn to do
If he would make his record true:
To think without confusion clearly;
To love his fellow-men sincerely;
To act from honest motives purely;
To trust in God and Heaven securely.

The Illinois State Convention

Characterized by Open-mindedness; Reports of Great Achievements.

By Orvis F. Jordan

The convention held at Eureka last week was a surprise to almost every one in point of attendance and achievement. The Pittsburg convention has been overshadowing in interest all the rest and it was expected by some that the state convention at Eureka would suffer with the rest. A total of over three hundred delegates was registered and it was believed that a number did not register.

The opening address of the convention was made by A. McLean of Cincinnati. This "grand old man" of modern missions who is one of the best loved men in the brotherhood made a characteristic address on The Program of the Church. He spoke largely of the biblical doctrine of redemption and the working out of this doctrine in modern life. His statement was free from the mysticism that usually accompanies such a statement from a preacher and it was cordially received by all.

The following day the C. W. B. M. was in session with an interesting program. Several returned missionaries spoke and the sessions were graced with the presence of Mrs. Harlan. who also made an address.

Some pleasing features of the convention during this session was the presentation of the returned missionaries, Mrs. Dye, Mr. and Mrs. Weaver, Misses Boggs and Lacock. Miss Dickinson of Eureka was presented as a pioneer worker of the society. Though advanced in years, she made a short address and told of the triumph of the organization over the hostile forces of the long ago.

Perhaps the chief point of interest in the woman's sessions was the matter of choosing officers and a board for the coming year. The officers chosen were selected after an appeal to the floor of the convention. The policy has been followed for many years of having a board largely living in Eureka, several members of it being in one family. The officers chosen for the coming year are: Mrs. Carrie Zeller, Cuba, president; Mrs. E. N. Holmes, Peoria, vice president.; Miss Lura V. Thompson, Cathage, secretary and organizer; Miss Henrietta Clark, Jacksonville, treasurer; Anna S. Kilby, Minier, recording secretary; Miss Dora Guthrie, Vermont, superintendent Young People's Department; Mrs. Olive Pope, DuQuoin, Mrs. F. Inslee, Springfield, Mrs. O. W. Lawrence, Decatur, advisers. This new list of officers is well scattered over the state and infuses a lot of new blood into the organization.

In planning the work of the coming year, the ladies have planned giving more than before to special work. Five thousand dollars has been the amount the past year but this is being increased to $6,500. This money is to be expended as follows: Chicago City Missions, $1200; Prof. F. C. Button, Morehead, Ky., $1000; school equipment, Mrs. Bertha F. Lohr. Jhansi, India, sixteen shares, $800; Mrs. W. J. Burner, Argentina, S. A. (Champaign's Living Link), $600; Miss Bertha Lacock, Porto Rico, $600; Miss Bertha Westrup, Monterey, Mexico, $450; Mrs. Ethie B. Lehman, S. C., Edwards, Miss., $400; station support, Jamaica, eight shares, $400; negro work, five shares, $250; Calcutta five shares, $250; evangelistic, Porto Rico, six shares, $300. Total $6,250. It was a matter of regret to many that the amount appropriated to Chicago was cut to $1,200. There is no mission field in the country of such strategic importance as the cities just now. Mrs. Harlan gave the assurance, however, that national board might supplement this somewhat from the general fund.

The society in Illinois has made splendid progress under Miss Thompson's leadership. There has been a gain in membership the past year from 5,365 to 6,547 members. This membership has the astounding record of raising $22,000 for missionary work the past year. It is the triumph of system over unorganized and haphazard methods of collecting missionary money.

On Tuesday afternoon, a great Brotherhood meeting was held. Two hundred and fifty men were in attendance, about evenly divided between laymen and preachers. The meeting was held in the college chapel and after leaving the chapel they went to the church lawn and here had a luncheon. The number of men was in excess of the anticipations of the commissary committee and some at the end of the line had a different fare but all were served. Addresses were given by bright laymen from the different towns from central Illinois. A committee was appointed to organize a state brotherhood for Illinois. This committee is composed of men from the central part of the state entirely and is as follows: J. M. Appel, of Springefild, chairman; J. R. Watt, Jacksonville; F. M. Campbell, Decatur; J. L. Miller, Peoria; C. F. Young, Galesburg; C. A. Radford, Eureka; Robert Williams, Bloomington.

The opening meeting of the Illinois Christian Missionary Society was held on Tuesday evening. The address of the evening was made by J. H. Gilliland of Bloomington. He spoke on "The Supreme Task." He laid down the fundamental proposition that the most important problems of society were what he called "man-problems." This he illustrated by brief excursions into the different fields of human interest. He held, however, that the greatest "man-problem" is the problem of redemption. This redemption he conceived to be both personal and social. This definition of salvation was a refreshing departure from traditional forms of statement. He insisted that all the Christian institutions were to be judged in the same way as Jesus judged the Sabbath. "The Sabbath was made for man, but not man for the Sabbath." He insisted that the Bible, the church, the ordinances and all things else were to receive their value from the contribution they made to the central purpose of making men better. He defined salvation as "the evolution of Christian character." In his statement of the plan of salvation many of the old phrases were missing and in place was the new ethical conception of salvation which was after all the New Testament doctrine. The address was clean cut and the most effective presentation of a theological theme which we have heard for some time.

On Wednesday morning, the field secretary, J. Fred Jones, made his report. There is so much that is significant in this report that we have thought best to include a part of it below:

From the Field Secretary's Report.

The showing from statistical blanks returned, 479, is that there were 9,198 conversions, 4,723 additions otherwise and a total of 12,921 added the the churches. These churches report 308 revivals that resulted in 8,051 additions. Thirteen buildings were erected at a cost of $145,375, and there are ninety-eight parsonages. The full membership in the state is 111,564 and the churches number 765.

There are 350 ministers giving full time to the service, thirty-two are in business but preach regularly, seven are likewise engaged but preach occasionally, eighteen are teachers, twenty-one are students and twenty-one are retired. Total number in the ministry is 443. Brethren J. Carroll Stark, S. C. Pruitt, A. E. Tinsley, C. W. Morrell, J. S. Cash, S. V. Williams, Parker Stockdale and Henry Genders are deceased.

Educational Session.

The educational session of the Illinois State Convention was the best for a great many years. The I. C. E. A. made excellent reports of work done and presented an encouraging view for the future of the association. Addresses were made by Mrs. S. J. Crawford, Mr. David H. Shields, Mr. Ellmore Sinclair, Mrs. Royal Dye, Mrs. F. W. Burnham, Mr. C. C. Sinclair, Mr. A. L. Huff, Mr. W. F. Shaw, Dr. N. B. Crawford, and H. H. Peters. Mr. Peters reported 150 addresses delivered during the year; eighty churches visited; 265 days spent in the field, and 100 days spent in the office; fifty conventions, rallies, institutes, and commencements attended; 6,000 pieces of mail sent out; and 20,000 pieces of literature distributed. He reported $25,578.63

SENSE ABOUT FOOD
Facts About Food Worth Knowing.

It is a serious question someitmes to know just what to eat when a person's stomach is out of order and most foods cause trouble.

Grape-Nuts food can be taken at any time with the certainty that it will digest. Actual experience of people is valuable to anyone interested in foods.

A Terre Haute woman writes: "I had suffered with indigestion for about four years, ever since an attack of typhoid fever, and at times could eat nothing but the very lightest food, and then suffer such agony with my stomach I would wish I never had to eat anything.

"I was urged to try Grape-Nuts and since using it I do not have to starve myself any more, but I can eat it any time and feel nourished and satisfied, dyspepsia is a thing of the past, and I am now strong and well.

"My husband also had an experience with Grape-Nuts. He was very weak and sickly in the spring. Could not attend to his work. He was put under the doctor's care, but medicine did not seem to do him any good until he began to leave off the ordinary food and use Grape-Nuts. It was positively surprising to see the change in him. He grew better right off, and naturally he has none but words of praise for Grape-Nuts.

"Our boy thinks he cannot eat a meal without Grape-Nuts, and he learns so fast at school that his teacher and other scholars comment on it. I am satisfied that it is because of the great nourishing elements in Grape-Nuts."

"There's a Reason."

It contains the phosphate of potash from wheat and barley which combines with albumen to make the gray matter to daily refill the brain and nerve centers.

It is a pity that people do not know what to feed their children. There are many mothers who give their youngsters almost any kind of food and when they become sick begin to pour the medicine down them. The real way is to stick to proper food and be healthy and get along without medicine and expense.

raised on the endowment proposition, besides $80,000 in bequests, that have come to the college during the year. The spirit of the session was one of intense enthusiasm and it is confidently believed that the next year will bring forth abundant results. Mr. Peters is hopeful of raising $100,000 in cash and pledges during the current year. The preachers took more interest in the work of the college than they have for years and have pledged enthusiastic support.

President Hieronymus has resigned and Prof. Gray has been elected to fill the vacancy as acting president while a permanent president is being found. The presidency has been offered to several men and to J. H. Gilliland of Bloomington as the latest candidate. It is not known yet whether he will accept or not.

On Wednesday evening, the time was divided between Mr. Myhr, state secretary of Tennessee and O. F. Jordan of Chicago. Mr. Myhr spoke on state missions. He sounded many of the old watch words of the Disciples which were enjoyed by the older men of the audience and assured us of a faith in the Bible that was "from lid to lid." That he thinks independently and effectively on many themes, was evidence by his suggestion about the unification of all missionary interests. His program was more radical than we have ever heard from a Discipal before and coming from Tennessee evidences that the world do move. He has a genial humor and a Norwegian "brogue" that is just enough perceptible to add to the interest of his address. The Chicago secretary, O. F. Jordan, presented an address on religious and social conditions in Chicago illustrated with his own lantern slides which he has gathered with his camera as he has travelled around the city. He insisted that Chicago was one of the greatest mission fields and that more support should be given. He advocated a plan of work that would encourage and support building enterprises in the city.

On Thursday morning the convention had a business session and elected officers for the ensuing year. The old board members were re-elected and J. W. Kilbourn was made president of the next convention. J. A. Barnett was made vice president. This is the first president from the southern portion of the state in many years and this distribution of responsibility is to be commended.

N. S. Haynes of Decatur preached the "Centennial Sermon" for the convention. He took the theme, "Jesus is the God-man." He presented the doctrine, dear to us all, of the personality of Jesus and its relation to the Father but treated it with arguments current fifty years ago. The sermon was a splendid example of the older apologetic of the church.

The address by J. W. Street on church advertising brought this important subject to the attention of the convention. The exhibit which he collected was of service to the entire convention. W. F. Turner of Peoria was assigned the task of reviewing the various missionary interests of the brotherhood outside the state.

If a convention has a soul, we would speak well of the spirit of this convention. There was no panic over doctrine and conservative men proposed heresies that were cheered. The state president caricatured the panic of the past concerning doctrine and was cheered to the echo. There was an open-mindedness and a desire to know the truth which represents the real attitude of the fathers and our leading men of all periods of our development. Distinctions over theology in missionary administration were roundly condemned by some who have in times past offended. If there have been the dark days when men have told of the sea serpents they have seen in their neighbor's theological back-yard, that day is now well past and is being followed by a period of earnest inquiry.

The Outlook For Eureka College

By H. H. Peters

On Tuesday, Aug. 31, the Board of Trustees of Eureka College met in a special session to elect a new president and transact such other business as would enable the college to carry on its work the coming year in a most thorough manner. Prof. A. C. Gray was elected acting president and a committee of five was appointed to secure a permanent president. The committee will not act hastily, but will make a very thorough investigation of the educational situation and will look up the records of the men available. It is the intention of the board of trustees to call one of the ablest men now at work in the field of education in some of its various phases. Prof. Gray has been with Eureka College one year. He is universally popular with the students of the college and has already taken his place in the life of Eureka as one of the most aggressive factors in the affairs of the community. Mr. Gray is a graduate of the University of Toronto, the University of Michigan, and holds a degree from Hiram College.

It has been announced through the papers that President R. E. Hieronymous was compelled to give up his work because of failing health. This was a very great sadness to him and a deep disappointment to his many friends. President Hieronymous has been at the head of Eureka College for nine years and has done a great service for the school. He has given the college educational standing, not only in Illinois, but throughout the Mississippi Valley. A diploma from the college means more today than it ever did in the history of the school. While we deeply regret that he was compelled to give up his work, especially at this time when the prospects are so bright for the school, we rejoice that the college has his love and support and that whatever may be the future of the school. He will be among its warmest friends. Mr. Hieronymous will rest most of the time during the coming year. The financial burden of the college in the midst of our changing educational conditions is almost wholly responsible for this break-down of the man who ought to have been strong and vigorous for the next twenty years.

Robert E. Hieronymus, who has just resigned from the presidency of Eureka College.

OUR NATIONAL DISEASE
Caused by Coffee.

Physicians know that drugs will not correct the evils caused by coffee and that the only remedy is to stop drinking it.

An Arkansas doctor writes:

"I have been a coffee drinker for 50 years and have often thought that I could not do without it, but after many years of suffering with our national malady, dyspepsia, I attributed it to the drinking of coffee, and after some thought, determined to use Postum for my morning drink.

"I had the Postum made carefully according to directions on the pkg. and found it just suited my taste.

"At first I used it only for breakfast, but I found myself getting so much better that I had it at all meals, and I am pleased to say that it has entirely relieved me of indigestion. I gained 10 pounds in 4 months and my general health is greatly improved.

"I must tell you of a young lady in Illinois. She had been in ill health for many years, the vital forces low, with but little pain. I wrote her of the good that Postum did me and advised her to try it.

"At the end of the year she wrote me that Postum had entirely cured her, and that she had gained 40 pounds in weight and felt like herself again."

been given a larger service in the field work. He will have complete charge of the publicity side of the college work, and there has been added sufficient office force to enable him to carry on this work in connection with the Endowment Campaign to a much better advantage than the work has been carried on during the past year. Mr. Peters reported to the State Convention in Eureka last week, $25,000 raised this year on the Endowment proposition and has announced with much enthusiasm and great faith that he expects to raise a hundred thousand dollars this year. The out-look for Eureka College has never been better and another year will bring forth wonderful results. All the forces at work are more harmonious than ever and it is only a question of continuous agitation and hard work to put Eureka College on a firm, financial foundation and make her in every way one of the leading and most substantial in the Middle West.

R. P. McPherson Resigns

R. P. McPherson, of Dunkirk, N. Y., has just resigned his charge there and moves to Keuka, N. Y., to put his two older children in college. He expects to evangelize for a time. Mr. McPherson has been at Dunkirk five years and has done a fine work in a difficult field. He took the church soon after its organization. There were twelve members and no meeting place. He has built up a good membership of 150 and has secured for them one of the best church buildings in the city. Mr. McPherson has helped me in two meetings. He loves people into the Kingdom. He has just been with me in a meeting at Dublin, Ga. He got a grip on the whole town. In the church, in the homes, in the stores, and in the meetings we held on the streets, he worked unceasingly. Churches desiring an evangelist, or evangelists wishing a singer for this fall and winter will do well to write him: R. P. McPherson, Keuka Park, N. Y.—Stephen J. Corey.

Centennial Bulletin

By John A. Jayne

A Particular Appeal to the Brotherhood

For many months the centennial committee has been urging the matter of the centennial roll books. It is with considerable pleasure that the committee announces that a great many of these roll books have been called for. But there is still a great host of the churches that have not sent in application for the books, and also a great many that having received them, have not returned them.

Brethren, it is highly important that these books be called for, filled and returned to the committee. You know the plan. We are endeavoring to get a complete enrollment of all of our churches in the country. We want this roll to be one of the great featured exhibits of the convention. We confidently expect that there will be an enrollment of more than a million. A great room will be set apart in some convenient place for the exhibit. You will want to see the name of your church there and on the roll of your church the names of all of the members. When the convention is over, it is the intention of the committee to send this most honorable roll to the Congressional Library at Washington, where it shall be forever treasured as one of the most precious heirlooms of the brotherhood and this glorious republic.

Brethren, send in your requests for the roll books if you have not already done so. If you have received your book send it in as soon as possible so that there may be no delaying of the Lord's work. The price of the roll book is fifteen and twenty-five cents. Get your book. Fill it. Return it. Thus you may help the centennial committee.

The Registration and the Program.

Every mail brings in requests for the centennial program and the centennial badge. The program, badge and registration fee is one dollar. For this sum you get all three, program, badge and registration.

Many people from all parts of the country are sending in their dollar saying "I am sorry that I cannot be at the convention, but I want a program and a badge." Every one thus sending is registered in a book prepared for that purpose, and a certificate issued them, and when the programs are issued they will be among the first to get their program and badge.

Many people from all parts of the country are sending in their dollar saying "reserve a room for me, save a program, a badge for me." These too are registered and a certificate issued them and assignment to their homes during the convention made at once. These who register in advance save themselves much confusion.

On the morning of October 11, there will be pouring into Pittsburgh thousands upon thousands of tired and wearied tourists. The registration booths will be overcrowded and the workers taxed to their limit. How unspeakably better it will be if of these thousands there be many, many hundreds and yes, thousands who having registered beforehand are privileged to be sent to their homes during the convention period.

Brethren, in the interests of yourselves, and the committee having the work in charge register if you possibly can many days in advance of the convention.

Entertainment and Registration.

Get this fact clearly in mind!

You may write asking for rooms and they will be assigned whether you send a dollar or not. But if you register you are guaranteed the program, the badge and a personal help in the world wide missions. The entertainment committee will assign rooms without a dollar being paid in the way of fees. The registration committee requires the dollar and furnishes the program. By all odds it will be better to be registered and have rooms assigned than to wait until the last minute. Don't you think so?

A Word as to the Exhibits.

The exhibits of the convention will be among the chief features of it. Large spaces are being given to our missionary enterprises and our publishing houses. All of these will make the largest and best display ever attempted by any body of people anywhere. The exhibits will be in a place easy of access and within ten minutes walking distance of all of the halls and churches in the centennial quadrangle. To specify as to the character of these exhibits or to call attention to any of them might not be wise, but it is enough to say that never before in the history of the world, will there have been gathered such an array of interesting exhibits as will be shown in Pittsburgh during the Centennial Convention.

Centennial Notes of Interest.

Word has just been received at headquarters that a party of fifteen are now on their way to the centennial from far distant Australia. These people are traveling 25,000 miles to get to this gathering. They are enthusiastic relative to it and are praying for and expecting a great blessing.

At this writing Brother Warren is still in Boston, Massachusetts, wrestling with the program. When Brother Warren gets through with it, it goes without saying that the program will be a thing of beauty and a joy forever.

We are confidently expecting and preparing for a convention of 50,000 people. What a host of people! What a task! Won't you who are coming help the committee by sending your registration fee of a dollar and get your room assignment at once.

Finally brethren, pray for the convention and its workers. And if by any reason you cannot come drop your committee a line saying "we are praying for you." The value of a hearty "God Bless You" has never been fully demonstrated in this world.

Church Extension Notes

Churches.

Last Year	$ 8,973.49
This Year	11,835.72
Gain	$ 2,862.23

Individuals.

Last Year	$20,373.75
This Year	33,298.77
Gain	$12,925.02
Total Gain	$15,787.25

It will be seen from the above that we have gained $2,862.23 from the churches, which is a good start for our annual offering. A gain of $12,925.02 has been made from individual gifts, showing a total gain of $15,787.25. Every Sunday in September should be used for the annual offering, and be sure to remit promptly to G. W. Muckley, Cor. Sec., 500 Water Works Bldg., Kansas City, Mo.

This annual offering should total $100,000 from the churches. Why not? The money is in the churches, and such a business-like work should have this increase in its fund. True, no such an amount was ever received by this board in a single annual offering, but the work requires it. Let the churches do the handsome thing this year.

An unusual quantity of collection envelopes and literature has been sent out during August. Three clerks were kept busy part of the time. This is the best indication we have of an increased offering. If the churches do the handsome thing by increased offerings we can go up to Pittsburg with a $50,000 gain, because a $12,000 gift is due in September and another of $5,000, which will insure a $30,000 gain at least, allowing no gain from the churches more than what is made up to August 31.

Including the Logan Fund, our Extension Fund is now over $735,000. The fund should be pushed up to $800,000 at least by the time we start to Pittsburg. The worthy demands still come. Had the money been in our fund with which to have encouraged our churches to build,, we would have caused the erection of over 400 churches this year. Remember to send all offerings to G. W. Muckley, Cor. Sec., 500 Water Works Bldg., Kansas City, Mo.

Idaho Church Extension

I want to call upon the churches of South Idaho to help us remove the shame that rests upon our fair state. I was shocked when I received the information that in the last ten years Idaho had received $7,500 in loans made, while during the same period we had only contributed to that valuable fund $463.01, and was more shocked when informed that last year the entire state only contributed $52.80 to church extension. Brethren, we have to lean heavily on Church Extension in this new territory. Almost every new church we organize asks me to assist them in securing a loan. I blush with shame to ask help in the face of our small offerings. Brethren, where is your sense of gratitude and your pride in this great gem state of the mountains? Please help us to remove this shame this centennial year by making the largest offering in our history. Let us be able to hold our heads up and point with just pride to our offerings when we ask for loans.

Frank E. Jones.

Missouri and Church Extension

T. A. Abbott.

I have in these later years been coming more and more to believe that the plan that obtained largely in the beginning of our movement in Missouri of organizing a congregation in some school house was not a blessing but rather a curse to our people. As a temporary expedient it may have been permissable, but to organize with the intention of continuing for any length of time to use the school house as a place of worship was bad and only bad. I am happy in this one thing, that while I have organized many congregations during the years of my Secretaryship, I have never organized a "school house church." You can go all over the south part of the state and find the "remains" of these "school house churches" and they are not an honor to any cause. The membership became satisfied with their surroundings: "Oh, it will do," they said, and that very contentment was the beginning of their dissolution.

There may have been some excuse for such a procedure in the beginning. There ought to be none now. One of the greatest blessings to our growing brotherhood is our Church Extension Fund. The call is made for $1,000,000 in this fund this Centennial year. It ought to be twice that. It ought to be big enough that we could give it in time of need. I know an instance here in our own state where in one of our splendid cities the Church Extension Board gave $25,000 to build a house in a desirable place. The result is that it has grown by leaps and bounds and is easily the best congregation in all that part of that growing municipality. We need a fund so big that lots could be bought, houses built and, in connection with our State Board, preachers supported in these great centers of power.

Could we pursue such a course, in five years our membership in nearly every Western city could be multiplied again and again, and many of the centers of power in the East could be captured for pure New Testament Christianity. This year Missouri ought to give her greatest offering to Church Extension. That fund has loaned to Missouri churches over $15,000 more than Missouri churches have given. Missouri gave $8,608.14 last year. We ought, we must give twice that this year. Kansas City, Mo.

New Mexico and Church Extension

Frederick F. Grim.

New Mexico was one of the last sections of our country to receive the support and encouragement of The American Christian Missionary Society. The organized work is scarcely two years old. There are only three or four churches that are self supporting. But the tide of emigration having turned toward the Southwest, this has become an important missionary field. Now is the time to lay well the foundations for the upbuilding of New Testament Christianity. The land is ours if we will possess it.

Next in importance to a good, faithful, consecrated preacher, is a well located and equipped church building. It is not only necessary to have a house of worship in order to properly meet the demands of a growing work, but it lends to the enterprise dignity and the idea of permanency. In this way it becomes one of the important factors in the moral and religious life of the community.

We are entering upon an era of church building in New Mexico. Without the assistance of the Church Extension Society it will be impossible to provide homes for the homeless churches. Without such provision the churches must work under serious disadvantages and perhaps in some cases languish and die.

The gifts of the large and prosperous churches are needed at this time in order to reach the Centennial aim, but without the offerings of the small and struggling churches there will be a great disappointment when the report is read at Pittsburg. They are not only needed in order to swell the grand total, but because the spirit of gratitude, the habit of giving and the willingness to sacrifice needs to be developed in the churches from the very beginning.

Notwithstanding that the churches of New Mexico for the most part have heavy burdens to bear, still I was very much humiliated by a recent statement sent me by Secretary Muckley. Only $81.10 has been contributed by the churches of this territory, and only $1.60 was contributed last year. On the other hand, loans aggregating three thousand dollars have been made, and others have been promised as soon as the churches are ready for them. Doubtless the churches which

Adult Bible Class Exhibit

Centennial Convention, Pittsburg, Pa.

Four awards will be given to the four classes making the best exhibit of adult Bible class material, according to the classification given below. Each award will consist of a portrait of a church leader, framed, and ready to hang upon the wall of the class room. A plate will be attached to each, indicating that it is an award, and stating when by whom, and for what purpose it is given.

1. To the class making the best exhibit of advertising material, including cards of invitation, class buttons, printed announcements of special meetings, lecture courses, etc. The award: portrait of Walter Scott.

2. To the class making the best exhibit of decorative material. This will include banners, maps, charts, mottoes, and any other material used in making the class room attractive. The award: portrait of Thomas Campbell.

3. To the class making the best exhibit of program material. This includes printed programs for socials, business meetings, field days or picnics, annual banquets, regular Sunday sessions, etc. The award: portrait of Barton W. Stone.

4. To the class making the best general exhibit including the three above classes of material. The award: portrait of Alexander Campbell.

Any class wishing to make exhibit will please observe carefully, the following rules:

1. All material should be sent to: C. A. MacDonald, Chairman Exhibits Committee, Pittsburg, Pa., 203 Bissell Block.

Same must reach him not later than October 1, 1909.

2. A statement should accompany the exhibit giving the name of the class, its location, names and addresses of the class teacher and president, and the award for which the class is competing.

3. All material should be mounted on cardboard, framed or unframed. This will enable the committee to make the best possible display of the material.

"The Long, Last Mile"

Life's Rewards Often Missed by Failure to Finish the Course

THE last mile is the longest one in every journey. Who that has gone homeward on some delayed train has not felt that all the other miles were shorter than that interminable last one? Who that has driven along some road at night toward home and seen the lights glimmering in the distance does not find the last, long mile the weariest of the way? Who that has traveled in the desert does not hail at the approach of twilight, as the caravan mounts a little hillock in the sand, that white tent-city under the shadowing benediction of some five palm trees, only to find that the long, last mile of the journey seems never to end? With such slow and lagging steps comes on the dawn after a night of watchfulness. The purple darkness shades into the grays of morning all too slowly. The voices of the world come back after the dreary interval of night, and nature and human activity awaken slowly,

> "Unheard but by the watcher's weary ear,
> Aching with night's dull silence, or the sick;
> Hailing the welcome light and sounds
> That chase the death-like images of dark away."

Yet all the journey is judged by that long, last mile. Short of its successful completion, everything remains unfinished. No caravan can arrive that does not cross the last league.

The scholar who has all but finished his course of study, but has not the courage or persistence to complete his examinations misses that final record of his work which is essential to its success. The investigator who has toiled through months or years of careful work to produce results that shall be of value to his generation, and yet who fails to complete the book in which his discoveries are to be chronicled is as voiceless and unsuccessful, in so far as the world is concerned, as if he had never undertaken the task. The failure of uncompleted enterprises was pointed out by Jesus in his reference to the builder of the tower who had not the means of finishing the structure, and who therefore felt the misery of the unaccomplished task.

The last mile is the revelation of the entire journey. It determines the object of the quest; it points the goal of all the way. From no other part of the journey can the end be so definitely discovered. The work of Christ, for example, finds all of its interpretation in the cross. Not that the cross was the only important event in Jesus' ministry, but in its spirit his whole life finds its meaning. Short of the cross he could not have been understood. His life would have failed of its ultimate purpose. The shadow of the cross was upon all his pathway. As one painter has represented it, even upon his cradle there fell the shadowy mystery of his approaching tragedy. He was conscious of it from the beginning. His passion to fulfil the Father's desires, his wish that no one feature of his work should be scanted, his kindly thought for his disciples that they might all abide with him to the last, are marked features of our Lord's character. "Having loved his own in the world, he loved them unto the end."

It is even so of the Christian life that is patterned after that of the Lord. It is tested by its close, not by the halcyon days of power and success. It is an easy thing when all goes well to live the life of faith, and believe that all things work together for good to those that love God. But when defeat, distress or failure come, then that optimism is somewhat difficult to maintain. And yet this is the secret of the lives that finish successfully the long, last mile. The man who, after a period of brilliant business success, comes to failure through no effort of his own, and closes his days in failing health and amid narrowing opportunities, yet calm in the quiet confidence that all things are well with him who keeps his faith in God, that man is a hero of the faith. It is an inspiration to live in an atmosphere of applause and achievement where one's strength is sufficient to the task of the day and work is a pleasure. But in obscurity and disfavor, without the inspiration of successful effort, it is a very different experience. And yet there are thousands of quiet and courageous lives passing through this experience, without hope of worldly betterment, but with humble trust in God and confidence that he will lead them safely home. This is the glory of the long, last mile.

In youth, or the strength of middle age, life is a constant joy. Friendship is abundant; the world has many fascinating opportunities to offer, and pessimism would seem the least reasonable philosophy. But when old age and weakness come, when the pulse slackens and the nerves are tense with pain, when "those that look out of the windows are darkened, and all the daughters of music are brought low," it is the true test of character and of religion that hope, confidence and cheerfulness remain and that the light of life grows brighter until it shines unto the perfect day. It is the Saviour's word that "he that endureth to the end shall be saved." Short of the end there can be no successful completion. James writes, "We count them happy who endure," and such are the heroes of the faith of whom the Epistle to the Hebrews speaks. Such men and women are worthy of love and remembrance. The quiet, steadfast lives that keep on in the path of modest duty and of simple joy, "by faithful continuance in well doing," are the masters of the long, last mile—the heroes in the struggle of the years.

To maintain the high levels of thought and feeling in the midst of discouragement, weakness and pain is the wish of every soul. We all pray with the poet when we think of such times as possible in the future:

> "Be near me when my light is low,
> When the blood creeps and the nerves prick
> And tingle, and the heart is weak,
> And all the wheels of being slow.
> Be near me when the sensuous frame
> Is racked with pangs that conquer trust,
> And time, a maniac, scattering dust
> And life a fury slinging flame."

The long last mile of every experience leads to that solemn moment when this life, as we know it, finds its fulfillment. It is the glory of our Christian faith that such a moment may be faced with calm and quiet faith. To him who has lived with God there is the serene confidence that everything is right, for God does all things well. And yet how much there is to remember at such a moment. Even the holiest of souls could not approach death unconcerned. How many experiences there are that we should like to change! How many faults which cannot be forgotten! How many sins that cry out for forgiveness! Yet this need and the confident trust in the Master of souls is the supreme victory that overcomes the world and death itself. If life has no power to defeat us, how much less has death. We only crave guidance across that last experience, mysterious, baffling and yet alluring. How many clinging stains of humanity we are leaving in that long, last mile! How many secrets of the heavenly life wait for their disclosure until the darkness is past and the true light shines! All these humbling and yet inevitable experiences await us in that moment when mortality is swallowed up of life. How earnestly may we pray for the divine companionship at such a moment! How sincerely we may repeat the words of the author of "The Tryst":

> "Carry me over the long, last mile.
> Man of Nazareth, Christ for me!
> Weary I wait by death's dark stile
> In the wild and the waste, where the wind blows free:
> And the shadows and sorrows come out of my past,
> Look keen through my heart
> And will not depart,
> Now that my poor world has come to its last.
> Lord, is it long that my spirit must wait?
> Man of Nazareth, Christ for me!
> Deep is the stream, and the night is late;
> And grief blinds my soul that I cannot see.
> Speak to me out of the silences, Lord,
> That my spirit may know,
> As forward I go,
> Thy pierced hands are lifting me over the ford."

The Trend of Events

By Alva W. Taylor

RAILROAD PRECAUTION

The happy day has arrived when the Railroads will compete for safety records. Last year the Pennsylvania reported no deaths through accident to passengers. The past few months has recorded remarkable experiments with its safety devices and operators. It has been working its men like the fire companies do in their test runs. Over six hundred mock contingencies have been "made up" and in every case the signals and rules have been obeyed perfectly and have worked perfectly. Thus six hundred possible conditions that might have brought confusion and perhaps accident were met with perfect safety. Now the Burlington meets the Pennsylvania record with its report for the last fiscal year. Not a passenger was killed on all its lines and it operates some very fast trains. The day is past for cooly calculating the cost of accidents over against the expense of safety devices and operation.

ENGLAND'S "LAND OCTOPUS"

Lloyd-George's budget makes satisfactory progress. It now looks like the Lords will hardly dare veto it. It has aroused great enthusiasm among the masses of the realm. Every protest of the landlords and tory press has but served to make more clear the fact that their protest is the plea of privileged interests. The bye-elections have been favorable to the Liberals. Before the budget's presentation they had been unfavorable. This shows the way the wind blows. The Liberals may well care little whether the Lords veto or not. If they do not, the principle of taxing the landlords is founded. If they do, an appeal to the country will justify the Liberals and forward their determination to remove the incubus of the Lords' veto.

Here are a few interesting items showing something of the nature of the "octopus" of landlordism in England. One-half of all the land in England is owned by 4,000 men; and 500 members of the House of Lords own one-third of the entire territory of the kingdom. The Duke of Westminster, a young snob whom Kitchener sent back from South Africa as an encumbrance to the army, draws $15,000,000 annually from 400 acres which his ancestors left him in the heart of London. It was once of little worth compared to present valuation and was given an ancient duke by his monarch in recognition of services rendered the crown. Landlordism has kept it in entail until today the crowded areas in the heart of London must pay the young "blue-blood" and "red-leg" this enormous annual toll. Lloyd-George would take one-fifth the annual increase in value of these holdings with which to pay the old-age pensions. Other Lords and Dukes draw sums, but little less, from the metropolis; all told to the extent of $100,000,000 annually.

The Liberals are simply trying to establish a precedent and a principle. It is not the tax the Lords are fighting—it is the principle. In America they would perhaps let the bill pass while clamor was on, then quietly emasculate it all when the public had lost interest. Not so in England. Once established it is there to stay and will be expanded until the basic principle roots out the evil.

THE CONQUEST OF THE AIR

We are used to wonders in this modern world yet we are credulous. Nothing startles us, yet some things surprise us. Since the days of Darius Green we have been doubtful about man ever being able to "fly as the birds." We thought a marvelous toy a possible result of the aviator's quest but hardly a usable vehicle. But now Zeppelin has sailed 850 miles in a single trip. He has been hailed by his nation as a hero after sailing at will over the capital city and demonstrating that perfect control of his air-ship which utility will require. He yet has problems to solve but he has solved greater ones. His progress has been more rapid than that of the steam boat was in its early day.

The more marvelous aeroplane makes significant progress. It is coming more rapidly than the automobile did. Farnam has kept the air three hours and there is no reason why he should not have kept it longer had fuel held out. Latham has ascended to nearly 500 feet and landed with perfect safety. Bleriot has crossed the English Channel with its changing currents and Curtis has made a sustained speed of nearly 50 miles per hour with safety. Will the aeroplane be the successor of the automobile as the vehicle of pleasure?

PRUSSIA'S CROP OF MILLIONAIRES

Prussia has developed marvelously under William II. He is much more an industrial than a war lord. But with this industrial development has come a corresponding crop of millionaires and an increased number of those who must labor without hope of more than daily bread. In 13 years the number who have a million or more has grown from 5,256 to 8,377. More striking is the increase in the millions they possess. Then they owned $3,250,000,000 while now they have $6,000,000,000. These 8,000 men possess 26 per cent of all Prussia's wealth. This is the toll capital has taken from increased production in the kingdom's industries. Meanwhile there are 100,000 unemployed in Berlin alone. Here is another proof of Andrew Carnegie's contention that the workingman is not getting his share and that the great problem of the time is one of striking a balance between labor and capital in the sharing of profits.

IS THE CHURCH LOSING GROUND?

We hear much talk today about the church losing ground. The census bulletin for 1908 does not give much consolation to those who draw such conclusions. It shows that there are 33,000,000 church members. This is as accurate as such statistics can be made, but is not accurate to a nicety, because some denominations report infants while others report only those who are really members by choice. The Catholics report everybody that has been born in their church and seem to make a great showing. If the children who have made no conscious choice and the nominal members that any other church would exclude were discounted, their numbers would perhaps be reduced to one-half the 12,000,000 given. They make great increase also but it is chiefly through immigration. Likewise their report of a male membership of 49 per cent must be discounted in the interest of comparative statistics. Protestant denominations would not count multitudes of men that are enumerated by the Romanists. They are born Catholics but their attendance upon the worship and work of the church is no more vital than that of multitudes of men born Protestants but who never work at any religious task or attend religious worship.

The significant facts are in the comparative statistics. The report shows that 39 per cent of the population is now church members as against 32 per cent eighteen years ago. A comparative statement of the membership in ratio to the population and counting the Protestant churches alone, will be more illuminating. In 1800 there were ten members to every 145 of the population; in 1850 to every sixty-five; 1900 to every forty-five; in 1908 to every forty-one. The Protestant church membership has gained on the increase in population by about 10 per cent each decade since 1880.

IS THE Y. M. C. A. LESS EVANGELISTIC?

The Y. M. C. A. is the most vigorous of modern religious agencies. Complaint has been lodged that it was surrendering evangelistic to social effort. If it were charged with changing from the evangelistic to the social method of conducting its work, the indictment might be justified, and with credit to the association, for the social method may be quite as much a soul winner as the old time evangelistic method of the association. And this is precisely what has happened. The main stress is today put on social service. The religious meeting is not made less of, but social service is made more of. Last year, as compared with eight years ago, five times as much was spent for religious work, the attendance was three times as great, the number of conversions was multiplied by four, and the number who united with the church by three. Six times as many were enrolled in the Bible classes, and the attendance in shop meetings was twelve times as great as eight years ago. In the same time the number of associates increased by one-half, or to nearly 2,000 in all, the number of members almost doubled and is now close to 500,000, the number of building increased from 359 to 630 while the value of the property arose to $47,000,000 and the current expenses to over $6,000,000 as compared to $2,500,000 eight years ago. These latter figures tell something of the value of the social work of the associations. The greatly increased cost is due to the need of equipment to do the work of athletics, conduct night schools, furnish baths and entertainment, build dormitories for railroad men, supply reading rooms, provide employment agencies and create a great work for boys. The number of conversions has grown twice as fast as the expense account. This cannot argue that the social method is less effective religiously than the old time evangelism. The number that have been kept faithful to their religious vows by the modern method of help cannot be determined but it would doubtless be even more marked than the number of conversions.

CHRISTIAN UNION ON THE FOREIGN FIELD

The appalling waste of sectarianism is not likely to ever obtain on the foreign field. The task is too great, the workers too consecrated to the supreme thing, the excuses to puerile to allow it. The workers in Chili found interest in their message, but bewilderment over their denominational distinctions. They issued a statement setting forth the fact that they were at one on all essentials and emphasizing the unity of their faith. Some remarkable evangelism has recently rewarded their united efforts. At Christobal, Panama, a union church is flourishing. The Baptists and Presbyterians are building a union medical college in Shantung and all others will be welcomed as they come. At Chentung, in Western China, a great Union University is being builded by the Baptists, Methodists, and Friends and all others who wish will be welcomed in its work. Facing the work of converting the world, the Church of Scotland and the United Free Church have, by unanimous vote, entered upon a full and free discussion of the problem of union of the two bodies. The church cannot remain divided and waste the stewardship of Christendom in the evangelization of the world.

A NEW "PROMISED LAND"

There was recently held in Whitechapel, East London, a meeting of 2,500 Jews at which Israel Zangwill and other leaders spoke and at which Mesopotamia was hailed as a new Land of Promise. The valley that is believed to be the cradle of mankind, the ancient seat of Assyria and Babylon, and the scene of the Captivity is to be irrigated and redeemed. The railroad is penetrating its desert wastes, travelers are blazing trails through its sands, and behold it looms up as a promising seat of new civilization. It is rumored that Jacob Schiff and other wealthy Jews are planning a $100,000,000 project to redeem it to civilization and the Jew.

Editorial

CHICAGO churches will be happy to be hosts to delegates enroute to Pittsburg from the west, on Sunday morning, October 10. With the convention opening on Monday evening it becomes necessary for many western delegates to start before Sunday. In order to avoid Sunday travel many will wish to spend the Lord's day in this city, worshipping in our churches in the morning and visiting parks and public buildings in the afternoon, going on to Pittsburg at night or waiting until the next morning for the Chicago special. We have at hand a number of requests from Kansas and Nebraska and other states inquiring for the location of the churches of the Disciples, so that delegates may lose no time in getting to the services. This list of churches we will be glad to print in next week's issue. If it proves that a sufficient number are interested the Chicago ministers will be glad to arrange a plan by which special trains may be met and the delegates piloted to the various churches of their choice. It will not be necessary for us to counsel the brethren against unnecessary traveling on the Lord's day. Disciples of Christ are quite as sensitive to the sacredness of the day as any other people. And while they recognize that it is impossible to avoid traveling during a portion of the day their good conscience will reduce this to the minimum.

IN A series of editorials by the "laity" the Christian-Evangelist is offering its readers some valuable sentiment of late. Especially significant is the contribution of Rev. E. L. Powell, of Louisville in the issue of August 26. Dr. Powell's thesis is that there is no development in modern religious thought which was not anticipated by Alexander Campbell and the men associated with him. He calls Mr. Campbell "one of the most pronounced higher critics" and points out the latter's distinction between the various dispensations as the warrant for such an assertion. "I cannot see," says Dr. Powell, "that any higher critic, who has kept himself within the province of higher criticism as concerning itself with literary and historical Biblical criticism, has been more radical in method than Mr. Campbell. Mr. Campbell used a different terminology, but precisely the same method." Concerning sanity in evangelism Dr. Powell interprets Campbell and the Disciples as the forerunners of those who today are registering a pronounced protest "against an evangelism which does violence to the soul of man and all that we know of psychological experience. In the advocacy by Mr. Campbell of a conversion that should be effected in harmony with the laws of the soul and not by some galvanic battery operation of the Holy Spirit, we have anticipated the modern criticism and principal objection to a wild and crazy evangelism, which seeks to add names to a church membership rather than souls to the company of the saved. I am satisfied that the great men whom we honor as pioneers of this great religious movement would condemn in the name of both Scripture and psychology the methods and spirit and picturesque characteristics and accessories of the greater part of our modern evangelism.

"Take again the familiar battle cry of modern religious thought —'Back to Christ.' Have we not heard that music from childhood? Is it not the very heart of our contention? Dr. Fairbairn, in his great book, 'The Place of Christ in Modern Theology,' tells us that the coming theology must be interpreted in terms of the Christ consciousness. This precisely is what Mr. Campbell did, and what we as a people have been trying to do for one hundred years."

At the charge that this way of putting it is identical with the "New Theology" Dr. Powell does not falter, but rejoices that the people with whom he is allied are so well prepared to receive all that is richest and best in the progressive religious thought of today. "If this be the 'new theology,'" he says, "let us make the most of it. Whether it be acknowledged or not, the Disciples of Christ have led the way, have certainly blazed the path along which are treading the modern leaders and thinkers of the Christian world. We have been pioneers in the literary and historical criticism of the Bible. We have been pioneers in the advocacy of Christ, rather than creedal propositions, as the object of faith. We have been pioneers in honoring the laws of the soul or a sane psychology in the matter of conversion. We have been pioneers in emphasizing the great facts of Christianity as offering a solid foundation for both faith and reason. We have certainly been pioneers in our insistence on the fundamental principle of Protestanism, namely, the right of private interpretation. To our great words Reformation, Restoration, Recovery, Liberty, Loyalty, Democracy, Simplicity should be added the word—Heralds of the New Theology."

These are splendid words spoken by Louisville's great preacher, revealing his deep insight into the purposes of the Disciples and the tendencies of modern times. By every right of historic temper the Disciples of Christ are the leaders of progress and those who would bind us to the "outworn creed" do not know "what manner of spirit they are of."

OCCASIONALLY a community even in these days of fraternity among Christian bodies is stirred with a sectarian controversy that is anything but creditable to the cause of Christ. No denomination is entirely free of trouble makers. Even the Disciples of Christ, specialists though we strive to be in the program of unity, are occasionally humiliated by one of our number stirring up strife and bitterness through misrepresentation of his religious neighbors. Such conduct often destroys an entente cordial that it has taken years to develop. Des Moines, Iowa, has been witnessing an illustration of this unhappy thing of late. The offender in this instance is a Baptist, although it is intimated that members of other denominations as well have been participating in a subterranean attempt to prejudice new Disciple converts against the teachings of the church with which they have united. In one instance the local church bulletin was used to misrepresent and caricature the teaching of the Disciples. All this has been passed by without notice by the Disciple ministers of the city. But more recently a certain Rev. Mr. Graves, a Baptist clergyman, issued a statement setting forth the reasons why all this talk of union between Baptists and Disciples is nonsense.

He described the Disciples as disbelieving in the Holy Spirit, and the Trinity, preaching baptismal regeneration and teaching that intellectual assent to a proposition was equivalent to conversion. With the appearance of this statement in the newspapers, Charles S. Medbury of the University Church could not longer keep silence. He wrote an open letter to Mr. Graves which he read to his own congregation and had published in the newspapers. In this letter Mr. Medbury states the true evangelical position of the Disciples and administers a drastic rebuke to his brother minister for his lack of both information and the fairness that should ever belong to the minister of Christ. With rare skill he turns the discussion from the field of theory to the actual facts visible on every hand in Des Moines. "How can you, Brother Graves," asks Mr. Medbury, "in the face of our people's life right here in Des Moines, which is certainly not less devoted to high and noble things than is the life of other peoples, and in the face of the educational and missionary work to which we are committing ourselves in all the world—how can you intimate that all we require is an intellectual assent in the teachings of the New Testament as over against the absolute and complete surrender of the whole man to God required by your own teaching? I shall challenge at once this whole paragraph of your article as misleading and completely unwarranted. You are kind enough to speak of your respect for me personally as a Christian brother and a brother minister. Can you then believe, really, that my life is given simply to secure this intellectual assent to certain formal doctrines? I do not think for a moment that you really believe this. And, Brother Graves, in my own ministry I am only representative of the rank and file of our people who plead in season and out of season for the new birth and the glorious life of the new creature in Christ Jesus."

THE greatest need of America today is a return to the sense of obligation for the ethical and religious instruction of our children and young people through all the instruments of education at our command. At the present time, by an unfortunate process of evasion and shifting of responsibility, none of these instruments is accomplishing the work in a satisfactory manner. The home is the center of all instructional values for the child's life and yet parents are rarely either competent or willing to undertake the teaching of their children. They dismiss this obligation to other agents like the public school and the church.

The public school, again, is charged with the education of the child and, rightly interpreted, this education is not only intellectual but physical, moral, and religious as well. It is an unfortunate thing that the Bible is, for the most part, rigidly excluded from the public schools. This is the result of the demand made by Roman Catholics, on the one side, and secularists on the other. It is sadly unfortunate that the book, which is not only the greatest classic of all literature, but the embodiment of the principles of ethics and religion ever given to the race, should be excluded from curricula which are permitted to include almost every other discipline within the range of our present interests. If the Bible is excluded by action of courts or school boards, that law must be obeyed until a better one is secured. But, in the meantime, the teacher can do much to emphasize the ethical and religious values in the child's education.

Again the Sunday-school can do much more than it is doing at the present time. With all its limitations, both of theory and practice, it is our most effective instrument for religious instruction. It needs to accept those pedagogical principles which are recognized in every other form of instruction today and in addition, to realize that there rests upon it the high responsibility of performing that work which both the home and the public school have sought to evade. If the Sunday-school teacher had no other motive for the most painstaking and careful devotion to the spiritual interests of the child, this would be sufficient.

Meantime there needs to be laid on parents and teachers, whether in the school or the Sunday-school, a fresh sense of obligation for the moral and religious training of the new generation.

PREPARATIONS for the World Missionary Conference to be held next June in Edinburgh, Scotland, are proceeding on a scale of great magnitude. The conference will embrace about 1,100 delegates of whom upward of 500 will be from the United States and Canada. Among those already chosen are some of the most distinguished public men, including ex-President Roosevelt, ex-Vice-President Fairbanks, prominent educators, jurists, editors, bishops, pastors, as well as missionary secretaries, managers and experts. The delegates are appointed by the various Missionary Boards on the basis of income devoted to missions in non-Christian lands. The Disciples of Christ are entitled to fourteen delegates. Among the delegates appointed by American societies will be missionaries and native Christians from foreign fields. For example, one Board will have ten delegates from its Europeon missions, with representatives from its Asiatic, African, South American and other fields. The missionaries will be accompanied by native Christians from the various missions so that the conference will be something of an inter-denominational congress of the nations of the world in the name of the one God, the one gospel and the one cause. Doubtless there will be few of the 1,100 delegates who will not be able to understand and speak the English tongue, which is now taught in almost every mission field. The conference is a conference of Missionary experts and its chief business will be to hear and discuss reports of eight commissions which have been appointed to investigate and report upon all phases of missionary work. Besides these reports and discussions there will be addresses on missionary topics by the most eminent speakers of the world. The conference will not consider or adopt resolutions or vote even upon the reports of the commissions. Its aim is to gather and spread facts and conclusions of missionary experts on methods of the missionary enterprise and thus "coördinate missionary experience from all parts of the world." The American executive committee of twenty representatives of the Boards of the United States and Canada is coöperating with the British executive committee in settling the arrangements for the conference. Dr. Arthur J. Brown is chairman, Dr. H. K. Carroll, Secretary. Lord Balfour of Burleigh, is chairman of the British committee. Of the eight Commissions, Mr. John R. Mott, New York, is chairman of Commission No. 1—"Carrying the Gospel to All the World"; President W. Douglas Mackenzie, D. D., Hartford Theological Seminary, is chairman of Commission No. V—"Preparation of Missionaries; and Dr. James L. Barton, Secretary of the American Board, is chairman of Cimmission No. VI—"The Home Base of Missions." Other Commissions will report on "The Native Church and Its Workers," "Education in Relation to the Christianization of National Life," "The Missionary Message in Relation to Non-Christian Religions," "Relations of Missions to Governments," "Coöperation and Promotion of Unity." These latter Commissions all have British chairmen with American vice-chairmen as follows, respectively,—Dr. Walter R. Lambuth, Secretary of the Board of Missions, M. E. Church, South; Prof. E. C. Moore, Harvard University; Mr. Robert E. Speer, Secretary of the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions; Hon. Seth Low, New York; and Mr. Silas McBee, Editor of The Churchman.

IT HAS not yet been made clear just what contributions to science will be made by the sensational explorations in the Arctic circle by Messrs. Peary and Cook. Judging from the statements given the public by both of these daring pathfinders, it seems unlikely that any positive benefits will be conferred upon the world. In his report, Dr. Cook describes the sense of intense loneliness that came upon him as he surveyed the horizon, standing at the long-sought pole. "What a cheerless spot to have aroused the ambition of man for so many ages," he mused. "An endless field of purple snows. No life. No land. No spot to relieve the monotony of frost. We were the only pulsating creatures in a dead world of ice." Commander Peary likewise comments on the dullness and barrenness of the place. Only one observation does he give us in his report, viz., that he let down his lead to the full length of his wire, 1,500 fathoms, and could not find bottom. Upon reeling up the line it broke and the lead was lost.

In all this story the cynic and the pessimist will no doubt find a parable. It is a picture of all of life's goods and goals, they will say. That for which man sacrifices all is a barren waste when he arrives, a bubble that bursts when he takes it in his hand. Life is ever deluding us with the hopes that burn in our hearts.

So speaks the pessimist. But the soul that has learned to see life as Jesus saw it finds a sermon in the disillusionment of the explorers and a text for the sermon is ready to hand in the scriptures. "It is not in the heavens, that thou shouldest say, Who shall go up for us into the heavens and bring it unto us. . . . neither is it beyond the sea, that thou shouldest say, Who shall go over the sea for us and bring it unto us. . . . But the word is very nigh unto thee, in thy mouth and in thy heart, that thou mayest do it." Moses is speaking of the revelation of God that is not to be sought for afar but is to be found within. Likewise all the real goods of God are nearby. That the remote is better than the immediate is life's illusion. That happiness could be found in another's lot better than in one's own is Satan's constant whisper to our hearts. Success does not lie at some far-off North Pole, but in faithfully doing our work in our common latitude. There are great explorations yet to be made in the mysterious natures of those dear ones of our own families. Heaven is not far distant, but ever lies around us if we would only see. What Alexander Proctor said when a street preacher asked him if he wished to go to heaven, and he answered, "No, I'm already there," symbolizes an experience possible to every child of God.

Christianity's business in the world is to teach men to find worth and contentment in common experiences, realizing the goods of the eternal life here and now, and not postponing them to some far time or place.

Joy in one's work is the consummate tool, without which the work may be done indeed, but without which the work will always be done slowly, clumsily, and without its finest perfectness.—Phillips Brooks in The Joy of Self-Sacrifice.

The American School For Oriental Study and Research At Jerusalem

How the School Encourages American Students in Research in Lands of the Bible

By Edward A. Henry

A number of years ago the Archaeological Institute of America succeeded in arousing sufficient interest in Archaeological study to secure money to establish schools at Rome and at Athens. "The American School at Athens" owns a very fine building and has a long and glorious record of achievement behind it. Though it has conducted much excavation work this is not its chief purpose. The great aim of the school is to encourage American University men to go out to the land of their study and secure a first hand knowledge of it. "The American School at Rome" has a similar glorious record. It was not until the year 1900 that the institute, with the co-operation of the American Oriental Society and the Society for Biblical Literature and Exegesis, succeeded in getting together enough money to establish an American school at Jerusalem.

"The American School for Oriental study and Research at Jerusalem," then, has but nine years of history. Its organization is rather interesting. The managing committee consists of one representative from each of the twenty-one American seminaries, colleges, and universities which, by their annual contributions, make the maintenance of the school possible. The executive committee consists of eight men of whom Professor Charles C. Torrey of Yale University is chairman. Each year one of the supporting universities loans a professor to serve as director of the school for the year.

The present plant of the school consists of a leased building in which are provided the necessary quarters for the director, a limited number of students, the care-taker (Mr. Charles E. Smith), the necessary servants and last and most important, the library. This is, today, the most important possession of the school. It numbers about 5,000 volumes which have been selected with unusual care. Few important works on Palestine or the Bible are wanting. This library has been well catalogued, and is quite properly the nucleus of the school.

Purpose of School.

The work of the school is determined by its object. It does not attempt to carry on lecture courses or, in fact, any set courses of study of any kind. This sort of work the student may find at home. The American School at Jerusalem exists to encourage and assist in research work. Neither can the school conduct or carry on any excavations, for such work is a constant cause of difference and difficulty with the Turkish authorities, and any such friction would imperil the very existence of the school. Today the school exists with the full consent and approval of the Turkish authorities, even to the extent that it is placed upon the free list so that all packages addressed to the school are admitted free of duty. The school is on the best of terms with all the powers in the city. The Patriarchs of the Greek and Roman Catholic Churches are devoted friends of the American School and their great libraries are always open to its members. A still more important connection is the German Evangelical Archaeological Institute with Herr Gustaf Dallmann as its permanent director. This school is directly across the street from the American School and its fine library is always at our disposal. In addition all its lectures are open to the Americans. But perhaps the most important connection is that with the Ecole de Saint-Etienne, the great college of the Dominicans. These men are all scholars and modernists of the deepest dye, so much so that the school is at present in considerable disrepute among the reactionaries who seem to hold the balance of power in Romanism today.

Monks Friendly to School.

The Domincans have a very large library and receive all the religious periodicals of the University of Chicago. This library is always open to us. In addition they give extensive courses of lectures during the winter to all of which the American School is invited; and Father Vincent, Father Lagrange and Father Dhorme are frequent callers at the American School. But all this is really only supplementary to the real purpose of the school. This purpose, as we have noted above, is to encourage Biblical students to acquire a first hand knowledge of the land of the Bible and its people. Valuable as the experience of the tourist may be (and I do not wish to minimize it in the least) it is too hurried and follows too much the beaten paths of travel to yield the best results. Only residence in the country, leisurely travel outside of the tourist high roads and daily contact with the natives for months can make one familiar with the land and its people. Such an experience reveals to the one who enjoys it how little customs have changed here. Almost daily one finds some difficult problem in Old Testament study illuminated by some superstition or custom which survives even to the present day. But for the independent traveler such an experience would be very costly, so right here the American School comes in to serve its members. Through its caretaker, Mr. Charles E. Smith, it holds contracts by which it can secure horses, mules, tents, cooks, servants, dragomans and indeed everything necessary at about one third the cost to the ordinary tourist. In addition it's members get what are called "resident rates" at the hotels and at all shops. Needless to say these are far below "tourist rates."

The Members.

But a word now regarding the members of the school. Naturally they are mostly post-graduate students of our American universities, and usually former students of the director in charge of the school for the year. But any American may register with the director and become a member of the school, entitled to all its privileges both in its own library and expeditions and also in its connections with the other schools and libraries mentioned above. If he has ever been a member of any of the contributing schools he pays no fee. If not the registration fee is twenty-five dollars.

Perhaps the work of the school may best be understood from a brief review of the past year. Seven members of the school met the director, Dr. Harper, in Constantinople on October 3, and the school was declared formally open. Two of the men at once departed for Egypt to begin their study there. The remaining ones spent a week in the Ottoman capitol and then took a coasting steamer down the Asia Minor Coast. After a week three members of the party disembarked at Beirut for a month in Syria and Upper Galilee. Baalbeck, Damascus, Mt. Hermon, Huleh, Galilee, Nazareth, Mt. Carmel, Acre, Tyre and Sidon were visited in turn while the remainder of the party went on to Jerusalem whence trips were made to many points near at hand. On November seventeenth the school, nine in all, met at Jerusalem and on the twenty-ninth the whole party started out on the longest, most difficult and most dangerous trip of the year. With a large and complete camp equipment we journeyed to Jericho, es-Salt, Jerash, Ammon, Heshbon, Nebo, Mukaur, Madeba, Rabba, Kerak and Petra, our goal. After several days in that mysterious "Rock City" we descended into the desert of the Arabah, far below sea level, and journeyed north through the desert for several days to the Dead Sea and the famous Salt Mountain, then along the west shore of the sea to Engedi and up to Jerusalem on the nineteenth of December. All the festivities of both the Latin and the Greek Christmas were enjoyed and then the Epiphanies of the two churches. Then came more expeditions by smaller parties. We found our full crowd of nine people unwieldy, so occasionally there were three separate expeditions out at the time. There were trips to the Philistine plain, to more points near Jerusalem, to the Plain of Sharon, and to Samaria. One big trip was made to Hebron, Beersheba and the Negeb, and another through Galilee and Syria, reaching as far north as Aleppo. Quite unexpectedly two of our parties met in Aleppo. Trips to Egypt were made by several who had been there. All the festivities of the Easter season and the Samaritan Passover were witnessed. In fact we were busy all the time until about the first of June when the last of our number started for the home land. In passing, we might notice that several people who could not spend the whole year in the work joined us in February for the spring trips.

The Work Accomplished.

One asks, "But what did you do?" To the scientific student we can offer several hitherto unknown inscriptions, accurate copies of the text of several inscriptions which had been known but never copied and a number of antiquities which were gathered and left in the school. But most important of results is the fact that we are able to live in the Orient long enough to become somewhat steeped in its spirit; we were able to visit and study leisurely all the points of Biblical interest and acquire much informatnon regarding the customs of the people, many of which run back almost unchanged to a very remote antiquity. In short, we were able to acquire an intimate personal knowledge of the land of the Bible, its topography, its geography, its people, their language and customs.

Some of the results of this study will appear in further articles in the Christian Century.

The highest result of education is tolerance. Long ago men fought and died for their faith; but it took ages to teach them the other kind of courage—the courage to recognize the faiths of their brethren and their rights of conscience.—Helen Keller.

To live in the presence of great truths, to be dealing with eternal laws, to be led by permanent ideals,—that is what keeps a man patient when the world ignores him, and calm and unspoiled when the world praises him.—Francis G. Peabody.

Man And His Religious Nature

Religion a Source of Strength, Seen in the Testing Times of Life

By Professor E. S. Ames

In the tests of physical health, the proportionate and harmonious development of the various organs of the body is one of the simplest. It applies to the spiritual nature, too.

The necessity for this symmetry and proportion in one's perception of the truth is shown in any serious attempt to solve the problem of personal interest and of social service. Egoism and altruism, for example, often contend for exclusive recognition, as if neither could endure the realization of the other. At the present time the popular moralists laud altruism, and idealize disinterested devotion to other people's interest as if no account need be taken of the character and equipment of the one who thus devotes himself. Experience and reflection, however, are gradually impressing the lesson that efficient altruism can only characterize people who possess rich and abundant life themselves, and who also know how to use it, not so much as a gift to needy souls as an example for their imitation, and to encourage them to self-help and self-direction.

Interests of Self and Society Identical.

The interests of self and society are not fundamentally opposed, nor are they merely harmonious. Thy are identical. Just as men are learning how to control the inner laws of plants and animals for their growth and self-preservation, so they are discovering also how to nurture the instincts and powers of the child so that he shall in maturity possess within himself the resources of virtue and the antidotes of evil.

This means of health is peculiarly adapted to human beings, for they are strangely fitted to be their own physicians. They have the light of consciousness by which they may examine the inner chambers of their minds and detect weakness or disease and subject it to needed care.

The virtuous man is in this way also more than an automaton. He is not blindly the slave of his habits. He is conscious of their power and rejoices in it. Without vain pride, he stands within the citadel of his formed character and sees armies of the tempter dash helplessly against his defenses. Base sins do not tempt him. Riches, with their tinsel arms, cannot assault him, nor sensuous pleasures with their soft allurements. Vanity, with its masks, and duplicity with its empty show falls away in defeat. False ambitions and the flatterers they bring urging compromise and the methods of worldly "success" cower in the distance like phantoms of the mist. His strength is liberated from such conflicts to engage the subtler adversaries of the soul, which change their form after every defeat and rise in new disguise to avenge themselves upon a higher plane, and in more insidious ways. But in every advance he gains new strength and a new sense of mastery and is able to rescue and defend others with himself against the conquered sins.

Where Character Helps.

Along with this power of resistance, health affords strength for recovery when accident or disease has brought one low. It is often in prompt and speedy recovery that a good constitution counts for the most, and one of the best marks of genuine religious faith is the certainty and facility with which a person rebounds from mistakes, or sins, or doubts, or disappointments, and gains from them the lessons which make him immune from such dangers ever after.

The religiously cultivated soul has built into memory and imagination the great words of psalmists and poets, of prophets and apostles, so that he is no longer the victim of partial and petty views of life, which in success so easily swell with conceit, and in reverses are so utterly crushed down. He has learned to escape from pride by seeing himself in relation to mightier men about him, and in the past. He knows how to gather himself out of despair by the conviction that God does not mock but only chastens his children and offers most freely the thrones of his kingdom to those who have risen through the discipline of great tribulation.

Reverses Test Character.

The reverses of life are often the severest tests of our spiritual natures. They demand resignation and courage. In great sorrows, such as loss of loved ones, the whole world is darkened to us and emptied of its value. Things for which we have toiled and sacrificed suddenly seem cold and distant and those indifferent before now confront us vividly on every hand as reminders of days which will not return. The joys of the past array themselves around our grief to make it intolerable in contrast.

How can we in such hours escape bitterness of heart and sullen enmity against out fate? Here religion saves us, for it brings patient trust and hope. It offers the consolation of the presence and love of God, and fellowship with other suffering souls. The world comes back from such a night into a subdued but comforting dawn. In its light new tasks and opportunities beckon—not to forget the past, but to be true to it by work and kindliness. To the devout heart the world gains thus a new dimension, an infinite tenderness, which envelops home and friends and the strangers of the street with the bonds of closer kinship and sympathy.

Or one may have encountered failure in practical pursuits, in his business or profession. All the high hopes with which as a youth he faced the future have been shattered. Surrounded by the wreck, or by the small fruits of his effort, he has little courage to lay new foundations. He feels that he has had his trial and lost. But now it will appear just how strong a man he is. Will he sink under the disappointment, or will he, even in middle life, sit down with the tangled skein to straighten out the knots and begin anew? The same alternatives, with greater intensity and tragic meaning, greet the man who has fallen into sin. He may succumb to the shame and disgrace and abandon himself in cowardice to still lower depths, or he may respond to conscience and to pleading visions of virtue and call the good hearts of the world to nurse him back to health.

The Danger in Doubt.

This resilience of soul is especially tested by doubt. The trial comes often in youth, but it occurs in all ages. It comes whenever one's view of God or human goodness or the basis of virtue or the reality of the future seems no longer adequately supported by the teaching of the past. At first a sense of dread and horror, then the attraction of novelty and intellectual activity and perhaps a bewildering confusion and helplessness. Many things may happen. One may scoff at what he once revered, another may simply leave it all one side and suppress the cry of his heart as something "pathological."

Still another may earnestly and patiently set himself to find a statement for the great realities of human life in words more consistent with reason and experience of the world, and in ways which shall still enlist a genuine faith and an enthusiastic service. He may not believe so many things, but if he believes even a few with more intensity and fruitfulness he has entered into a way of larger life and usefulness.

"The Great Soul of Jesus."

All these qualities of health find abundant illustration in the great soul of Jesus. In his fidelity to the truth he maintained a noble sanity superior to all fanaticism and bigotry. He was not preëminently a man of feeling and his religion did not consist in emotion. He undertook practical tasks, saw them in a large moral perspective, and wrought at them with tireless energy and patience. Devotion to these positive ends, the rescue of individuals and the redemption of society through them, enabled him to resist the evils of the world.

He was preoccupied against them, so that they could not dissuade him from his mission by threats upon his life, nor decoy him from his purpose by promises of popular success. His greatness was most apparent in defeat. His ministry was beset by failures. He would have welcomed the rich young man to his discipleship, and perhaps to apostleship, but was compelled to see him turn back to his riches. He was unable to work miracles in at least one town because of its unbelief. He healed multitudes and sought to make them his followers, but at the close of his ministry only a few companied with him. One of the twelve betrayed him. Peter denied him. Thomas doubted him. Philip proved ignorant of the whole meaning of his mission, and Jerusalem, over which he had lamented and prayed and in whose streets he had taught love and gentleness—Jerusalem put him to death.

But he has recovered from every defeat, from the grave of obscurity, from persecution, from misunderstanding, from myths and superstitution. He lives in the world today the mightiest soul of the race, the saviour and redeemer of men, the spiritual guide for the future.

Christianity a Life, Not a Church

By G. N. Stevenson

Christianity is bigger than churchianity, and much more precious. The measure of success in the growth of the king of heaven is not the number brought to baptism, but the extent to which men and women express in themselves the life of Christ. Churches may increase in numbers, but decline in spirituality and in their power of real usefulness as regards the deepening the righteous life. Life is the true test of discipleship. There is a strong tendency to emphasize number. The weekly reports in our periodicals read so many added, from the Methodist, so many from the Baptist, etc., and so many from the world. The supreme aim of the evangelist seems to be to gain members, and an evangelist is not counted successful unless he does so. Converts are looked for and counted with selfish pride as the Indian used to look for and count his scalps.

Now we freely grant that we must win members to the Christian life, but we look with askance upon that species of evangelism that has not advanced farther than the multiplication table. We are slowly learning that the ultimate triumph of the Christian religion is advanced or retarded not so much through an increase or a decrease in numbers as in the strength of the spiritual character obtaining in the body whether consisting of few or many souls. Sometimes the interest of genuine Christianity will be best subserved by a complete eradication of a local or even of a general religious body. Many so-called Christian churches are the direct cause of their own failure to grow. Churches that are steeped in sin and odorous with worldly pride, have within them the seeds of their own destruction, and it were far better that they forever lose their identity. Churches that tolerate divorces for every cause and re-marriages as readily as the divorces and smile upon them with the utmost complacency, cannot hope to attract spiritually minded people to her altars.

Again, many churches destroy their influence by adopting the pugnacious habit. Some people interpret Christianity in terms of system and words and logic. It is held to be something that can be dissected and analyzed into microscopic and infinitesimal parts with a certain definite complement of atoms foreordained to a place among the true elements of genuine Christianity. And the battle goes on incessantly between election and un-election, conditional salvation and unconditional salvation, hell fire and conscience torment, baptism a precursory agent of forgiveness and baptism a symbol of forgiveness. It is unknown to many would-be theologians and leaders in church work that Christianity is not essentially a system but a life. It is a living power from heaven compelling to the life of sacrifice and service. It manifests itself not in a keen intellectual perception of a set of dogmas or supposed Scriptural teaching but in a holy life. It is character that God wants and such character as is won in its fulness through the new life begotten by the spirit. "By their fruits shall ye know them," said Jesus. The children of God are kind, showing brotherly kindness and love in its highest spiritual sense. The work of God is perfected not by might nor by power, but by my spirit, saith the Lord.

Judgment must begin at the house of God. If we would be able to appeal with strength to a divided Christian world, if we would be able to present a consistent call to an unregenerate age our local churches, the great brotherhood at large must wash her garments, must kneel at the feet of Jesus and not only hear his words but receive his spirit. Christianity is not a church but God's spirit working in man in the world looking toward redemption, salvation.

Freedom and Progress of the Disciples

Letter from Mr. Hughes.

Dear Brother Gates: I have read with deep emotion your answer to my question as to how a brotherhood like ours can be expected to move out of the ecclesiastical order into that ethical where the conditions of the kingdom of God are to be found. Possibly you did not see as others may not have felt all that question meant to me. What is in the seed continues through all changes and in a social organism prevails against all factional and reform societies within.

Jasper Seaton Hughes.

The Reply.

Dear Brother Hughes: The answer I gave to your former communication concerning the Disciples does not seem to have been entirely convincing. You still have some doubt about the ability of the Disciples as a whole to adjust themselves to the changing needs and conditions of the present and future. Change in religious conditions and corresponding readustment in religious organizations, we know there must be. Now, the question is, can the Disciples make the adjustment, inevitably required of them, and remain as a working, vital force in the Christianity of the future?

But before attempting another answer to this question, there is a previous question which you have asked that calls for serious consideration, as having the most vital bearing upon the whole problem. You ask in your former letter, and now ask again, the following question: "Where and when did an ecclesiastical establishment like ours ever move itself out of the column of the ecclesiastical into that of the ethical?"

World Outgrows Sects.

The question simply is, do religious bodies change with the changing needs and ideals of mankind and so preserve their usefulness and efficiency? I must frankly confess what you already know to be true, that so far as I have read Christian history, religious movements do not continuously for more than a generation or two maintain their adjustment with the world's vital needs. No denomination has ever kept up with religious progress; none has ever made sufficient change to satisfy the demands of new conditions. Through all Christian history down to the present moment the only way the new religious needs and conditions of men have been met, has been by the creation of new religious movements.

A new sect has been raised up every time the world grew out of its old ideas and life into a new age. The old religious orders never responded to the new life, were never equal to the new tasks. They have always asserted their ability and authority to deal with all the questions, problems, and opportunities of a changed world; and just so often failed to make good their claim.

No matter how many generations ago they came into existence, they still insist that they have the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, which was bestowed upon them by their religious grandfathers. Any truth later than the date of their origin they brand as heresy, and any custom unlike the customs handed down from the fathers they taboo as innovation. Then they go through the contortions of making themselves look young, fresh and vigorous, and sufficient for the new day.

Law of Denominationalism.

This is the fundamental law of denominationalism—the consecration of the old and customary as the divine and inviolable. Every sect says concerning its faith and order: "The plans and specifications of this order of things came down from heaven—we copied it from the pattern shown us in the mount. It is God's building: when he wants it changed, repaired or remodeled he will attend to it. It is not ours to correct, amend, or revise; to add to or to take from."

That being true, there is but one thing for men to do who want to get something done in their own generation. Since they do not wish to violate so sacred an order, and do not care to wait for changes in human things to be inaugurated in heaven, they leave the old order and set up a new one on truer and more recent plans and principles. That is what all the great reformers were obliged to do from Luther to Campbell. They tried to stay with the old orders and make some changes to suit new conditions, but they were forbidden, and compelled to go apart. The result of the process has been the separation into distinct bodies of the Lutherans, and Presbyterians, and Methodists, and Baptists, and Disciples, and all the rest of the hundred or more religious bodies in Europe and America.

Present and Future Adjustment.

This process and separation and division in the church of God will go on just as long as there is growth and progress, with no religious order free enough, elastic enough, progressive enough, or broad enough to accommodate all who believe in Jesus Christ and want to live his life and do his work under the varying conditions and forms suited to each generation. The Disciples have to reckon with growth and progress just as much as any body of Christians in the past. And none have escaped the judgment passed upon a stagnant church by a moving world. Above every other movement in religious history the Disciples must strive not only for a single but a continuous adjustment of religious forces.

It is growth and progress that are the occasions of new sects; it is resistance to progress that is the cause of them. Sectarianism is at bottom synonymous with unprogressiveness. It is not enough, then, that the Disciples provide for a present adjustment of differences among Christians; they must also provide for all future differences that are bound to arise through growth. The world is already future to the Declaration and Address. If there are evidences so soon of discrepancies between the position of the Disciples and modern Christian thought, what will be the width of the chasm that separates them from their age in another hundred years?

A Century of Sect-Making.

It does not look hopeful for the Disciples in the light of past history. They have evidently not been equal to the task during the last century, for scores of denominations have arisen during this time under the very eyes of the Disciples. More sects have sprung up since the Declaration and Address was published than during any previous hundred years in the history of the church. And all this multiplication of sects in spite of the avowed purpose of the Disciples to lay a final platform and make a final reformation of the church that should render all further reformations unnecessary. They have clung to this purpose in spite of many evidences of failure.

Are Disciples Different.

The anxious question which every earnest Disciple is asking himself just now is, can the Disciples yet prove themselves equal to their chosen task, and thus make themselves an exception to the rule of religious history? Are they so different from other religious movements that they can escape the fate that has overtaken all others? Perhaps my wish for the Disciples is father to my thought. I have always wanted the Disciples to be to the religious world what they professed to be—the end of sectarian strife and division; and to stand where they profess to stand—upon a basis of fellowship broad enough to include all the people of God. The philanthropy of such an aim has always captivated my spirit; the challenge which it makes to Christian statesmanship has always seemed worthy of my deepest study and consecration.

It is an audacious thing to present one's self to the world in such a light. There are just two ways by which the Disciples can endure the glare of so exalted an office: by closing their eyes to what others have attempted and suffered, and to their own shortcoming; or by sheltering themselves in the strength and wisdom of the whole church of God, both past and present. In so valiant an undertaking the Disciples dare not be ignorant of what others have thought and done through the centuries to achieve the same end. It is too vast for any private enterprise, or the policy of an easy self-glorification. It is like offering to bridge the ocean, this proposal to bridge the almost ageless gulf that divides the children of God.

Hope of the Disciples.

Is there, then, more hope of the Disciples than of other religious bodies that have come and served but a single day and generation? There is if they will live up to their principles. There is no reason why the plea of the Disciples should settle into fixedness and finality, or the order which they build up around it bind it in a rigid, cast-iron system. If the program and plea of the Disciples shall harden into an unchangeable dogma, what better will they be than any other sect that has come and gone, arrogated to itself infallibility, and unchristianized the rest of the religious world? That would be mockery, indeed, in the face of nineteen centuries of sectarian bigotry, and the principle of liberty and largeness embedded in the foundations of the movement.

The Disciples erect a hard and fast system of doctrine and provoke sectarian revolt against the tyranny of theological opinion? Impossible! That would be to forget the pit from which they were dug. They came to put a stop to sect-making. The Disciples created an ecclesiastical tribunal to censure all departure from the customs and ideas of the fathers? That would be for the sow that had washed herself to return to wallow in the mire. Our fathers left the strife of the schools and courts for the companionship of the Master out under the broad skies of the Father, and he said: "By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples if ye have love one for another." There can be no enduring love of the brethren where ideas, interpretations, texts, rites and names are made tests of fellowship. Only love is binding upon one who seeks fellowship with Christ, and they who are Christ's friends and companions are my brethren.

Freedom of the Disciples.

There can be consistently but one thing finally fixed in the faith and practice of the Disciples, and that is loyalty to all that constitutes one a disciple of Christ, according to the testimony of Christ himself. This is the liberty wherewith the Disciples have set me free. They have even put the testimony in my own hands and said to me: read it yourself, without note or comment, and follow its plain sense. No man is your teacher but Christ: He binds nothing upon you but what you see to be good and true, according to the leading of his Spirit, which He gives to them that ask Him.

And here I own Alexander Campbell as my example. I ask no more than he claimed for himself and the Brush Run Church when they united with the Baptists—the freedom "to teach and preach whatever they learned from the Holy Scriptures, regardless of any creed or formula in Christendom." I must interpret this as referring to any creed, written or unwritten. Nay, as a disciple of his he would insist that I follow his principles, instead of himself, as he followed principles instead of men with their closed systems and conclusiveness. He said: "I have endeavored to read the scriptures as though no one had ever read them before me; and I am as much on my guard against reading them today, through the medium of my own views yesterday, or a week ago, as I am against being influenced by any foreign name, authority, or system whatever."

Freedom of Campbell.

Such was the mettle in the blood of Alexander Campbell. He was a Christian freeman. His blood flows only in the veins of freemen. Those who use his ideas or his name to club their brethren into ecclesiastical conformity have not learned of him. Those who really sit at his feet come away with open minds toward the whole realm of truth, and loving hearts toward all disciples of Jesus Christ. They demand freedom to think and grow, and accord it to others. Campbell set no bounds to his growth and progress; he did not fear the disagreement of his conclusions today with his conclusions of yesterday. He looked for change and justified it. The only thing fixed in his position was his loyalty to the word of God, in those parts that rang true and divine in his own soul. But to him the word of God was subject to a progressive interpretation and unfolding. The scriptures changed because he changed; they were really the same yesterday and today, but he was different.

Freedom and Growth.

If I could not be as free as Alexander Campbell was I would renounce fellowship with the Disciples. This is how I understand their principle of liberty in the light of Campbell's spirit and practice when he was at his best in the plastic and growing period of his life. As wrought into the position of the Disciples it seems to me to afford as broad and free a platform as any Christian man could wish. If growth and progress are not possible on such a basis, I despair of finding it anywhere. I am perfectly sure of this: that there is no body of Christians in existence today who could offer me greater freedom than I have enjoyed among the Disciples of Christ.

Plea for Room.

The Disciples stand for room in the church of God; for simplicity of Christian discipleship and universality of fellowship. That is the whole import, the first and last principles of their plea for Christian union. I proclaim it a scandalous affront to the Disciples when a new sect is started for any purpose. There ought to be room for them in the platform of the Disciples. I hold it a wretched stultification of their aim and position when a good man is invited to leave them and go to his own, because of doctrinal departure from their historic teaching, with unchangeable dogmas, written or unwritten. Every rigid doctrinal or ecclesiastical form works exclusion, invites revolt, and provokes separation. The business of the Disciples is to prevent sect-making by laying a big platform and spreading an ample roof for all the children of God. Thus can they both grow, and shelter growth and progress. And thus can the Disciples constantly renew their vitality from generation to generation, and move with the changing life of men.

The rest of your letter I shall deal with in a subsequent article.

Relig ious Education

By Harry F. Burns

The International Committee's Graded Lessons

For the past quarter of a century there has been a growing demand on the part of the best churches of the protestant faith for a system of Sunday-school lessons adapted to the needs of the pupils in the various grades of the school. In response to this demand several series of text books for the Sunday-school have been published in the last five years. Notable among these are "Constructive Bible Studies," by the University of Chicago Press; the Y. M. C. A. publications, and the series published by the Episcopal church. Such series are now in use in many of the more progressive churches.

It is in response to this growing demand that the committee of the International Sunday-school Association published last January an outline of a graded curriculum to go into effect the first of October, 1909. The series at present provides only for the younger pupils, but the lessons for the advanced grades will be out in a few months.

Some schools will want still, a more carefully graded system of lessons than this provides; but for most of the churches this series will be the best they can adopt. It is a distinct step in advance toward the time when the teaching of our Sunday-school will be worthy of the respect of the best educators of our day.

The announcement of the graded series made by the International Committee follows:

The Twelfth International Sunday-school Convention held at Louisville, Ky., June 20, 1908, instructed the Lesson Committee "to continue the preparation of a thoroughly graded course of lessons, which may be used by any Sunday-school which desires it, whether in whole or in part." The Lesson Committee had already been in correspondence with an important group of Elementary Workers, who had begun the construction of a scheme of graded lessons. The results of their prolonged and arduous work were put at the disposal of the Lesson Committee, thus placing the Lesson Committee and the Sunday-school world under a great obligation.

The committee could not be expected to complete in so brief a time what must be the work of several years. It was decided, therefore, to issue in January, 1909, the First Year's Lessons for the first three departments, with a list of the proposed themes for the following years in those departments. It is hoped that before the end of 1909 the lessons for the second year in each of those departments will be completed. Work on the Intermediate grades will be undertaken immediately, and the results issued as soon as possible.

I. The Purpose of the Graded Lessons:

To meet the spiritual needs of the pupil in each stage of his development.

The spiritual needs broadly stated are these:

1. To know God as he has revealed himself to us in nature, in the heart of man, and in Christ.

2. To exercise towards God, the Father and his Son, Jesus Christ, our Lord and Saviour, trust, obedience and worship.

3. To know and do your duty to others.

4. To know and do our duty to ourselves.

II. The Material Chosen for These Lessons:

The truths are presented in lessons from the Bible, and are illustrated by lessons from nature, from the history of missions, and from the temperance and other humane movements.

III. The Construction of the Course:

1. General Statements.

The departments recognized by the International Sunday-school Association are Beginners (ages under six), Primary (ages 6-8), Junior (ages 9-12), Intermediate (ages 13-16), Senior (ages 17-20), Advanced (ages 21 and up).

Fifty-two lessons are provided for each year. The courses are planned for about nine months, in harmony with the ordinary public school year, in order that schools open during this period only, may not have an incomplete scheme of study.

The lessons for the remaining three months, while not essential to complete the aim for the year, are valuable in themselves, and either supplement the work of the current year or else prepare for that of the following year.

The titles of the Lessons in the Beginners and Primary Courses are mainly simple story titles. In the Junior Course, whenever possible, a name and an event have been associated in the title as an aid to memory. Throughout the courses, preference in most cases is given to such titles as have been made familiar in literature and art.

So far as possible the well-known form wrought out in the uniform lessons has been preserved in the graded lesson scheme. It includes the title, the Scripture lesson as a whole, the portion which the pupil is expected to prepare specifically, and the verse for the child, memory verse, or text.

The knowledge already in the possession of the pupil through his day school work has been taken into consideration in planning these courses; and the natural abilities of the average pupil have governed the selection of the memory texts.

It will be seen that these lessons, being arranged in units of one year each, can be adjusted to any plan of departmental classification; but an effort has been made to adapt each year's work to the interests, capacities and needs of the pupils of that year.

2. Specific Statements.

(a) Beginners and Primary Courses.

The lessons are arranged in groups under successive themes, which are related in thought.

In selecting the material for these lessons, historical order has not been observed, but each passage has been chosen for the truth it contains, and for the value of the truth in the spiritual nuture of the child.

Large use of the method of repetition has been made in the construction of these courses. Not only do children love the retelling of stories, but that process is essential for impressing truth upon their minds. Hence, in the Beginners Course frequent opportunities are given for the retelling of stories. In the Primary Course provision is generally made at the close of each theme for a review of the main teaching which it contains under the title of "Review," or "Generalization." There the retelling of stories under a given theme can be freely used.

(b) The Junior Course.

It is important in constructing a course of moral and religious education to remember that important crises occur in the physical, mental and moral development of the individual, in his progress from childhood toward adult life. The most prominent crises occur about the ages of thirteen and sixteen or seventeen. Each of these represent the close of one and the beginning of a new period. An attempt has been made in the arrangement of the Junior Course to keep this first crisis in view, and to prepare for it by appropriate studies and by the awakening of those desires, thoughts, volitions and habits which will lead to the decision to enter upon the love and service of Christ.

During the first two years, when the historical sense begins to grow, the instruction is given by means of stories chronologically arranged, taken from various periods. The studies of the last two years will be based upon successive narratives of a continuous, though not necessarily complete, history.

The only exception to this chronological arrangement will be in the third year, when a topical course on temperance is introduced, in order that this subject may receive special attention at this critical point.

As this is a strong memory period, many psalms and other connected passages of Scripture are prescribed for memorizing. In those cases the thought of the entire memory passage is similar to that of the group of lessons with which it is associated. Under this arrangement it is impossible that the memory text shall in every instance embody the truth of the particular lesson to which it is attached.

The geography of Bible lands is introduced into the course at the end of the first year, that being the period when is appears in the day school course. Through the geographical setting given in the Exodus lessons, it is hoped to awaken the interest of the pupil in Bible lands.

Why We Love Them

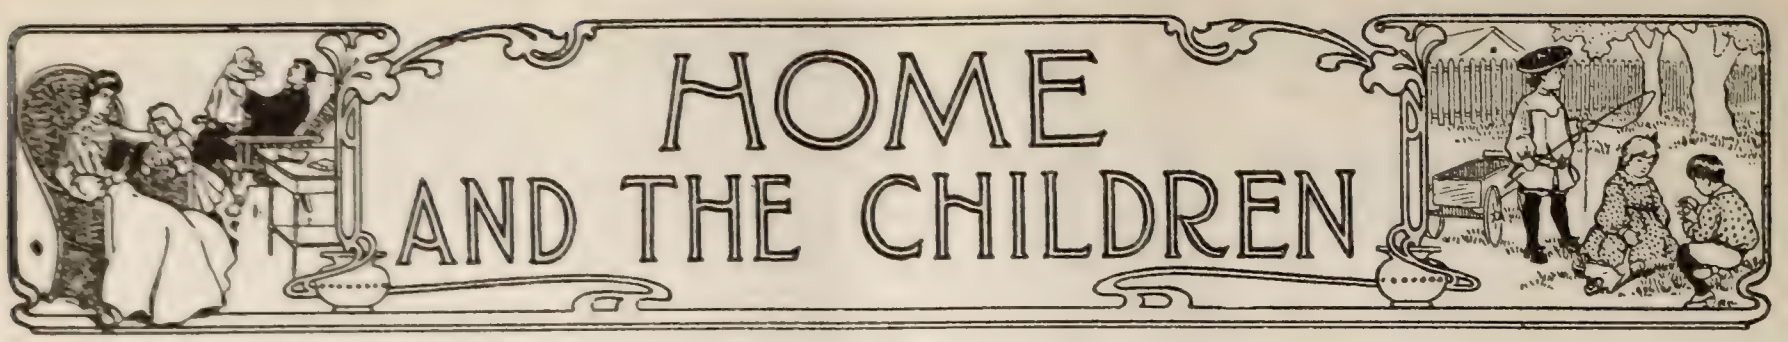
Being Part of a Chapter from Mrs. Royal J. Dye's New Book on the Congo*

"Pity is akin to love." The heart of the God-sent teacher goes out to them with an intense yearning, seeing that they may become transformed by the love of God. He sees in the ugly, belligerent cannibal, a true valiant soldier of the cross; in the idle, dissolute youth, the zealous, consecrated standard bearer, marching throughout the land carrying life and redemption to his people. His wife sees in the most hopelessly degraded woman, the ideal wife and mother, in whom the heart of a husband may safely trust; in the babe, besmirched with oil and camwood, the clean shining face of a winsome child, drawing all hearts by its innocent purity. The missionaries see all this and more and love them until they have seen their dreams more than fulfilled. Then they love them not for what they may become, but for what they are. Pity has changed to admiration. Day by day this is increased as these people, so short time since in deepest degradation, heroically give up all for Christ. Poverty and persecution are accepted joyfully for the gospel's sake. These young converts merit deep admiration and respect by their devotion and the development of nobler characteristics. Little by little this admiration is strengthened until a strong attachment is formed for these loyal disciples. This is the stepping stone to real affection which is reciprocal. They have come to appreciate the true meaning and purpose of their white teachers' life among them. They understand the surrender of home ties made to come to them. Their hearts go out to these leaders sent to them by God, and they love them unselfishly and devotedly.

"Heaven is not reached at a single bound
And we build the ladder by which we rise
From the lowly earth to the vaulted skies."

This is as true as the missionary's love for the heathen. It is by these oftimes slow steps that undying friendships are formed between the missionary and his people. It is doubtless difficult for others to realize the possibility of such love, when hearing the statement made for the first time. Only those who have experienced it can fully appreciate it. An instance, however, may help to make plain the reason for this deep personal affection.

The author of this volume was ill at Bolenge for eighteen months before returning to America on our last furlough. At times recovery was despaired of.



At one time the writer seemed sufficiently recovered for Dr. Dye to safely leave her to the care of his medical colleagues, while he took up a journey up the river on missionary work. A few days after his departure, however, a serious relapse occurred. It was in the dead of the night. A messenger was dispatched to the native village for volunteers to go for the absent husband. The whole village volunteered and a crew of the strongest paddlers were chosen. Hurriedly they embarked in the little log canoe and set out on their long journey up river. On and on they paddled, stopping for nothing. Through storm and the merciless sunshine they went, scarcely stopping even for food. For two days and nights they paddled against the strong Bosira current, thus reaching the place where they expected to find the itinerating party. They were not there, but had promised to return that night, so these messengers impatiently awaited their coming. At sundown the tunk-tunk-tunk of the native cance drum was heard and the party came into the beach. Fear seized them as they saw the line of the messengers from home. The accompanying note they handed to the doctor soon gave them no room for doubt. Then did these noble paddlers offer to return at once, that the husband might not get home too late. They chose a small, swift canoe in which he could scarcely sit, and three of the swiftest paddlers started out to paddle homeward. The tiny canoe could make better time than the large canoe with many paddlers which Dr. Dye had been using. The full force of these strong muscled boatmen was put into every stroke of the paddle. No unnecessary words were spoken, for they were making a race with death. The swift current of the river aided in the flight. At four o'clock in the afternoon of that same day, they quietly swung into the beach at Bolenge. Their coming had been noted, though the drum was now silent, and as they sank exhausted to the ground, they thanked God they had not been too late. Do we love them? After such proofs of affection and devotion to us, the very rocks would cry out against us did we not return their love. Were it necessary they would willingly lay down their lives for us, and we would as willingly lay down our lives for them and the gospel.

*This book is being published by the Foreign Society and will be ready for the Pittsburg convention. It will contain about 300 pages and will be well illustrated. Cloth bound. Price, 50 cents. Every Disciple should read this wonderful story of the hand of God on the Congo.

The Baby for Me

I have heard about babies angelic
  With a heavenly look in their eyes,
And hair like the sunbeams of morning
  When first they appear in the skies,
And smiles like the smiles of a cherub,
  And mouth like the buds of a rose,
And themselves like the lilies and daisies
  And every sweet flower that grows.

My baby's the jolliest baby
  That any one ever did see;
There is nothing angelic about him,
  But he's just the right baby for me!
His smile's not at all like a cherub's,
  But rather a comical grin;
And his hair—well, it favors the sunbeams
  When sunbeams are wondrously thin.

His eyes, though they're blue, like the heavens,
  Are remarkably earthly with fun;
And his mouth's rather large for a rosebud,
  Unless 'twere a half-opened one.
His hands don't resemble a fairy's
  In the least. They're a strong little pair,
As you'd think, I am sure, if he'd got you
  As oft he gets me—by the hair!

And he isn't a bit like a lily,
  Or any sweet blossom that grows,
For no flower on earth, I am certain,
  Has a dear little cunning pug nose.
He's himself—full of mischief, the darling,
  And naughty as naughty can be;
And I'm glad that he isn't angelic,
  For he's just the right baby for me.

The Drone or the Honey Bee

BY MISS Z. I. DAVIS.

"Helen, come and take these letters to the box for mamma, please. Then here is a pail of milk I would like to have you carry to Grandma Wren. She is very feeble, and she does like a cool drink of buttermilk while it is fresh."

It was a hot, dusty walk up the road to where the mail carrier stopped every morning. Helen reluctantly took the letters and started across the lot to lessen the distance. Her mamma had brought her to Aunt Kate's where they had been enjoying a delightful vacation. "I wish," she began in a half audible tone, "that I did not have to do so many errands." Just then she came to her aunty's berry patch from which the chore boy had gathered fresh fruit for breakfast.

"I'll rest a little while and eat some berries," exclaimed Helen, laying her letters down under a large bush. She knew that she ought to hasten, but it was so very warm. She gathered a quantity of red ripe berries and sat down to enjoy the feast.

Scarcely a leaf was stirring. Sitting in the shadow of the great oak, she began to grow drowsy. The bees were busy gathering honey. Two bees were flying about the wild rose bush near her.

"Buz-buz-bzzz," hummed one of them as he kept alert on the wing.

"Grumble—buz—mumble—glum-m-m," said the other. Helen fairly laughed aloud as the cross bee scolded and droned out his complaint. She wished she knew what he was saying.

Hark! the first bee was talking very plain. A wand seemed to fall on her ear. "Buzz," he sang in bee fashion, "How sweet these berries are. What a fine place to gather honey. How important I am. I help to keep the world sweet. How glad I am people like my wares. Buzz, I am so thankful."

"What a happy fellow," laughed Helen. Then the other bee began to talk "Buzz—grumble—mumble," retorted he, ill naturedly. "What a hard life I have. I must work from morning until night every day while it is summer, so that people can eat up what I have gathered in winter. Here is this lazy little girl asleep, who will be one to rob me. I will punish her," and he lighted on her hand. "O—O," cried Helen, sitting up in fright, and rubbing on moist clay where the saucy bee had been.

"You bad drone," cried the funny honey bee. "I will tell the Queen of you tonight for stinging little Helen, instead of gathering honey. You do the least and grumble the most."

Helen ran for her letters, but alas, they were gone. She began to cry and thought she would go right home and tell her mother the whole truth, but after awhile her hand stopped smarting and she resolved to make believe that she had mailed the letters. Upon her return home she took the buttermilk that her mother gave her and, kissing her goodbye, started down the road to Grandma Wren's. All the joy seemed gone out of life. The blue bells nodded at her as she passed by and seemed to say, "You acted a lie." The birds were singing in the tree tops and she thought they sang, "Sounds to me like a lie." She met a lady in a carriage going to market, who, though a stranger, stared at her as if she had been a culprit. How glad she was at last when she came to Grandma Wren's friendly door. But why did she receive her so coldly? Indeed, there seemed to be a reproachful look in her usually kind old eyes. She felt hungry as she gazed on the white spread table and saw the fresh cream, warm gingerbread and seed cakes. None of them were offered her.

"I hope you are good to your mamma," warned the Grandma'm.

"How do you know I didn't mail the letters?" faltered Helen, her now thoroughly penitent heart bursting.

"I didn't know it exactly, but Carl went down for the mail after diner and the puppy followed him. Before he noticed it, the rascal had found your letters and mutilated them beyond recognition. He has gone down to tell your mother about it. He saw you asleep and did not want to wake you," explained Madam Wren.

Helen's face was scarlet with mortification. "I wish I had told her the truth," she cried aloud as she confesed how she had tried to cover up her carelessness.

"O, what a tangled web we weave, when first we practice to deceive," said her kind friend, now gathering her in her arms. "It is always best to tell mother the truth. She is your best friend on earth." Then filling a sack with seed cakes for Aunt Kate she bade her hurry home and tell her mother all about the letters.

The little girl's feet almost flew over the road. She did so hope that she would reach home to tell her mother before Carl.

"Helen, stop running so this hot day. What are you crying about? Come here this minute."

"O, mamma," cried Helen, as she jumped into the carriage by the side of Aunt Kate and her mother. Then in words almost tumbling over one another, she confessed the truth.

"I am glad to hear it from my little girl first," said mamma. "The letter was an order for a motor car for your birthday. The time limit of the offer will soon expire, but in spite of the little accident we can mail another before it is too late, as it was sent on trial. The other letter was to your papa, asking him to be sure and come up to your birthday dinner." Helen was perfectly delighted. "I feel better here," she said, putting her hand on her heart. Then she told about the two bees in the fruit garden and said, "I would rather be the nice honey bee than the ugly drone." Mamma kissed her and said, "I hope you will always remember that."

Carving a Name

The children had been playing in the woods all the afternoon. They had been a band of gypsies for a while, when they made a fire and roasted some potatoes. Then they concluded to be Indians; they built a wigwam and shot a great quantity of imaginary game with their bows and arrows. After that they became civilized children once more, and played hide and seek among the bushes until they were tired enough to sit down and rest.

It never took Joe long to rest; and by-and-by he wandered away from the others, and finding a great smooth tree began to carve his name upon it as high up as he could conveniently reach. It was slow cutting, and before he had finished it the others came to look at his work.

"Oh, cut my name, too!" said Lily. "Won't you, Joe?"

"I haven't done my own yet."

"Well, you needn't cut it all; only make your first name and then put 'Lily' under it," she coaxed.

"But, you see, I want my whole name, and real deep, too, so it will last for years and years," answered Joe.

"Never mind, Lily, I'll cut yours," said Fred, good naturedly; and selecting another tree he drew his knife from his pocket and began to carve the letters, while the little girl watched him.

"There! I've put mine where it will stay, for one while," said Joe, when he had completed his work.

"Fred has put his where it will stay, too," said Aunt Lucy, who had been quietly looking on.

"Fred? I don't see where he has carved his name at all," answered Joe.

"Once upon a time"—, began Aunt Lucy, leaning back against a tree.

"A story! a story!" laughed the children, gathering around her.

"Once upon a time," she repeated, smilingly, "there was a very ambitious man. He knew that he must some time die, but he did not want to be forgotten, so he determined to put his name where it would always last. Perhaps he began by carving it on a tree first; but the owner of the forest felled the tree, and his name was gone. Then he built a great monument, and engraved his name on the top of it; but the lightning is drawn to high points, and his monument was shattered in a single night. Then he said, 'I will find the very highest and most solid mountain in all the world, and I will cut my name on its top-most rock, and then it will last. So he traveled over oceans and plains, through towns and villages, to find the mountain. He passed tired people by the way who asked him to help them, but he was too anxious about carving his name, and he would not stop. At last he found the highest mountain, and after long and tiresome climbing, cut his name on its top. Then an earthquake shook the mountain and tumbled great rocks from its summit to the valley below, and his name was swept away.

"Tired, disappointed and growing old, he said, 'It is of no use! Nothing on earth will last, and I will not try any more. I will be as happy as I can, and make others happy, too, and think no more about my name.' So he began to help the poor, to feed the hungry and do deeds of kindness whenever he could, and people began to love him. One day a little girl said to him, 'I shall love you always for helping us so much; I'm sure I shall never forget you, if I live a thousand years.'

"'But you will not live so long,' he answered, with a smile at the child who looked up to him so lovingly.

"'Yes I shall a great deal longer,' she said, 'Souls do not die, and I'm sure I'll remember in heaven, and I'll remember you.'

"Then the man knew that he had now done what he had been trying to do for so long—put his name where it would not be forgotten—written it on something that could not be destroyed."

The children were silent, and after a minute Aunt Lucy added, thoughtfully: "But any one who had been living such a life of unselfish service to others—a true, good life—would have ceased to be anxious about his name by that time, because he would have learned to know the Lord, who says to all that serve him, 'The righteous shall be held in everlasting remembrance.'"—Journal and Messenger.

The Bird Boy

Francisco Michelo, a Sardinian boy, left penniless with a mother and sisters, conceived the idea of supporting them by the exhibition and sale of trained birds.

He also trained a young Angora cat to live harmlessly in the midst of his favorite songsters. Such is the force of habit, such the power of education, that, by slow degrees, he taught the mortal enemy of his winged pets to live, to drink, to eat, and to sleep in the midst of his little charges, without once attempting to devour or injure them.

He went even farther; for, not content with teaching them merely to live in peace and happiness together, he instructed the cat and the little birds to play a kind of game, in which each had to learn its own part; and after some little trouble in training, each performed with readiness the particular duty assigned to it. Puss was instructed to curl herself into a circle, with her head between her paws, and appear buried in sleep. The cage was then opened, and the little tricksy birds rushed out upon her, and endeavored to awaken her by repeated strokes of their beaks; then, dividing into two parties, they attacked her head and her whiskers, without the gentle animal appearing to take the least notice of their gambols. At other times, she would seat herself in the middle of the cage, and begin to smooth her fur with great gentleness and satisfaction. The birds would sometimes even settle on her back, or sit, like a crown upon her head, chirping and singing as if in all the security of a shady wood.

The sight of a sleek and beautiful cat seated calmly in the midst of a cage of birds was so new and unexpected that when Francisco produced them at the fair of Sussari, he was surrounded instantly by a crowd of admiring spectators. Their astonishment scarcely knew any bounds when they heard him call each feathered favorite by its name, and saw it fly toward him with alacrity.

Delighted with his ingenuity, the spectators rewarded him liberally; and Francisco returned in the evening with his little heart swelling with joy.

This ingenious boy next trained some young partridges, one of which became exceedingly attached to him.

Francisco was now happy and contented, since by his own industry and exertions he was enabled to support his mother and sisters. During the three days of Francisco's illness, preceding his death, his birds flew incessantly round and round his bed, some lying sadly upon his pillow, others flitting backward and forward above his head, a few uttering brief but plaintive cries, and all taking scarcely any nourishment. The death of Francisco showed in a remarkable manner what affections may be excited in animals by a course of gentle treatment. Francisco's birds appeared to be sensible of the loss of a benefactor; but none of his feathered favorites manifested on his decease such real and disconsolate grief as did a partridge known as Rosoletta.

When poor Francisco was placed in his coffin, she flew round and round it, and at last perched upon the lid. In vain they several times removed her; she still returned, and even persisted in accompanying the funeral procession to the place of graves. During his interment, she sat upon an adjoining cypress, to watch where they laid the remains of her friend; and when the crowd had departed, she forsook the spot no more, except to return to the cottage of his mother for her accustomed food. While she lived, she came daily to perch and to sleep upon the turrett of an adjoining chapel, which looked upon his grave. And here she lived, and here she died about four months after the death of her beloved master.—The Young Folks' Catholic Weekly, Philadelphia.

Woman's Sphere

—The aggressive tactics of the English suffragettes, although carried to extremes, is nothing new. Such proceedings have always been, more or less, characteristic of an English canvass. Several years ago Lady Henry Somerset addressed a meeting where her arguments were not well received. She managed to escape from the building by a private exit. But she was followed by one of the vanguard of the enemy who threw a dead cat into her carriage with the remark: "Thanks fur yer tracks."

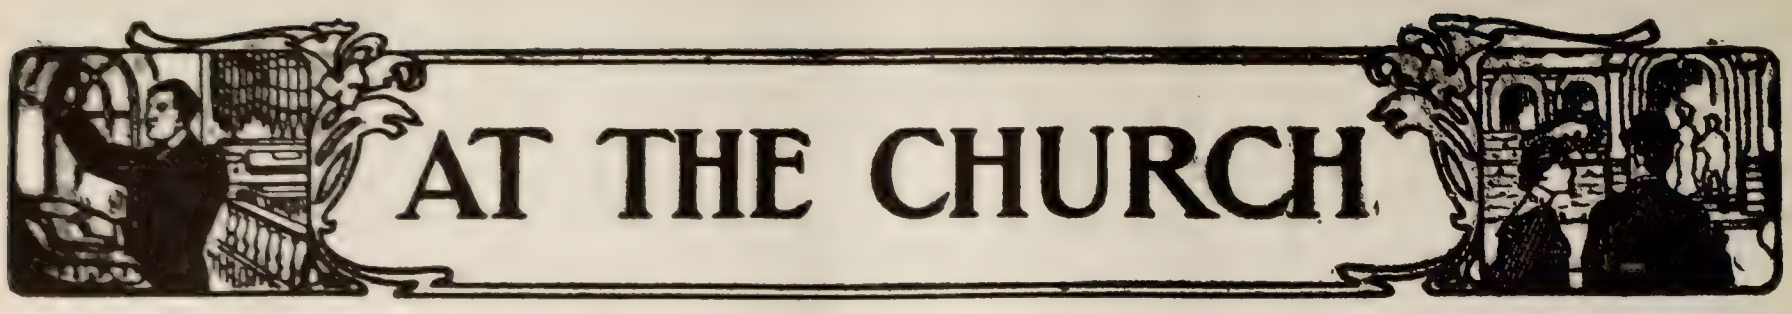
—Mrs. F. E. Cook, president of one of the women's clubs of Fresno, Cal., has lent her support to the city improvement club in a practical and unique way. She has large and beautiful gardens, employs a first-class gardener and gives away to all who want them plants and shrubs for their gardens or the grass plot in front of their houses. She gives away hundreds of plants annually.

—Prior to the Boxer uprising an anti-foot-building society had been established in China and was meeting with warm support from the more progressive mandarins. Its moving spirit was Mrs. Archibald Little, a well known English author who has written many books of travel and story of Chinese life. She was the first woman to whom Li Hung Chang ever gave an official audience. She is now living in England.

—Mrs. William Sheffield Cowles, the wife of Rear Admiral Cowles, U. S. N., and sister of ex-President Roosevelt, while living in Washington is a property owner in Stamford, Ct. She never fails to go to Stamford for the spring elections in which women have a right to vote. As Miss Roosevelt, at the head of her cousin James Roosevelt's house she was one of the most popular American women in London. Mr. Roosevelt was first Secretary of the U. S. Embassy under President Cleveland.

—Dr. Harriet C. Alexander, a well known Chicago physician read a paper last week before the sixteenth International Medical Congress in Buda Pesth, on the "Clinical and Forensic Aspects of Transitory Frenzy." The paper, which was eminently scientific, was well received, and Dr. Alexander called attention to the phases of such forms of dementia as are now grounds of legal defense for prisoners in the courts of the United States.

—Mrs. Emma C. Mann, the wife of Congressman J. R. Mann, whose work and vote for increased tariff on women's gloves and hosiery has made him very unpopular in his district, has been for twenty years a prominent member of the Chicago Woman's Club in its department of art and literature. She is a woman of great natural ability, cultured and widely read and deeply interested in all that pertains to the welfare of women.



—Mrs. L. C. Collins, wife of Judge L. C. Collins, who was formerly of Chicago, but now holding an important office in the Canal Zone, is one of the moving spirits amongst the women's clubs which have been organized in Panama. She was the presiding officer at a federation of these clubs which was held at Culebra last year, and at which many important questions of general interest were discussed.

—Miss Ruhama Scidmore, the well known author, who has written much on Polyneasia and the far East, through which she has traveled extensively, has been for many years foreign secretary of the U. S. Geographical Society which she represented at the International Congress held in London in 1897. She was at that time widely entertained. Amongst other honors and attentions, assisted the late Baroness Burdett Coults in receiving the members of the Congress at a garden party which she gave at her suburban house in Highgate. Miss Scidmore spends much of her time in Washington. Her mother is a prominent leader in the American colony in Yokohama where she has a charming house in the Bund.

—Mrs. Dexter, formerly president of the National Federation of Women's Clubs, and other prominent Colorado women have been asked to go to New York to aid the women there in their agitation for suffrage. An office will be opened for the circulation of literature and as a bureau of information, and the Colorado women will also address meetings in which they have become adepts.

—Emma Goldman and Marie Corelli are two women who have announced themselves as opposed to woman suffrage. Neither thinks that women will be benefited by being allowed to vote.

—Mrs. Nicholas Longworth and Mrs. Richard Wainwright will be the vice-presidents at a meeting in Washington in September, at which Miss Anne Morgan will preside, in which the project of building a club-house for women employed will be discussed. It is purposed to build a $500,000 house, the money to be supplied by women of Washington.

TEMPLE AND TOWERS

The lessons of the fourth quarter of 1909 are occupied with the story of Paul's experiences as a prisoner of the Roman power, from the time of his arrest in Jerusalem till his arrival at Rome to have final hearing before the emporer. It is the part of Paul's career which is recorded with far greater detail than any other. This is due to the fact that Luke, the author of the Book of Acts, was with the Apostle during this time, and knew all the facts as first hand. This we gather not only from the use of the first person in considerable portions of the narrative, but as well from the intimate acquaintance with the incidents of the period displayed by the writer.

This definiteness of description begins with the account of Paul's final journey to Jerusalem. Luke is particular to record all the points visited in that remarkable voyage. To one interested in the geography of the Levant, the account is one of romantic suggestiveness. Some of the most notable events and personalities of Greek history and legend are connected with the islands and cities where the little company touched on its southeastward way.

The Fearless Apostle.

At Miletus, Paul's friends from Ephesus entreated him not to risk his life in Jerusalem during the feast time. But Paul was in no manner swerved from his purpose by these entreaties. He only felt the more confident that a new phase of his work was to open through the events, whatever they might be, that were soon to transpire. To finish the work of Christ and the testimony he had received was his only concern. Who could tell but that the very dangers which all his friends, including Luke himself, dreaded, might be the very means of widening the sweep of his ministry in proclamation of the Gospel? So indeed it transpired. If Paul had taken counsel of the loving but apprehensive friends on the way, might it not have meant that the way to Rome, the goal of all his hopes, might never have been opened.

On arriving in the capitol, Paul and his company went at once to the church, and it is a satisfaction to read that they were received with joy. This would no doubt be due in part to the gifts of money which they brought. But we cannot suppose that the feeling of the Jerusalem disciples was wholly unfriendly to Paul. There must have been some, even aside from the Apostles, who esteemed him as a brother, and for his works' sake.

James and the Elders.

On the next day a visit was made to the leaders of the Jerusalem community of Christians. The apostles seem to have been out of the city at this time, probably on evangelistic journeys. But James, the brother of the Lord, was there, and with him were the elders of the local congregations. By this time James had come to be regarded as the leader of the church, probably because of his relationship to Jesus. His life, if we may trust Christian tradition, was worthy of the high regard in which he was held.

To these men Paul made report of the work he had done since his last visit to the city. He had gone a long way in his labors for the cause, and many had entered the Christian society through his efforts. Of these a large proportion were non-Jews, and it speaks loudly the praise of these good men of the Jerusalem church that they not only approved of this wider work of Paul's, but they glorified God with hearty thankfulness that the Gentiles had been reached in such numbers. Whatever the rank and file of the church in the holy city may have thought of the propriety of receiving non-Jews into the church, the leaders at least shared Paul's view that it was the proper work of the apostles and evangelists.

The Felon Charges.

Yet at this very point arose a danger which these men wished to avoid. Paul's enemies had zealously circulated the story that he was tearing down the fabric of Judaism by direct and violent attack. This report was doubtless started by Jewish fanatics, who would have gone to any extreme to stop his work But it is sadly true that many of the Jewish Christians were eager believers of the falsehood, and thought of the Apostle as a most dangerous man. James and the others knew that such reports had followed Paul from Ephesus and Corinth, and that there were many at that time in the city, as feast pilgrims, who credited and propagated the rumors. For this reason they felt that Paul was under suspicion to a degree which might lead to violence toward him if it were not removed.

The Plan for Paul.

Their plan was an ingenious one. If Paul had really rejected the law of his fathers, and was an enemy of the Jewish institutions, he would not consent to participate in any of the temple ceremonies. They felt confident that he had no such feeling, and would be willing to prove that fact to his country-men. So they proposed that he should take four of their number, who happened at the time to be contemplating vows, and should act as their sponsor in the temple rites through which they had to go. This would require Paul's daily attendance with them in the temple for a week, and the payment by him of the priestly fees. If Paul consented to this plan, they were sure it would be a complete answer to his critics.

It must have placed the Apostle in an embarrassing position to have this request made of him. He had no active antagonism to the Jewish forms of worship, and was always reverent toward them. But he was so strongly committed to the larger and higher work of the Gospel, that he felt that all the rites of the law were meaningless and empty in comparison. It could only have been out of the largeness of his courtesy that he consented to play a part which at the best must have been very distasteful to him. Not that he was violating any of his convictions in taking this step. That he would never have consented to do for a moment. It was rather like the return of a man to the plays of childhood, and Paul had already written to the Church at Corinth the pregnant words, "When I became a man, I put away childish things."

Paul in the Temple.

But he undertook the task in good faith. He went daily to the temple with the four men, and stood as their patron in all the requirements of the law. What effect this conduct had upon the open minded people who saw him there we do not know. Nor can we be sure whether it had anything to do with the events that followed. It may be that the violent enemies of Paul, seeing that his conformity to the rites of the temple was turning in his favor the sentiment of the people, resolved upon extreme measures. On the other hand, it may be that if Paul had gone his way without attempting to allay the hostile feeling against him, he might have escaped all violence.

Rescued by Romans.

But all things work together for good to them that love God. The mob which was roused by the furious hatred of a few of the Apostle's foes led to his arrest by the only power which could bring his plans to success. When Paul's life was put in peril by the riot in the temple court, the soldiers stationed on the Tower of Antonia at the northwest corner of the court were instantly roused to action. It was their duty to preserve order in the city, especially at the seditious times of the feasts. They rushed down the stairs to the place where the mob was dragging Paul to what would have been a murder as lawless as that of Stephen. Rescuing him from the hands of the zealots, the soldiers slowly retreated up the stairs to the tower They were experts in the handling of mobs, yet so violent was the effort to seize Paul again that he had to be lifted and carried up the stone steps.

Paul's Speech.

At the top of those stairs he gained permission to speak to the people, asserting, to the astonishment of the Roman centurion, that he was not the Egyptian fanatic, who had recently stirred up such sedition in that region, but rather that he was a Jew of Tarsus, a city of importance. But to that speech, so welcome to the readers of the New Testament as Luke's transcript of Paul's own words, the crowd gave only a partial hearing. At his reference to his mission to the Gentiles they broke forth into fury again, and the soldiers, seeing the uselessness of delay, took him into the tower, and closed the door.

When that door closed, the public ministry of Paul ceased. It seems probable that his prisonerhood ended only with the martyrdom of which the traditions of the church so pathetically speak. But that career as prisoner was the most fruitful of Paul's life, and proved that the things that seem most untoward often fall out to the glory of God and the furtherance of his cause. Paul seemed to be the prisoner of the ruthless Roman power. In reality he was "the Prisoner of the Lord."

HOW TO TREAT THE WEAK IN FAITH AND CONSCIENCE

Topic, September 22. John 20:24-29; Rom. 14.

For the inquisitor the method of dealing with doubt is exceedingly simple. He commands the perplexed soul to accept the authority of the church and backs up his commands with threats of direful consequences to the disobedient. For him faith is acceptance of external authority. He discredits faith based on the capacity to discern spiritual values. There are many people who want to be under external authority. They do not wish to be bothered with the task of thinking for themselves. A very able lawyer puts it in this way: "I am a specialist. I tell my clients what the law is and I expect them to do as I tell them. When I go to the church I expect to be told what to do. I am not a specialist in religion, and therefore I follow without questioning the advice of one who is a specialist, as I expect my client to follow my directions." This view is common to all who think religion is a matter of rules. If that is all it is, we must go to the scribe for direction. But to those who think of religion in terms of personal relation, right relation of man to man and of man to God, the legal way of salvation is a burden which they will not endure. Doubt is not cured by the laying down of rules but by contact with persons who know something about God and can make the doubter feel that God is in his world.

The Moral Trifler.

There is a doubt that merits sharp rebuke. It is that of the pleasure lover. This person may have much to say of ideals and of the beautiful, but there is no disposition to sacrifice comfort in order that the will of God may be done. The moral trifler needs the lash. His friends ought to decline to minister to his selfishness. He ought to feel the sting of public condemnation. Faith grows on sacrifice. But the sacrifice must be made for something that is worth while. The faith of Abraham Lincoln grew under the burden of the Civil War. His anguish of soul over the awful ravages of war gave him a deeper insight into the real moral significance of history. The best service we can render many of our friends is to get them into some place of service from which they cannot honorably escape and in which they will have to agonize. The faith of the easy-going man is devoid of moral quality. We must feel that the kingdom of God is not eating and drinking, but righteousness and peace and joy in the Holy Spirit.

The Perplexed Intellect.

"Stop thinking about that or you will lose your faith." This is the sort of advice, or command, that is given to young people by some preachers. Is it good advice? In view of the fact that the young people do not intend to stop thinking and that if they did stop their religion would not have vitality, another method of helping them would seem to be desirable. They must be led to see the deeper things of God or else they will cease to be religious. They need the counsel of a man who walks with God and who can talk naturally of what God means to him, not the dictum of one who brings his fist down on the table and says, "Here is the conclusion of the whole matter; take what I say or you are an infidel." Dr. Rainsford went to Phillips Brooks for assistance in solving some problem of faith, and he came away disappointed because he did not receive a dogmatic answer to his question. Later in life, he discovered that Brooks had done more for him than any dogmatic treatment of difficulties could have done, for the troubled man was enabled to answer his own question. We do the best for others when we help them to think for themselves. Many times they will never know what we have done for them, but what of that? Should it be our chief concern to advertise our good deeds?

The Narrow Minded.

The narrow-minded man is one who thinks the universe should conform to his limited experience. He is not simply ignorant, he is unteachable. He may have more facts in his head than one who is recognized as broad-minded, but he differs from the latter in attitude. He will not grant that God may have better ways of doing things than any he has discovered. Jesus' denunciations of the Pharisees show that unteachableness is the supreme sin of man. There is no hope for one who will not learn. But we cannot believe that any considerable number of people are absolutely unteachable. Some are more difficult to reach than others. Faith working through love can put to shame the self-righteous and bring them to repentance and obedience to the truth.

HOW MISSIONARIES WIN SOULS FOR CHRIST

Topic, September 26. 1 Cor. 10:23.

How do missionaries win souls for Christ? Fundamentally the same as our Lord did or as you or I do, or as anybody else does. That is to say, in the last analysis, there is one, and only one attribute for the soul winner the world over.

Not Gift of Speech.

It is not ability to speak and to proclaim a message, not even if it be the real gospel. Robert G. Ingersol was a great orator, but for him to have proclaimed the gospel so long as he repudiated it in his own life would have been perfect mockery. It would have been like the sounding brass and clanging cymbal of which Paul speaks. A phonograph reproduces the sound of the spoken word and it serves very well as an attraction to the nickelodion, but we hardly regard it as a satisfactory substitute for missionaries. The printed page can carry a proclamation, and it has been a mighty factor in the spread of the gospel, but to be made effective, it had to be accompanied by a man whose heart throbbed with love and sympathy for his fellows.

Not Correct Theology.

Nor is it ability to proclaim the correct theology. One may be able to correlate a satisfactory doctrine of the Trinity with the latest bit of metaphysics, or even give a scientific account of the operation of the Holy Spirit in conversion—if that were conceivable—or weave an elastic theory of Inspiration, or construct a formidable Apologetic for the Deity of Christ, but to the man whose soul is dark, whose heart is heavy, and whose life is bound with the habit of many years, this is a foreign tongue.

"Our problem is to win souls. How? Love them and thus awaken a love within their own hearts. This was Jesus way.

He took our sorrows and our pain,
And hid their torture in His breast,
Till we received them back again
To find on each His grief impressed.

Without reproof or word of blame,
As mothers do in childhood's years,
He kissed our lips in spite of shame,
And stayed the passage of our tears.

So tender was his love to us,
(We had not learned to love before),
That we grew like to Him, and thus Men sought his grace in us once more."

J. W. Dawson.

"I Am Debtor."

As Rome counted human relationships Paul was free from all men; but as a member of his race and as a Christian he recognized that he had an obligation to the race which he proceeded to discharge. While he realized that to be a Jew or a Gentile was of little vital importance; yet for the sake of the Jew who attached great importance to his Jewish ancestors, traditions, and customs, Paul entered sympathetically with him into his sentiments and his problems, his hopes and his ambitions. To him he became a Jew. By a loving and sympathetic service he awakened love in the Jewish heart for his Lord, and won him. And whether he talked to the weak or the strong, to those under the law or those without law, he touched their lives at all points, if perchance he might win them.

Need of Sympathy.

And so must it be with any man who would make disciples for Jesus whether in the first century or the twentieth, whether he seek the Jew of Palestine, the Negro of Africa, the Mongolian of China, or the Anglo-Saxon of America. Jane Addams has become the "first citizen" of Chicago, not by "visiting" the districts of the city where foreigners have settled, but by taking up her abode in their very midst. Many of the Greeks who come into the settlement near Hull House will trust Jane Addams long before they can speak the language, because she has entered into their lives with sympathy and love and helped them when they were homeless and friendless. Jerry McAully in his New York mission was able to redeem the lives of men for Jesus Christ which the average Christian could never touch because he had a passion for the salvation for the poor unfortunates of the underworld and he lived among them and ministered to them as best he could in the name of his Lord.

It has been this same passionate love for humanity which has gone to the mission field and laid the foundations for political, moral and religious revolutions. Here the missionary has lived this life in the presence of a benighted people, and for their sake. Without the incentive for personal gain he has clothed the naked, fed the hungry, anointed those who are sick and in prison. He has all but raised the dead. And finally he assured the suffering one that such a life he leads in the name of his God whose worship he invites them to and to lead a similar life. The appeal is omnipotent. By such a means the missionary has leavened the lump of Pagan humanity with that divine love which ultimately will bring their kingdom into the Kingdom of our Lord.

THE FINDING OF CAMILLA

By Lucie E. Jackson, author of "Feadora's Failure," "For Muriel's Sake."

Copyright, Ward Lock & Co., London.

CHAPTER XVIII.

"The Robin's Nest."

A month had passed since Pierre had fled from the village of Norton to elude the pursuit of Mr. Bartoletti.

A weary month it had been in many ways, for the Frenchman shrank from parading his troupe in the fantastical style that his soul loved, and oftener slunk through the villages, merely stopping to purchase the required food for their onward journey.

The finding of Camilla's relatives was becoming a harder task than he had fancied it would be. Had it not been for that cloaked figure which haunted Pierre's dreams, and that other dark Italian face that made his every night uneasy, the Frenchman would have sought the help of the police to aid him in his search, but a nervous fear of perhaps thus falling into the wrong hands prevented him from doing so.

The summer stars often looked down now upon them camping out in the fields or in woods. Pierre had grown timorous of facing landladies, and, unless the weather absolutely prevented it, he preferred to keep his pence in his pocket, and lodge himself and his company under the summer sky.

His stock of money, too, was getting low. The gold pieces in Rexington Falconer's purse could not last for long, even if husbanded carefully. Pierre had had to draw upon it far oftener than he wished; for performances, even when they took place, which was of far less frequency than at first, did not always bring as much as they used to; perhaps because the Frenchman hurried them over as if fearful of bringing too much notice upon himself and his troupe.

No matter how wistfully or cheekily Taras handed round the tin mug, the pence flowed in but slowly, and it was with a heavy sigh that Pierre counted his gains before carrying it back for Camilla to count again.

Anxiety, fear of detection, the dread that Camilla might be taken from him by the wrong persons, semi-starvation, exposure to the night air on a body partly fevered with anxiety—these things told at length upon the Frenchman's once robust frame. The illness that he had feared for the child overtook himself. Those dewy nights when he had protected his charge with his own great coat, and had lain down without misgiving, trusting that Mother Earth would bring to him no ill, had helped to bring him to his present condition.

When the shadow of this bigger trouble was hanging over him, Pierre took the child into his confidence. It was one day when he was feeling worse than usual. The pain in his back seemed almost more than he could bear, and he staggered rather than walked at Chicot's head.

"Petite," he said, "we must stop at the first inn we come to. My head feels giddy. I—I cannot get on today."

As he spoke, he caught at Camilla's carriage to support himself. The child regarded him steadily with eyes in which fear was uppermost. She had for many days wondered at the Frenchman's growing silence. Telling Chicot now to stop, she got out and gravely begged Pierre to take her place in the carriage.

"You walk too much. You make me live like a queen. I have everything of the best, whilst you—oh! Pierre, you must not fall sick and—and—die." She caught her breath hard at the last word, and looked wildly into his face.

He forced himself to smile at her anxiety. "It is not so bad as that, cherie. The bon Dieu won't let it come to that." He stopped, leaning against the carriage, with one hand at his side. Then tried to smile again. "Chicot, for one, wouldn't like the exchange of weights. Get in, petite, Chicot couldn't draw me even if I could seat myself in your place."

Very unwillingly Camilla got in again. But before long, Pierre announced that he could go no further.

"We might camp out for the night," he said, looking up at the clear sky.

But to this Camilla would not consent. At the first breath of sickness, the child assumed the old protecting care that she had accorded her father during his illness.

Pierre listened to her almost as in a dream. He and the troupe were to stay where they were, whilst she went to the top of the hill where a house was in sight, and there she would inquire if an inn was to be had in the neighborhood.

The very suddenness of Pierre's illness made it imperative that something must be done, but he was loth that that something had to be accomplished by one so unfitted for it. He had guarded her so carefully that a feeling akin to terror filled his heart at his sudden incapacity to shield her further.

"I like it not, cherie, I like it not. Thou art such a child, and I care not for you to be out of my sight. Ah! mon Dieu, but what can I do! I cannot move many more steps."

The hopeless tone in his voice went to the child's heart. She took his hand in hers.

"Pierre," she said in a quivering voice, "it is my turn to look after you now. No harm can happen to me. I'll be back very quickly."

With a violent effort Pierre shook himself free from the feeling of faintness creeping over him.

"Take Jacques, then. Don't stir without Jacques. Go nowhere without Jacques, mon ange," something telling him that Camilla might have to venture forth more than once without his protection. "Jacques," he continued, laying a shaking hand on the child's shoulder, "go with her and guard her. Guard her, mon garcon. Voyez vous?"

The poodle rose, shook his coat, looked up into his master's face with an intelligence almost human; then, leaping up, he licked his master's hand, and turned to Camilla with a little whine.

"You and I, Jacques," said the child, holding out her hand to him, whilst the tears she tried to hide from Pierre rolled fast down her cheeks. "You and I together." Then she started at a quick pace up the hill, with the poodle trotting beside her.

Pierre watched them out of sight, with a sinking heart. It was the first time that Camilla had left his side to find her way amongst strangers. It was the first break in his promise to her father.

The child kept steadily up the hill, her heart filled with the one vague fear, the fear of Pierre being taken from her. She would not allow of her usual shrinking timidity to interfere with what she had undertaken. Her only friend was ill, dangerously ill. What would she not do to repay him for one-tenth of the love and care he had bestowed upon her since her father's death.

Boldly she advanced to the gate of the house on the hill, with Jacques close beside her, his bristles ready to rise on the smallest provocation.

There was a small garden in front, and swinging over the door was a signboard, "The Robin's Nest." Her heart gave a leap. There was no need for her to seek further. And a veritable nest it looked, with its thatched roof and casement windows, and swallows darting hither and thither under its sheltering eaves.

An elderly man was digging in the garden. He looked up as Camilla clicked the latch of the gate.

"Isn't this an inn?" she asked. A sudden timidity seized her.

It was Pierre who always put the questions, whilst she had nothing to do but sit in her carriage playing with the dogs.

"Be sure it is. Right sure, missie," was the cheerful answer.

"Do you think I could have two rooms here?"

"The missus would know best. Knock and ask, missie. Wait, I'll come and ask for you."

Scraping the soil carefully off his boots with the help of the spade, he came on to the path and went into the house.

A few minutes elapsed and he returned, followed by a thin, sharp-featured woman. Camilla's first impression of her was not a favorable one. She did not look at all like what she had expected the mistress of "The Robin's Nest" should be. Some one cheery and comely-faced was what might have come out of such a haven-like-looking home, thought the child.

"Two rooms you want. For yourself or for whom?" She spoke as sharply and as quickly as might have been expected from her face.

Camilla's voice was a little faltering as she said, "For me and for my grandfather, and for—for the troupe."

"For the what?"

"The troupe. It consists," remembering Pierre's exact words on former occasions, "of three dancing dogs, a goat, and a monkey."

"Thank you. I don't admit smelling animals into my house. What you need is a stable, I should think, or a pig-sty, perhaps."

"I—I couldn't sleep in a pig-sty," said Camilla still more falteringly, whilst Jacques' bristles began to rise at the sharp tones of the landlady. "But I wouldn't mind sleeping in the stable with the troupe, if you could give a nice bedroom to my grandfather."

"Is he very old?"

"P—pretty well. But he's very ill, and I'm afraid he'll get worse if he has to sleep outside tonight."

The woman looked her up and down with a curious stare, which Camilla found very disconcerting.

"I don't want any fever patients brought into my house," she began ungraciously. "What's the matter with your grandfather?"

"I—I don't know. His head feels giddy."

"Perhaps it's only old age. How old is he?"

"I don't know."

"Well, I don't think I can take either of you in. I don't like the animals. If that brute is one of them, I can't say I like his looks. And who can say whether I'll be paid for what I——"

She paused as if half ashamed to end her speech, and as she stopped, a head came out of the first-floor casement window and looked at the woman and the child. Only for a second, however; the head was withdrawn before either of them saw it. It belonged to a person who had listened intently to the whole of the dialogue.

Then, suddenly, a voice called—

"Mrs. Jones."

"Yes, sir. Coming, sir."

The landlady's voice had changed. She hurriedly left Camilla without a word of apology, and shut the door in her face.

The child stood looking blankly for one moment at the closed door, then turned to go down the path with eyes that had again filled with tears.

"What shall we do, Jacques?" she whispered brokenly.

For answer, Jacques sprang up and licked her face with his sympathetic whine.

"Here! Come back, come back!"

The landlady's sharp tones struck her ears as she reached the gate. Half fearfully she turned her head. The woman was becokning to her. Camilla retraced her steps.

"I've changed my mind. I've got a couple of rooms at the top of the house that you can have. But I won't have the goat there, that's plain."

"Oh, no! Chicot always sleeps in a stable. You have a stable?"

"Yes. What about the dogs?"

"They always come with us," said little Camilla pleadingly. "But they are so good, they won't hurt a thing."

"Very well," ungraciously. "And if the monkey flies at me, you will have to pay for it; that's all I can say."

"He won't hurt you." Camilla's heart was cheerful again. She almost smiled at the woman, who was still regarding her curiously.

"Then we may come at once?"

"Yes, I suppose so."

"Do you think," hesitatingly, "that that man there," pointing to the elderly man who had gone back to his digging in the garden, "could come and help my grandfather up the hill?"

"Well, I never!" began the woman, when the same voice that had spoken to her before called sharply—

"Mrs. Jones."

"Yes, sir. Coming, sir."

"Send your husband to help the old man up the hill."

"Yes, sir. Thomas, go with this—this—little missie, and help her to bring her grandfather here. He's ill, she says."

Camilla turned as the man again carefully scraped his boots clean of the soil, and stepped on to the path. Beckoning her to follow him, he went towards the gate, where Camilla joined him.

A head came to the window to watch them go down the hill. It was a dark face, and the black moustache did not wholly succeed in hiding the thin lips. At that moment the smile lurking round its corners was not one of Roger Densham's best smiles.

"I thank you, old man, for falling sick," he said aloud. "It gives me an opportunity to see if you are masquerading." Then with a laugh, "what would not that villain Bartoletti give to be in my place!"

They met Pierre toiling slowly up the hill. Mrs. Jones' husband had apparently a kinder heart than she possessed. He hurried forward, and, passing a stalwart arm through Pierre's, said cheerfully—

"That's brave of ye, old man. Come, cheer up, we be soon at top of hill."

Pierre looked inquiringly at Camilla, who nodded with a brightness that was partly real, partly assumed, for that short interview with the mistress of "The Robin's Nest" had not been an encouraging one.

"You must go right to bed when we get there," she whispered, as she took his other hand. "I'll look after stabling Chicot."

Taras popped his head out of Pierre's coat and popped it in again, at the near presence of a stranger. The Frenchman had divested himself of his violin and his trumpet, leaving him the freer to walk. They lay in Camilla's carriage, which Chicot was drawing with a sulky countenance.

There was no one at the casement windows when they came slowly up the path. Roger Densham had backed himself out of the way of recognition.

Did a presentiment of trouble cross Pierre's mind as he entered the garden? Camilla felt him clutch her shoulder, as he whispered low—

"It was all right, cherie, was it not?"

"All right, grandfather, all right," was Camilla's reassuring reply.

Then they entered "The Robin's Nest," and that night Pierre was tossing deliriously on his bed.

CHAPTER XIX.

Pierre Falls Sick.

Camilla's fear of the sharp-featured, sharp-voiced landlady sank into insignificance the next morning when compared with the terror of finding Pierre unconscious of her presence. She found her way to Mrs. Jones' kitchen, and stood at the door.

"My grandfather must have a doctor," she announced. "I think—I think he is very ill." Her voice faltered, but she went on, "Can you tell me where I can get one?"

Mrs. Jones stared her up and down. "The nearest doctor lives a mile-and-a-half-away."

Camilla caught her breath hard. Could she have the temerity to go all that distance alone? She shrank from the thought. Then the memory of that tossing head with its silvery wig and sweeping white beard came before her, and she grew brave. She could at least drive Chicot, and Jacques would accompany her.

"Please tell me his name and where he lives," she asked.

"Dr. Morgan, and he lives at No. 17, The Parade, Charnford." Mrs. Jones' words seemed shorter and sharper than yesterday. "You'll have to find your way to Charnford first."

"Thank you." Camilla was turning away with her little heart as heavy as lead, when a voice from another part of the kitchen said suddenly—

"Don't you trouble, missie, you've got enough to do to look after your grandfather. I'll go for the doctor sharp, this minute"; and the elderly man who had helped Pierre up the hill came from behind the kitchen table, cramming the last bit of bread and butter into his mouth.

"Now don't you be foolish, Thomas," said his wife, sharply. "Them as wants doctors can go for doctors, though where the money is to come from its another affair."

"I'm goin' for Dr. Morgan," returned her husband stolidly, slipping his shirt-sleeved arms into a coat that hung behind the door.

"And what about that bed o' potatoes that's to be dug up, eh?"

"The potatoes can wait till I comes back," returned Mr. Jones calmly.

"That's all very well," returned his wife, in a voice rendered sharper than usual through this unexpected opposition, "but if you goes for the doctor it's my belief you'll have to pay for him, by the looks o' them that wants him."

Mr. Jones stood and scratched his head for a minute, looking half sheepishly, half questioningly at Camilla.

The child flushed up. "We can pay," she said in a tone of dignity. "My grandfather has plenty of money to pay."

"Oh! indeed, I wish we could all say the same," returned Mrs. Jones, seizing Mr. Jones' empty cup and saucer, and bearing them off with much clatter to the sink in the back kitchen.

"Don't you trouble about her tongue, missie," whispered the landlord of "The Robin's Nest," "it's longer than most of 'em are made and a deal sharper, but we've all got something that t'other hasn't. Just you go upstairs and look after that old man, and I'll have Dr. Morgan here in a twinkling."

Camilla could only thank him with an eloquent glance from her eyes, and then she hurried upstairs.

Pierre lay tossing deliriously. Jacques sat at the foot of the bed, eyeing his master with humid eyes, and Taras was seated on the pillow patting the Frenchman's cheek with his hairy hands. Bebe and Jules sat further away, but with no less concern visible in their faces.

Camilla bent over the pillow, and with deft fingers re-arranged the wig and the false beard which had got awry through the constant movement. Then she held up a warning finger to Taras.

"No touching," she said, pointing to the wig. "If you touch, Taras, I'll whip you."

For answer, the monkey leaped on to her shoulder, and, bending down, lightly boxed her ears, grimacing the while. A faint smile crossed Camilla's anxious face as she stroked his head with her soft little fingers. Then, sitting down with him in her lap, she waited for the coming of the doctor.

He arrived sooner than she expected—a tall thin man with bright keen eyes.

"Eh, what have we here?" he asked, taking in at one glance the sick man and the child sitting patiently by his side.

Mrs. Jones intruded her person, much to Camilla's dismay. "He's an old man that I took in to lodge for the night, and I'm beginning to be precious sorry that I did, for if 'tis anything catching, my house will suffer for it."

"Nonsense," returned the doctor, laying a practised finger on Pierre's pulse, and casting a keen glance the while at Camilla.

The child pressed close to his side. "He's not going to be very ill, is he?" she asked tremulously.

"Of course not, merely a touch of rheumatic fever, and——Well, what has he been living on lately? He's not as stout as he might be."

A pang seized Camilla. She remembered the food that was always pressed upon her, whilst Pierre pleaded a poor appetite and total inability to eat. Had he been starving himself so that she might have plenty?

The doctor did not wait for her answer, but went on with his examination. Then he looked up.

"Milk, Mrs. Jones, plenty of that, and it must be iced, remember. I'll send over the ice," with a glance in Camilla's direction. "And don't you be fearing that there is anything infectious in his illness. Nothing of the sort. Your father," turning to Camilla, with a curious look in his eyes, "will soon be himself again."

"My grandfather," corrected Camilla.

"Your grandfather, eh?" replied the doctor, with a long keen glance. "How old is he?"

"I—I couldn't say," faltered Camilla, and her fingers sought the white head and fondled it.

At her touch, Pierre ceased tossing and muttered endearing words in French, nothing of which escaped the doctor's notice.

"I will call in again on my return from South Garth, and will bring with me some medicine which you must give to him every two hours. Will it be you or Mrs. Jones who will administer it?"

"Oh! I will," said Camilla hastily.

"Then Mrs. Jones must look after the iced milk. Eh, Mrs. Jones?" good humoredly.

Church Life

Church Extension—all the month.

Church Extension books close October 10.

Send the offering to G. W. Muckley during the month of September.

Only four weeks until the hosts will be gathering in Pittsburg.

Your offering will help to build new churches, again and again.

Churches! Send your pastors to the Centennial Convention.

It will save confusion for you if you will register and be assigned your lodging place before arriving at the convention.

It will be a fine company of people who make the trip from Chicago to Pittsburg on the Christian Century Special.

Your church could hardly make a better investment than to present its pastor with a purse and bid him go to Pittsburg, October 11-19. The money will come back to you ten fold during the year.

Every earnest pastor is now approaching the tasks of another year with the determination to make the work of his church effective for the greater interests of the community. It is in meeting the big human interests that he will find his opportunity for service.

The announcement of the plan of the International Sunday-school Committee for a new graded system of lessons made in the Christian Century today, makes it possible for those who have felt the need of the adaptation of the lesson material to the different ages of pupils, yet were unwilling to abandon the international lessons, to secure the help they need.

Dr. W. N. Lemmon, Greenville, Texas, has been appointed medical missionary to Laoag, Philippine Islands, and will sail in the early Autumn.

Alva W. Taylor, pastor of the church at Irving Park, is in Missouri, assisting in the raising of the endowment for the Bible College at Columbia.

"A coach full of people" enroute for the Centennial Convention from Springfield, Illinois, is the ambition of the pastors of our capitol city.

The teachers' training class at the Evanston, Ill., church, will study this year a manual of church history. The course will begin September 12.

J. M. Francis, pastor, is doing the preaching in a meeting being held by the church at Athens, Ill. Charles E. McVay is leading the singing.

J. E. Masters, pastor of the church at Dorchester, Ill., is writing articles concerning the Centennial celebration for the local papers.

A new church building fund has been opened by the church at Graham, Texas, where Edward Owers is pastor. The church has started a parish paper.

Edgar D. Jones and the First Church, Bloomington, have engaged John E. Pounds to assist them in a special evangelistic service during January.

Frank P. Smith is pushing on to victory in the work of the West Park Church, Indianapolis, Ind. The corner stone of the new building has been laid.

The Lexington (Ill.) Church has ordered their pastor to go to the Centennial at their expense. We trust this spirit may become contagious among the churches. J. P. Givens is the beloved pastor.

M. H. Gerrard, who a few weeks since, closed his pastorate at La Porte, Ind., has accepted a call to the church at Saginaw, Mich., where he began work September 1.

Have you noticed how the receipts of the Foreign Society are forging ahead? That's Centennial accomplishment worth while. The gain for eleven months is $67,277.

Edward A. Henry, whose article on "The American School of Oriental study and Research at Jerusalem," appears in this issue of the Christian Century, preached at Gurnee, Ill., the first Sunday in September.

The Illinois State Convention will be held in Springfield next year. One of the pastors at Springfield writes: "We hope to make it the largest and best convention in the history of the state work."

Cephas Shelburne and wife will go to the Pittsburg convention, and their church of East Dallas, Texas, will bear the expense. church will get back more than it gives in this courtesy.

A new Sunday-school annex will be dedicated by the church at Chagrin Falls, Ohio, September 12. George B. Evans is pastor. T. E. Cramblett, President Bethany College will be in charge of the service.

Evangelists Vernon and Estelle Harrington of Minburn, Iowa, will conduct a two weeks' meeting for the church at Sullivan, Ill., J. W. Walters, minister, beginning September 26 and continuing to October 10.

"Vigor," "valor" and "victory" are the words placed before the First Church, Warren, Ohio, by the pastor, J. E. Lynn, as a motto for the work of the year. To live up to such an ideal means effectiveness.

Last Sunday evening, O. F. Jordan, pastor of the Evanston Church, gave an illustrated lecture on Persia. He described the manners and customs of the country, and their relation to the missionary problem.

Edward Clutter, evangelist was married to Miss Mary Hill, at Glen Elder, Kans., August 25. W. H. Nation, pastor at White City officiated at the service, assisted by J. M. Lezene, of the Stockton Church.

A. R. More, after two months of rest and recreation, feels entirely restored to health, and entered upon his duties as pastor of the First Church, Birmingham, Ala., the first Sunday in September.

Russell F. Thrapp, pastor of the church at Jacksonville, Ill., will return from his three months' trip to Europe on September 22, and will enter at once into the work of the church. During his absence the pulpit has been filled by W. M. Groves.

James R. McIntyre has accepted, for an indefinite time, the pastorate of the church at St. Monica, Cal. He began work with this church September 1, closing his work at Grand Island, Nebraska, the last Sunday in August.

The church at Hopkinsville, Ky., of which Harry D. Smith is the pastor, gives to Foreign Missions this Centennial year, $1,010.59. This is the largest offering in the history of that church. Nor is it a wealthy church, but a good church, and liberal.

F. E. Meigs, president of Drake College, Nankin, China, with his wife has just returned to America, and will be at the Centennial Convention. Mr. and Mrs. Meigs are supported by the First Church, St. Joseph, Mo.

Dr. E. S. Ames has closed his vacation and will preach in his pulpit at the Hyde Park Church, Chicago, each Sunday morning. Contributions from Professor Ames' pen appear frequently in the columns of the Chicago Tribune.

Mr. and Mrs. Guy W. Sarvis, who have been studying at the University of Chicago during the past year, are spending their vacation with relatives at Harlan, Iowa. Mr. and Mrs. Sarvis are both graduates of Drake University.

J. P. Lichtenberger, Ph. D., assistant professor of sociology of the University of Pennsylvania, is supplying the pulpit of the First Church, Philadelphia, until a new pastor is secured to succeed L. G. Batman, who has gone to Youngstown, Ohio.

Bruce Brown, who is just leaving Valparaiso, Ind., for his new ministry with the Dean Avenue Church, Spokane, Wash., will soon be in a building enterprise. He says they hope to make it the best building among the Disciples in the West.

The New England convention of the Disciples will be held at Haverhill, Mass., September 9-12. The meetings will be in the Mt. Washington Universalist Church. John A. Gardner, 176 South street, Boston, is corresponding secretary.

C. E. Bootn has just gone from LeRoy, Kansas, to St. Louis, Mo., where he enters the pastorate of the Corondelet Church, This church is beginning the erection of a $25,000 building. At present the church receives the help from the missionary societies.

Harvey O. Breeden will assist the church at Modesto, Cal., in a meeting during November. The announcement is that the meeting will be "a big (not sensational) one." All who know Dr. Breeden will give full credence to this announcement. J. W. Webb is pastor at Modesto.

C. G. Kindred, is back at work with the Englewood church after having enjoyed an extended trip through the West during the summer, as a present from a member of his church. Mr. Kindred's many friends will be glad to know that the trip proved a great benefit to his health.

When studying the work of the Pittsburg churches this fall don't overlook the Fourth Church, whose pastor was able to secure the largest audiences during the hot summer months, and to keep the evangelistic spirit of the church at high tide. F. A. Wyatt is the man.

About January first the First Church, Louisville, Ky., will begin the erection of its new building, which will be one of the finest in the South. It is the purpose of the church to retain the classic appearance of the entrance to the present structure, perhaps using the same Greek columns.

Mr. C. C. Buckner, pastor of the Second Church, South Bend, Ind., and his wife, who was until a few months ago, Miss Laura Waddill, spent their vacation in Chicago. The Second Church, South Bend, is planning to begin the construction of a new church building in the Spring.

The church at Marshalltown, Ia., is erecting a new building which will seat 1400 people. They are using the church at East Orange, N. J., as a prototype. Under the leadershp of C. H. Morris, 400 people have been received into the fellowship of this church in the last two years.

A. J. Bradshaw, who went from Texas to Stroud, Okla., the first of July is pleased with the prospects in the new field. Since July first there have been forty-seven accessions to the church; the Sunday-school has increased from ninety to one hundred and eighty, and the church is enthusiastically at work.

Miss Bertha Clawson, who is supported by the church at Angola, Ind., as their Living-Link, has just come to America to stay until after the Centennial. Miss Clawson has charge of the Girls' College at Tokio, Japan. During Miss Clawson's absence the work of the school will be in the care of M. F. Lediard.

The new church building at Kansas, Ill., is nearing completion, and it is said that when it is complete it will be the best building of the Disciples in that part of the state. The total cost is $25,000.00 Z. T. Sweeney will have charge of the dedication which will be held October 10. F. B. Thomas is the pastor.

J. E. Rains, New Franklin, Mo., has accepted a call to the church at Junction City, Kansas. He will move to his new parish in October. The New Franklin Church will want a preacher for half time and a near-by church will take the other half. The two churches will be able to pay $1200 and parsonage.

A modern Bible-school building is to be erected by the First Church, Augusta, Ga., during the coming year. This is made necessary by the fact that the Sunday-school has more than doubled in the last six months. Miss Eva Lemert led the campaign last winter which brought about the gratifying result. Howard T. Cree is the pastor.

J. A. McKenzie closed his work at Hamburg, Iowa, the last Sunday in August. He leaves a church of 200 members, out of debt, with a Sunday-school attendance of from sixty to ninety-eight. The church will need a resident minister at once. There is no resident pastor of the Christian church in the county.

Professor Sherman Kirk of Drake University, has wrought a splendid work at Milwaukee this summer. He has had charge of a mission there in an important and promising district. Few men are better adapted to shaping up and setting in order a congregation than Professor Kirk and we rejoice in the good work he accomplished.

After two and one-half years of successful work at Burlington Junction Church, (Mo.), Roy O. Youtz has resigned, to assume the care of the church at Palmyra, Mo. The Burlington Junction Church wants another occupant for their new seven room parsonage, and will pay a salary of $800 besides.

J. R. Goldner, Springfield, Ill., delivered the three addresses at the annual roll-call service of the church at Vermont, Ill., September 2. Eighty per cent of the members were present, and a host of visitors. Geo. W. Ross has been pastor of this church for sixteen years, and the bonds between pastor and people grow stronger each year.

George A. Campbell, pastor of the church at Austin, Ill., who has spent the summer at Pentwater, Mich., and various other places, is "again in the harness," and we hope to have his contributions appear in the Christian Century regularly. The erection of the new building at Austin moves steadily onward.

S. B. Moore, formerly of Mayfield, Ky., has entered upon the pastorate of the church at Warrensburg, Mo. During his two and one-half years at Mayfield the church erected a beautiful new building and installed a $2,600 pipe organ. The congregation is free from debt; is a living link in state work; and is active in all missionary work.

F. D. Power, pastor of the Vermont Ave. Church, Washington, D. C., has the distinction of having served one church longer than any other man among the Disciples. This is an enviable distinction indeed. During his more than thirty years with this church, he has led in the planting of five other churches in the national capital, all of which are doing a successful work.

Charles Bloom, although extended a five-year call to remain as minister at Newman, Ill., has resigned to take up evangelistic work. Mr. Bloom is one of the ablest and most cultured ministers of the gospel. He has been in the ministry fifteen years and is prepared to do the cause great service. The churches should keep him busy. His address is Newman, Ill.

B. L. Wray began his fifth year of service with the Budd Park Church, Kansas City, Mo., the first Sunday in September. It was "red letter day" for the church. There were 614 in the Sunday-school. Large audiences greeted the pastor at both morning and evening services, and five years of Mr. Wray's pastorate.

Professor Ernest D. Burton, the head of the Oriental Education Commission of the University of Chicago, is now in Japan. He was tremendously impressed by the educational opportunity in China. We hope that he will have time to study the situation in Japan and to realize that the era of Christian education here is not past, but in a sense, future.—(From the Japanese Harbinger.)

The church at Colfax, Ill., is to hold a meeting during November, in which they will have the assistance of W. B. Clemmer of Rock Island, Ill. Norman H. Robertson has a record of four years' successful work with this church, entering upon his pastorate there immediately after the completion of his work in the Divinity School of the University of Chicago.

The ladies of the Evanston Church will hold a rummage sale early in October. Those having donations for the sale should communicate with Mrs. R. F. Winter, phone 5661. In view of the splendid plans for larger work just undertaken by the Evanston Church, there should be many Disciples in Chicago, not members of this church, who will nevertheless contribute to the sale.

J. E. Chase, Benjamin, Texas, held twelve night meetings for W. C. Wright, at Knox City, Texas, resulting in twenty-three additions and seventeen confessions. One young man will study for the ministry. The church will erect a building this fall to cost about $5,000. The confidence and esteem in which Mr. Wright is held by the church and town insures permanancy to our cause there.

The church at Grant Pass, Oregon, has been awake during the summer. They have started a training class with an opening enrollment of twenty-five. They are organizing the Bible-school and grading it according to international standard for organized classes. There have been twelve added. Two of those baptized were deaf mutes, husband and wife. Frederick M. Brook is the hustling minister there.

G. J. Chapman finds the church at Auburn, Nebraska, to which he has just gone as pastor, "in perfect peace and well-organized for work." The C. W. B. M. auxiliary has a membership of one hundred. The reception given the new pastor and his wife was unique, in that the men gave the entire program. This is certainly "men's day" in the churches. And that means manly work by the church. Mr. Chapman will attend the Centennial Convention. We hope he will be in the company on the Christian Century Special.

G. E. Roberts was greeted by large audiences the last Sunday in August, which marked the close of his pastorate at Mason City, Iowa. In the evening the churches of the city joined in a union farewell meeting, Mr. Roberts preaching the sermon. The following evening the church gave Mr. and Mrs. Roberts a farewell reception, presenting them with a purse of more than $42 and bidding them attend the Centennial Convention. The first Sunday in September Mr. Roberts began his ministry with the church at Osceola, Iowa.

Frank E. Billington, who during the past year has made the Bible-school of the Silverton church, Oregon, the "banner school" of the whole state, by getting every member of the church lined up in the Sunday-school and increasing the enrollment and attendance about 500 per cent, has gone to Eugene, where he will occupy the Bible-school Chair of Pedagogy in the Eugene Bible University and also become the superintendent of the First Christian Church School. We congratulate Lane County and Eugene in having Brother Billington added to their splendid list of Sunday-school workers.

The First Church, Fort Smith, Ark., is making September a month of preparation for the centennial. The following sermons are annoounced by Pastor E. B. Bagby: September 5—Men's Day—"Alexander Campbell—"A full Grown Man." Auspices Baraca Bible Class. September 12—Woman's Day—"A Secret Told—"Mary and Martha." Auspices Ladies' Aid and C. W. B. M. September 19—Anniversary Day—"To the Work—The Backbone of the Society." Auspices Christian Endeavorers. September 26—Declaration Day—"Where the Scriptures Speak." "A Generation of Bible Students." Auspices Sunday-school.

Royal L. Handley, who has for two years served faithfully as pastor of the church at Waukegan, Ill., has just been called to the pastorate of the church at LaPorte, Ind., where he succeeds M. H. Gerrard, who is now at Saginaw, Mich. Mr. Handley was for-merely assistant editor of the Christian Century and was for a time associated with Professor Herbert L. Willett in the pastorate of the First Church, Chicago. While carrying on these lines of activity, Mr. Handley has been for a large part of the time a student in the Divinity School of the University of Chicago. He enters the pastorate at LaPorte with a record of faithful service, and with a thorough educational equipment. He will doubtless become a leading force in the life of the city, and the LaPorte church offers him a fine field for such service.

A fine example of definiteness of aim in the work of the church appears in the following announcement from the paper of the First Church, Warren, Ohio: "Things we hope to do in September: 1.—Get a large delegation to go up to the Pittsburg Centennial. 2.—Pay all current expense debts, and, if possible, the building fund debt, that we may report our church "out of debt." 3.—Prepare for a great boys' campaign to be held in our church immediately after the Centennial, led by Mr. A. W. Conner of Indiana. 4.—Observe Declaration Day, Sunday, September 26, in the Bible-school, as a great rally for the fall work."

Bruce Brown closed his work at Valparaiso, Ind., the last Sunday in August, and went immediately to take charge of the work of the First Church, Spokane, Washington. All the churches in Valparaiso joined in a union farewell service for Mr. Brown. Congressman E. D. Crumpacker presided at the meeting and a number of representative citizens made addresses. At a reception on the following Tuesday evening, Mr. and Mrs. Brown were presented with a set of solid silver. Mr. Brown was holding a place of marked influence in Valparaiso. It was largely due to his initiative that the saloons were driven from the city two years ago. We wish him success in his western field of labor.

Ray O. Miller, formerly pastor of the First Church, Fort Wayne, Ind., has received and accepted a call to the First Church at Fresno, Cal., succeeding J. R. Perkins, who goes to the West Side Church, San Francisco. Mr. Miller just declined a call from the First Church at Stockton, Cal. Mr. Miller, though a very young man, has been able to accomplish a good work in his other pastorates, one at Pittsburg and one at Fort Wayne, he has added to the numerical strength, financial ability and spiritual growth of his congregation. He is a graduate of Bethany College and of Yale University. The Fresno church has a membership of 950; is well organized; is a living-link in both the home and foreign societies, and is full of great possibilities for the future.

Sunday, September 5, David N. Wetzel pastor of the Church of Christ at Mattoon, Ill., dedicated the new church building at Footville, Wis. The former building was destroyed by fire last January. The new structure cost $5,000. The basement contains dining room, kitchen and Sunday-school rooms. The main Sunday-school room can be opened into the auditorium, being divided by rolling partitions. Mr. Wetzel preached in the morning on "The Mission of the Church." It was necessary to raise $700 to dedicate the building free of debt and after pledges were called for it was found that $820 had been subscribed. The communion

PRESSED HARD

Coffee's Weight On Old Age.

When prominent men realize the injurious effects of coffee and the change in health that Postum can bring, they are glad to lend their testimony for the benefit of others.

A superintendent of public schools in North Carolina says:

"My mother, since her early childhood, was an inveterate coffee drinker and had been troubled with her heart for a number of years, and complained of that 'weak all over' feeling and sick stomach.

"Some time ago I was making an official visit to a distant part of the country and took dinner with one of the merchants of the place. I noticed a somewhat peculiar flavor of the coffee, and asked him concerning it. He replied that it was Postum.

"I was so pleased with it that, after the meal was over, I bought a package to carry home with me, and had wife prepare some for the next meal. The whole family liked it so well that we discontinued coffee and used Postum entirely.

"I had really been at times very anxious concerning my mother's condition, but we noticed that after using Postum for a short time, she felt so much better than she did prior to its use, and had little trouble with her heart and no sick stomach, that the headaches were not so frequent, and her general condition much improved. This continued until she was as well as the rest of us.

"I know Postum has benefited myself and the other members of the family, but not in so marked a degree as in the case of my mother, as she was a victim of long standing."

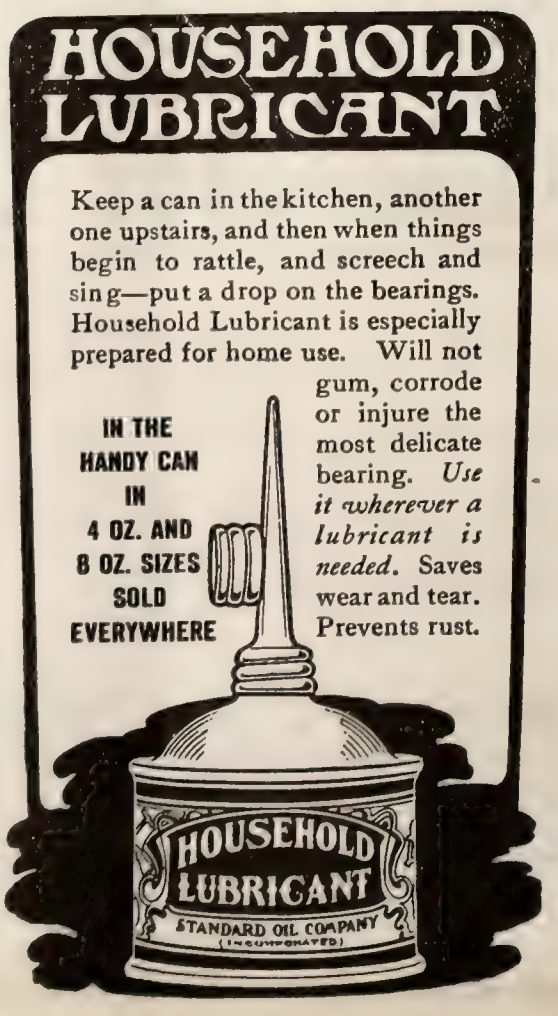
service was held in the afternoon and in the evening the pastor, J. H. Bullock, preached on "The Place of the Disciples of Christ in American Church History." Special music was furnished at both morning and evening service by Mrs. J. D. Deihl of Madison, Wis.

Orvis F. Jordan, pastor of the Evanston Church, and one of the editors of the Christian Century, is one of the busiest men in Chicago. His church is just beginning the erection of a new building, which demands much of his attention; on the fourteenth of September he will open at the church, again, the night school of shorthand and typewriting. Last year Mr. Jordan did the teaching himself, but this year, while he will continue to have oversight of the school, the actual teaching will be done by Mr. Virgil N. Burch, the new principal of the school. The school is not conducted for revenue, or to enlist church members; only a nominal fee of one dollar per month is charged for the instruction, and those who receive the advantages of the school are in no way placed under obligation to attend the church services. Mr. Jordan has many more plans for this sort of work on the part of the church, which can not be realized until the new building is ready for their use. The papers of the city are unusually generous in their commendation of Mr. Jordan's work.

The Nebraska Convention

By H. O. Pritchard.

The Nebraska Christian Missionary Society has just concluded another of its annual conventions, held at Bethany Park, Bethany, Neb. The convention was eminently successful in every way, in attendance, program and fellowship. There were between two and three thousand people present during the eight days assembly and while it was not quite so large as it has been during some previous years, yet it was larger than was expected since so many of our people are planning to go to Pittsburg.



The program was more than commendable, both as to variety and quality. Those who came from out of the state to deliver addresses were Oliver W. Stewart, E. W. Allen, A. L. Orcutt, P. C. McFarlane, G. W. Muckley, W. C. Pearce, I. J. Spencer, and J. H. Mohorter. Indeed the program was equivalent to a national convention and the writer can truthfully say that he has never attended any state convention that equaled this one in strength of program and in the spirit which obtained. Brother Stewart was up to his high standard as a temperance speaker. J. H. Mohorter entertained and pleased the audience with his stereopticon lecture, illustrating the benevolent work done for the orphans and aged. E. W. Allen's mission study classes were well attended and highly satisfactory. A. L. Orcutt made an unusually able address in behalf of our aged ministers; while Brother Muckley set forth the advantages of church extension in his inimitable way. Brother McFarlane's address to the men in the afternoon and banquet which followed was one of the most delightful events of the convention. We need not say that W. C. Pearce filled us with the spirit of Christ in his address on the Bible-school, and as for I. J. Spencer, we would not attempt to estimate the value of his addresses, one on "The Shepherd, the Key to the Missionary Problem," the other, "The Key to the Problem of Christian Union." We have not time nor space to mention the many and excellent speeches which were given by the pastors and workers of our own state, but only a word by way of interpretation of the convention as a whole, for there were undercurrents which ran throughout the whole assembly.

There was the strong consciousness present of the need of closer articulation between the present disjointed departments of our work. There was a prayer continually going up for a better organization of local work and a closer coöperation between the separate congregations. By this, we do not mean to say that there were any steps taken in the way of ecclesiasticism, but rather the strong conviction that the days of the religious mob are past and that all things must be done decently and in order. This spirit of coöperation expressed itself in the state missionary society, in the organization of the Bible-school work, in the Christian Endeavor plans and in the work of the church as a whole.

Then, there was a spirit of optimism on every hand. Not a pessimistic speech was heard; not a "knocker" was visible. By this we do not mean to say that the leaders and workers were not conscious of past failures and present weaknesses, but that they saw in these opportunities for greater usefulness in the days that are ahead. The spirit of optimism was the spirit of youth combined with the conscious strength of young manhood. In nearly all the addresses, there was an attempt to get back of "first principles" to One from whom first principles proceeded. This current of thought reached its climax in the Sunday morning address of I. J. Spencer, in which he held that the person of Jesus Christ is the basis of Christian Union. That no creed nor personal opinion nor even the Bible could ever be made a basis upon which the Christian world is to unite but that the person of Christ, which is above all these and the source of the Christian religion, is the One in whom and, the only One, in whom his followers can unite. The speaker maintained that some of the slogans of our reformation needed revision and instead of saying, "Where the Bible speaks, we speak; and where the Bible is silent we are silent," we should say, "Where Christ speaks we speak, and where Christ is silent we are silent"; and where we have said that the Bible is our doctrine and our discipline, we should say that Christ is our doctrine and our discipline. It ought to be said there was no disparagement of the Bible, for it was clearly shown that it was preëminently important in pointing the way to him; but Christ is superior to it as the person is superior to his portrait.

Finally, and what is most significant, there was running throughout the meeting that current of the conscious presence of the spirit of God. He seemed to be in our midst and by the power of his spirit was giving us strength, and by the guiding of his spirit was leading us into truth. The note was sounded that the next hundred years of our history is to bring forth a new type of Christian life, thoroughly consecrated to God and dedicated to the work of his Son, in which life the Christ will be recreated. Not only are we to restore primitive christianity in doctrine and in ordinance, but in life as well. The emphasis upon the life side of christianity was gratifying and prophetic.

Books You Need

We offer some of the most timely and vital books now appearing among the Disciples of Christ. You need every one of this splendid list.

OUR CENTENNIAL BOOK.

"Historical Documents Advocating Christian Union."—Edited by C. A. Young.

This book is the classic for this our Centennial year. It contains Thomas Campbell's "Declaration and Address"; Alexander Campbell's "Sermon on the Law"; Barton W. Stone's "Last Will and Testament of the Springfield Presbytery"; Isaac Errett's "Our Position"; J. H. Garrison's "The World's Need of Our Plea." Beautifully illustrated. Retail price, $1.00. No one should allow the Centennial to pass without possessing this book.

Z. T. Sweeney, Columbus, Ind., a preacher of national reputation, writes:

"I congratulate you on the happy thought of collecting and editing these documents. They ought to be in the home of every Disciple of Christ in the Land, and I believe they should have a large and increasing sale in years to come."

Basic Truths of the Christian Faith, by Herbert L. Willett, author of The Ruling Quality, Teaching of the Books, Prophets of Israel, etc., etc. Post 8vo., cloth, 127 pages. Front cover stamped in gold, gilt top, illustrated, 75 cents, paper 25 cents.

A powerful and masterful presentation of the great truths for the attainment of the life of the spirit. Written in a charming and scholarly style. It holds the reader's fascinated attention so closely that it is a disappointment if the book has to be laid aside before it is finished.

J. E. Chase writes:

"It is the voice of a soul in touch with the Divine life, and breathes throughout its pages the high ideals and noblest conception of truer life, possible only to him who has tarried prayerfully, studiously at the feet of the world's greatest teachers."

Our Plea for Union and the Present Crisis, by Herbert L. Willett, author of "The Life and Teachings of Jesus," etc., etc. 12mo., cloth, 140 pages, gold stamped, postpaid 50 cents.

Written in the belief that the Disciples of Christ are passing through an important, and in many respects, transitional period.

The author says:

"It is with the hope that * * * present forces and opportunities may be wisely estimated by us; that doors now open may be entered; that hopes only partially real now may come to fruition that these chapters are given their present form."

Every Disciple of Christ will be interested in getting from his own pen the teachings of Professor Willett. No fair man will consent to judge him on the basis of newspaper reports. These books should be in every one's possession just now.

ERRETT GATES' ILLUMINATING WORK.

"The Early Relation and Separation of Baptists and Disciples."

This is the theme of the hour. Dr. Gates has put into our hand the historic facts with a grace and charm that makes them read like a novel. In cloth, 75c. Paper binding, 25c.

"We owe a debt of gratitude to the writer of this book, and could only wish that it might be read not only by our people all over the land, but scattered among the Baptists. It is a most meritorious and splendid contribution to our literature."—THE CHRISTIAN WORKER, PITTSBURG, PA.

"The dominant personality of Alexander Campbell is so brought out as to give to what might be regarded as the dry details of ecclesiastical history and controversy almost the interest of a story. A valuable contribution to the history of the American churches."—THE CONGREGATIONALIST, BOSTON, MASS.

The Plea of the Disciples of Christ, by W. T. Moore. Small 16mo., cloth, 140 pages, net postpaid, thirty-five cents, won immediate success.

George Hamilton Combs, pastor of the Independence Boulevard Christian Church, Kansas City, Mo., one of the great churches of the brotherhood, writes:

"I cannot thank Dr. W. T. Moore enough for having written his little book on "Our Plea." It is more than a statement; it is a philosophy. Irenic, catholic, steel-tone, it is just the handbook I shall like to put into the hands of the thinking man on the outside. In all of his useful and honored life Mr. Moore has rendered no greater service to a great cause."

Franklin, Ind., September 6.—Great crowds and great successes in Johnson county campaign; tabernacle at time inadequate; chorus of two hundred led by Albert Buss, W. J. Minges and Maxwell Hall, assistants. People coming from the ends of the county; Big Four excursion train to meeting Tuesday night was packed. Thirty added last Sunday; twenty-nine yesterday; additions at every service; 236 today. Great union communion service of all the churches in the county next Sunday morning; sixteen Sunday-schools united in a mammoth Bible-school in the afternoon. Some of the best organized churches here to be found in the brotherhood. No saloons in the county, and Johnson County comes the nearest being solidly Christian of any place we have ever worked.—Charles Reign Scoville.

Vitoqua, Wis., September 6.—No preaching, no Communion, no Sunday-school here for five years. Organization all broken up and membership scattered. Good building. Have been here fifteen days. Great crowds, splendid interest, and forty-four additions. L. B. Conrad sings. Continue.—Allen Wilson.

Sullivan, Ind., Sept. 12, 1909. Splendidly constructive meeting Evangelist George Snively and Sniff leading, twenty-four today. Beloved Vawter continued as minister at increased salary. Anti-church here but then youth uniting with us. Church enthusiastic and hopeful of new building.—Robert Taylor, Elder.

Marion, Ohio, Sept. 12—Rufus A. Sinnell in Great meeting with first church here; greatest crowds since great Updike meeting years ago, first invitation today, fifteen added; greatest enthusiasm continues.—Charles E. Smith, Minister.

Altoona, Pa., Sept. 12—Meeting one week old, fine attendance and great interest manifested. Greatest men's meeting today ever held here, Thompson the Egyptian stiring the community with the message of Jesus powerfully presented magnificent style.—L. G. Parker, Pastor.

Franklin, Ind., Sept. 13.—Eighty-two converts yesterday. Greatest day in the history of the Johnson County Christian Churches. Fully two thousand at morning union communion service conducted by Pastors M. B. Ainsworth, Franklin; Lee Tinsley, Union and Nineveh; John Sweeney, Edinburg. All churches of the county uniting. Great county Sunday-school rally and parade in the afternoon. Special excursion on traction lines. Over twenty-five hundred Sunday-school scholars from infants to aged in great parade organized by County Supt. Tinsley, led by Indianapolis Y. M. C. A. Band of thirty-five pieces. Parade was twelve blocks long. Aged were carried in automobiles following procession. Great tabernacle too small for morning, afternoon and evening crowds. Additions by days this week—thirty-one, thirteen, nineteen, thirteen, sixteen, twenty, and eighty-two. Four hundred to date. Will send written report in full later.—Chas. Reign Scoville.

Blackwell, Okla., Sept. 13.—In a meeting here with Church which is without minister. Fine field, good salary, additions at every service.—Small and Shaffer.

F. D. Draper's Resignation

F. D. Draper of the Hillman Street Christian Church of this city has tendered his resignation, to take effect October 1, of this year. The Hillman street church is the outgrowth of a mission started in the summer of 1900, by the Welsh Mission Society of Mahoning and Trumbull counties. It has been a plant of slow growth. Excellent work was done there by Rev. Alanson Wilcox and Rev. L. J. McConnell, who both preceded Mr. Draper in his ministry. The greater growth, however, had taken place in the past four years. Mr. Draper came in July, 1905; at which time the congregation occupied a neat chapel, and had a memberhsip of one hundred and twenty-seven. During his pastorate, the congregation grew so rapidly that it was finally incorporated into what is known as the Hillman Street Christian Church; which organization purchased in the spring of 1906, the mission chapel and the land on which the same was located, and shortly thereafter, commenced the erection of a somewhat large and commodious house of worship, which was erected at a cost of about fifteen thousand dollars, and which now bids fair to become the home of one of the large and influential Christian churches in this city; the membership now numbering over four hundred.

In the accomplishing of what has been done, Mr. Draper has worked in season and out; worked untiringly and without murmur or complaint. The writer has had to come in contact with him almost every week since he came to this city, and has found him to be a man of energy; one of kindly impulses, and one with all the traits of character that are needed for a successful man in the field in which he has chosen to work.

Receipts More Than Doubled

The receipts of the Foreign Society during August more than doubled those of the corresponding month, 1908. They amounted to $34,034, or a gain of $17,436. There was a gain in the number of offerings of every kind. There was also a gain in the amount from every source of receipts. This is a most encouraging report. It is the best under all the circumstances in all our missionary history.

The first of the month we asked friends to help us make a gain of $4,000 during August. And behold they make the gain $17,436! Praise the Lord. The churches as churches gained $2,005 in their gifts; the Sunday-schools $2,439; and individual givers, $2,252; and annuity gifts show a gain of $5.550 for the month. The gain in regular receipts was $11,303.

The friends of Foreign Missions will rejoice to know that the total receipts to September 1 amount to $267,258, or a gain of $61,550. This gain is more than the total receipts of the Foreign Society sixteen years ago. The gain in regular receipts is $40,453, in annuities $25,314. There is a loss in bequests of $4,217.

We ought to increase this gain up to $75,000 by all means by September 30. We are rather inclined to believe this will be done.

Remember the books close September 30!

A Personal Word

The Centennial Convention is not to be a mere jubilation. It is to be a demonstration to the world of what can be done by a body of disciples united upon the New Testament basis, preaching the simple gospel to the whole world. What we have done will tell more mightily for the cause we plead than great mass meetings devoted to self-gratulation.

From every city, village and hamlet the people announce their purpose to be at Pittsburg. Will they be there to share in the well-earned glory of things accomplished or merely to sing the praises of what has been done through the sacrifices and gifts of others?

No disciple ought to participate in the Centennial at Pittsburg unless he has done his part in carrying out the Great Commission.

The surest sign of the fidelity of any church is its missionary offerings. The supreme test of discipleship is the missionary enterprise. The rolls of the missionary societies will reveal those who have a right to rejoice. Hundreds of church and thousands of disciples have not sent a single dollar to help preach this glorious gospel throughout America. Our books close September 30.

"Blessed are they that do ——" If you want to enjoy the Pittsburg Convention see that your church, Bible-school and Endeavor Society are on the list of givers, and see that your offering is in before the books close.

A Timely Suggestion

Five thousand dollars, placed in the hands of the American Christian Missionary Society, can be so invested that the interest will support a missionary anywhere in America. The fund so created could be named in honor of some noble Christian, living or dead, thus insuring year by year, through lives redeemed, churches organized and missionaries multiplied, a perpetual memorial speaking more eloquently and effectively than bronze or marble and lasting as eternity.

There are in operation under our society now, the Lathrop Cooley Fund, the Francis M. Drake Fund, the Margaret Oliver Fund, the Norman A. Phillips Fund, the Dr. H. Gerould Fund, the George Bates Fund, the John Reed Fund, the Columbus A. Mee Fund and half dozen others. All these funds are perpetual. The principal is never spent. The interest supports a missionary every year. Each of these funds has established strong churches in various parts of our country and will continue to do so, as long as our brotherhood continues upon its glorious mission.

EASY FOOD
Ready For Instant Use Without Cooking.

Almost everyone likes a cereal food of some kind at breakfast and supper, but the ordinary way of cooking cereals results in a pasty mass that is hard to digest, and if not properly digested, the raw mass goes down into the intestinal tract where gas is generated and trouble follows.

Everyone knows that good food properly digested keeps the body well, while poor food, or even food of good quality that is poorly prepared and not digested, is sure to bring on some kind of disease.

The easiest food to digest in this line is Grape-Nuts, made from wheat and barley, and cooked thoroughly at the factory, some 12 to 16 hours being consumed in the different processes of preparation. The food, therefore, is ready for instant service and the starch has been changed to a form of sugar, so that it is pre-digested and ready for almost instant absorption.

A Chicago young lady writes that she suffered for years from indigestion and dyspepsia from the use of food that was not suitable to her powers of digestion. She says:

"I began using Grape-Nuts, and I confess to having had a prejudice at first, and was repeatedly urged before I finally decided to try the food, but I have not known what indigestion is since using it, and have never been stronger or in better health. I have increased in weight from 109 to 124 pounds."

People can be well, practically without cost, if they will adopt scientific food and leave off the indigestible sort.

"There's a Reason."

Grape-Nuts food is crisp and delicious to the taste. It should be served exactly as it comes from the package, without cooking, except in cases where it is made up into puddings and other desserts.—Book of delicious recipes, and "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs.

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true, and full of human interest.

Centennial than by creating one of these $5,000 funds in memory of a loved one?

What more effective way to link one's own name and heart's desire, with the plans of our brotherhood for the extension of the knowledge of our "old plea" here in America, and the building up of the Kingdom of our Lord everywhere, than the bestowal of such a gift in trust for some definite work in the Home Field?

America's need has had all too little attention from us. We are not carrying our plea to one place in fifty where great churches might be built. It is our churches in America that are making possible all other missionary work.

Money invested in American evangelization pays—twice over—in direct results on the Home Field and in increased support for the Foreign Field.

Let preachers everywhere draw the attention of thier people to this great open door.

Let us have a Centennial Memorial Fund from you or from your congregation. Write for further advice to Yours for 17 cents a day!

We announced this new sales plan recently, just to feel the pulse of the people. Simply a small cash payment—then 17 cents a day. That is the plan in a nutshell.

The result has been such a deluge of applications for machines that we are simply astonished.

The demand comes from people of all classes, all ages, all occupations.

The majority of inquiries has come from people of known financial standing who were attracted by the novelty of the proposition. An impressive demonstration of the immense popularity of the Oliver Typewriter.

A startling confirmation of our belief that the Era of Universal Typewriting is at hand.

A Quarter of a Million People are Making Money with

The OLIVER Typewriter

The Standard Visible Writer

The Oliver Typewriter is a money-maker, right from the word "go!" So easy to run that beginners soon get in the "expert" class. Earn as you learn. Let the machine pay the 17 cents a day—and all above that is yours.

Whever you are, there's work to be done and money to be made by using the Oliver. The business world is calling for Oliver operators. There are not enough to supply the demand. Their salaries are considerably above those of many classes or workers.

"An Oliver Typewriter in Every Home!"

This is our battle cry today. We have made the Oliver supreme in usefulness and absolutely indispensable in business. Now comes the conquest of the home.

The simplicity and strength of the Oliver fit it for family use. It is becoming an important factor in the home training of young people. An educator as well as a money maker.

The Quest Of Quietness

IF THE example of our Lord has to us the supreme value which we accord it in our statements of Christian belief, certainly the quality of serenity which was in him must be given its true place in our own natures.

When attention is given to the utterances of both our Lord and his apostles it is perceived that they insisted upon the necessity of acquiring this very characteristic if the law of Christ was to have due supremacy in character. Jesus warned his disciples against anxiety. "Take no thought for the morrow," said he, and while these words can never be pressed into a doctrine of indifference regarding due and appropriate provision for the future, they must be considered as the direct provision for the future, they must be considered as the direct and emphatic protest against all forms of anxiety that rob human life of its power of achievement.

Most of the evils which we dread are of the imagination. The mountain passes that seemed so terrible before us really sink and become plains when we approach them in the spirit of faith. The lions in the pathway we discover to be chained, as did the pilgrim of Bunyan's dream, and the deep and swiftly running streams are quite fordable by the assistance of our divine Guide. Anxiety is a wasting of strength in apprehension of troubles which are perhaps likely not to come. We have a way of crossing our bridges before we come to them, and thus of inviting discouragement and collapse when there is really no occasion.

The ringing word of cheer addressed to the Philippian believers is, "In nothing be anxious." Foresight and provision are necessary and admirable, but anxiety never. Even those crises in life which are most real if met in the spirit of courage are likely to yield themselves to solution where anxiety would unnerve and strip one of his power.

The secret of serenity which was in Christ and which in him became the means of conquest over annoyance and irritation is the Christian's secret of a happy life. Business troubles, sickness and many other causes of depression yield to a calm and quiet spirit that is informed with faith and resolute through love. That mind which was in Christ Jesus is the secret of serenity and power.

It must also be remembered that those annoyances which come to us from others are oftentimes the results of certain concessions which we make to anxiety and fretfulness and are thus in a measure invited. Emerson well says: "The power men possess to annoy me I give them by a weak curiosity. No man can possess to annoy but through my act," and St. Bernard says: "Nothing can work me damage except myself. The harm that I sustain I carry about with me, and am never the real sufferer but by my own fault."

The causes of discontent lie generally in a certain shallowness of nature and narrowness of vision by means of which one is limited to inadequate sources of enjoyment or prevented from perceiving much of the real satisfaction there is in the Christian life.

No one can be a pessimist or indulge in the habit of depression without thereby ignoring the great opportunities for happiness which lie on every side, and while happiness can never be considered the supreme end of life, yet it grows naturally from the right use of powers and proper adjustment to the program of Christ.

He is as foolish who considers that happiness is the thing most to be desired as is he who regards suffering as a necessary state, and devotes himself through this misguided belief to austerity and self-deprivation.

> "Not enjoyment and not sorrow
> Is our destined end or way," but such a recognition of the divine purposes that life becomes radiant through service. Happiness which is not the result of frivolity but of a large and serene view of life and an attempt to conform one's self to its requirements is a good greatly to be desired.

On the other hand, sadness which comes from sin and from the troubles that sin brings into human experience is not unexpected nor necessarily evil so long as it does not breed discontent. George Eliot says: "I hold all indulgence in sadness that has the slightest tincture of discontent as a great delinquency."

It might be thought that one of the justifications for perfect serenity on the part of Jesus was his consciousness of fulfilling completely the Father's purposes for his life whereby there came a total absence of any element of inadequacy in his service.

How is it possible for us who find every day marked by certain delinquencies in our conduct to be ever satisfied or calm? It is true that we cannot expect that quiet which comes out of perfect attainment, yet one may accept the Savior's plan of doing each day its appointed task as our small power gives us the ability to do, and thus fulfilling Browning's ideal expression in "Sordello":

> "to do his best
> With means so limited, and let the rest
> Go by."

Such a contentment, which is not inconsistent with the consciousness of greater possibilities, may be enjoyed by every follower of Christ and may thus prove the means of attaining that serenity which was also his.

There are worse misfortunes than broken bones; there are broken hearts—worse ills than diseased bodies; there are souls that are sick—worse afflictions than pain—there are spirits in the agonies of death and in the fever of selfishness. The need of spiritual health is constant; it does help toward physical health. On this deep need of spiritual life rests the Church; by this abiding necessity for spiritual training is it created. Therefore the Church, in standing for "the care of souls" represents what is paramount and Perpetual in human life. Its ministry is linked in widest benefaction to the whole circle of human welfare.—From The Church of Today, by Joseph Henry Crooker.

I find that there is no worthy pursuit but the idea of doing some good to the world. Some do it with their society; some with their wit; some with their benevolence; some with a sort of power of conferring pleasure and good humor on all they meet.—John Keats.

I cannot abide to see men throw away their tools the minute the clock begins to strike, as if they took no pleasure in their work, and was afraid o' doing a stroke too much. The very grindstone 'll go on turning a bit after you loose it.—George Eliot.

The Trend of Events

THE NEW CHOLERA SERUM.

The new cholera serum has been successfully used in the recent Russian epidemic of that fell scourge. Dr. Metchnikoff of the Pasteur Institute in Paris, warns physicians to use it with great care, for it holds dangers within itself. He says cholera can be banished by expert sanitation, clean drinking water, and well cooked vegetables. In prevention is the defeat of all epidemics. The statesmanship of modern medicine seeks prevention, medical prophylactics is greater even than materia medica. Dr. Metchnikoff finds that drunkards die quickly in cholera epidemics.

INOCULATION FOR TYPHOID.

The United States is not always in the lead. Scientifically we are sometimes led. The government is now supplying army posts with the serum for inoculation against typhoid. The story of two soldiers at Ft. Omaha who had submitted to the test was recently told in these columns. Fifteen have submitted to the test successfully at Ft. Leavenworth. Henceforth, all soldiers going to typhoid danger zones will be inoculated.

Great Britain tried it some time ago on soldiers in India. Out of 4.335 inoculated only twenty-one developed typhoid. Two died, but neither of them had taken the second inoculation required in the treatment. The Germ ans tried it on 80,000 troops. It was so successful that all the Kaiser's men going to foreign parts or to danger zones must submit to it. The Englishmen noted that while they lost two of the 4,335 inoculated, a corps of 6,000 under like circumstances, but not inoculated, lost thirty-five and had 189 cases of the disease.

The inoculation is made hypodermically and the patient develops the symptoms of incipient typhoid. After three or four days he feels like one does who is recovering from the disease. In ten days another inoculation is made and the patient is immune from the scourge.

THE "BIRMINGHAM PLAN."

Birmingham, Ala., has adopted Judge Cleland's "Parole System." In the few months it has been used it is estimated that thousands have been saved for the city workhouse in expense, while more thousands have been earned by the culprits who were sent to work for support of themselves and families. Meanwhile the families were saved from starving, the offender has a chance to regain self-respect, the law is justified, and the sentence operates to reform the erring man rather than to revenge society.

PEACE IN SAVAGE NEW GUIANA.

The governor of New Guiana has reported to the Australian government that the land is at peace and that a traveler is as safe in that country as on the streets of any great city by night. He adds that this surprising change of affairs in that savage land is largely due to the work of Christian missionaries. His predecessor said that every penny spent in missions saved the government a pound. Eleven years ago the heroic Jas. Chalmers was murdered by the savages there. A few weeks ago a French schooner was driven ashore on one of the unchristianized islands of the New Hebrides group and notwithstanding a vigorous defense, the entire crew were massacred. It was not so long ago when a French bark was being driven ashore in a storm on one of these islands, the man on the mast cited a church and a great cry of relief went up from the crew. Savages pacified by the police force of soldiery might not kill and eat a crew, but neither would they turn aside or risk aught to save or succor them. The peace the missionary brings makes savage hands into good Samaritans.

FAR TUNIS IN REFORM.

Tunis is small, but has been for centuries one of Mohammed's strongholds and a halting place for Time. Today she is joining the great Islamic movement for progress. Her people are divided into the three parties that generally mark the fermenting stage of reform. The young radicals would change all in a trice and adopt modern customs in a day; the old conservation would defy the processes of the suns and live by the unchanging laws of the Prophet and the Fathers; the true liberals would adopt the new and so conserve the old as to keep all things stable and move with steady stride. We cannot sew new cloth on the old garment, but we need not therefore wear the old forever, nor abandon garments altogether. Let the garment be new but the custom old and the change of manners go along with the change of clothes.

In Turkey the Sheik ul Islam is finding an interpretation of the Koran that will recognize Christians and give good Moslem Scripture for calling them brothers. This may prove a patching of old garments, but it will bring the new and never a return of the old.

ST. JOSEPH JOINS THE PROCESSION.

St. Joseph, Mo., has joined the enlarging procession of cities that are determined on economical and honest municipal government. By a large majority it adopted a new charter September 7. This charter does not provide for the commission plan of government, but it provides for administration through commissions of departments, appointed by the mayor, who is made directly responsible for all their work. It abolishes ward elections and gives a council of five members, elected by the entire city and with a four year term of office. They confirm or reject the mayor's appointments, but must give reason in writing for rejection. No franchise can be granted for a longer period than twenty-five years and the people may demand a public referendum on all franchises. No debt can be made or public utility disposed of without consent of the voters and a Public Utilities Commission will regulate all utilities that are granted franchises, regulating rates and service. The Iniative, Referendum, and Recall are the best things in the charter. By them the people may inaugurate any legislation, vote on any enactment, and recall any official at will. These three devices of modern government spell ruin to all machine and boss rule and stimulate an intelligent citizenship.

AN AEROPLANE TORPEDO.

Effective working models of an Aeroplane Torpedo have been made. It will carry two hundred pounds of explosive, sail low over the water, and, it is claimed, travel with direct aim and great speed until it strikes a battle ship, when it will be more effective than the shell of a si xteen inch gun. If a success, it will be especially effective as a land defence against an attacking fleet. It will be quite economical as compared with the great guns inasmuch as it will cost but little more than one of their shells and there will be no expensive gun to wear out with a few discharges. A "mosquito fleet" of them could be let loose on an approaching hostile fleet and no power but lucky shots from small guns could stop them.

Another genius has perfected a small dirigible balloon that he controls perfectly from an electric switch-board on the ground. He claims to be able to send it anywhere within "wireless" distance and to drop bombs from it with accuracy and at will. Between the two there is promise of a defense that looks forbidding to future attacking foes.

Alfred Noebel believed men would cease war only when invention made it impossible to fight. If he was right these terrible engines of destruction are peace-makers. But war-makers tend to so limit the use of the most destructive powers of war as to keep the gauge of battle open to their arts. If this were the way to peace then those rules of war that forbid wanton barbarities might well be removed and let death wreak its worst and suffering torment its most until men feared to go to battle.

The surest prevention of war is a love of peace. The moral impulse goes deepest. The death dealing engines of destruction will tend to make battle economically impossible. Love of peace will beget a hate of war.

A FEUDAL LORD OF STEEL

McKee's Rock, Pa., has been the scene, for two months, of feudal battle. It all comes about because the president of the Pressed Steel Car Co. thinks of himself as a Feudal Lord in Business. Here is the gist of the story:

This company employs several thousand men, most of them foreigners unable to use the English language. Most of the work has to be done in gangs. Thus the efficiency of the best workers is leveled down by necessity by that of the poorest in the gang. The company adopted the "piece system" for its wage scale. Thus the whole gang must be put on a scale regulated by the amount of work it did and divided according to the skill of each worker in the gang. What any man would receive could only be figured out by an expert at the end of periods of several days. The men could not understand the complex system and were at the mercy of foremen and superintendents for the computation and division of wages as well as having to accept the arbitrary scales made by the company. In their blind and human way they asked to have the scale simplified so they might know how much they could earn and were earning. They were told in no uncertain tones to take what was given them or get out. President Tofstot took the stand of a feudal Lord with his serfs. He stood on the scullers dictum that the men had no rights except that of working or quitting as they chose. He recognized no human factor in the situation and his cold, arbitrary position aroused acute resentment in the men. He had refused to deal with a union and the men were unorganized. But a common cause and one so transparently just brought them to common action and there has been literal war since. On the one hand is brutal physical force blindly fighting for daily bread and on the other just as brutal force fighting with the cunning of money and mind for the tyrant's right to name his own terms.

Who is to blame? The men have committed overt acts. They have sought to destroy property and to menace the lives of strike-breakers. Very justly the law stands with its strong arm to protect both property and human life. Just as properly the law should stand ready to prevent men like Hofstot from creating a condition like this. An effort to be fair, to deal reasonably with those who were co-operating in his enterprise—as every worker in his plant was doing at every stroke of his hammer—to conciliate instead of arbitrarily exasperating men who had a cause to plead, would have saved the whole situation. Mr. Hofstot refused to listen to conciliation; he would not talk the matter over with the leaders; he is a Lord of the main, and men were cogs in his machine so far as any feeling of humanity in him was concerned.

Who is most guilty of the most unlawful deeds? The men prepare to throw stones and Mr. Hofstot mounts a machine gun. Is he more lawful than they? He has the protection of the state constabulary, yet he prepares a private artillery of terrible death dealing power. The men threaten danger to strike breakers and he immunes them within a stockade and so covers them with guards that they dare not leave at will, but must work. Two hundred break out in one foray and a charge of peonage is now brought against the company. For every physical brutality of which the ignorant foreign workers have been guilty the company has been equally guilty of a brutality of cunning and material power. For every overt act the men have committed the company has committed another, more elusive perhaps, but less excusable also, and they have had the protection of the state constabulary besides. Plainly the guilt is on Mr. Hofstat. He has not been satisfied to play the industrial despot in the wage matter, but has followed his injustice with vengeance and evicted the strikers from their poor huts of homes and mercilessly dragged the women and children from their shelter to the street. It is costing the company tens of thousands and the men both wages and homes, and it is benefiting no one, unless it serves to hasten the day when arbitration or at least conciliation in industrial disputes will be compelled by law and Industrial Despots of the Hofstat type will be relegated to the barbarous age of industrial warfare.

Now that the men have won their fight it is to be hoped there will be no repetition of such scenes.

The Return of Faith

THE deeps of the soul are known to itself and God alone. No explorer in a trackless country ever knew less of the land through which he passed than men who meet familiarly from day to day know of each other. The lighter experiences of life are easily communicated and shared. The shadows lie unknown in the depths.

No task is more difficult or delicate than that of the minister who is seeking to be a true comforter to his people, a shepherd and bishop of souls. He wishes to share the real burdens of his members, to speak words in season to those wwho are faint. But he wewll knows that the deepest griefs, like the richest experiences of life, are not easily confided. The commonplace souls whose sorrows and joys lie near the surface and are soon gone may find it no difficult task to put their confessions, their griefs and their happinesses into words for his ear. But the deeper natures, those to whom sorrow, temptation and depression mean far more, keep their secret close hid, where only they can behold it, and One other.

It is often the question in the mind of a thoughtful minister as to which way of bringing comfort to the troubled, doubting and sorrowful is the most effective. Some men find it easy to speak words of solace to the distressed. Others stand hesitant and silent at a time when such help is needed. Yet it is not because they are unsympathetic, but rather because they are conscious of the unprofitableness of mere human words when life itself has spoken. The strongest natures are the more likely to find speech difficult in moments like that. The conventional phrases, which rise so easily to the lips of others, seem empty and meaningless and die away unuttered. Who shall say, however, that the sympathetic silence of such souls is not worth more to the suffering than all the condolences or encouragements of the more voluble.

It is the reproach now and then thrown at the men of the study by their brethren who read little, but spend their lives, as they say, "among their people," that they know nothing of the sorrows and struggles of their members; that they have only the academic view of things, which is remote from life, and that their labors would be more abundantly blessed if they touched the real life of men. Of course it is not worth while insisting that ministers should know their people. There needs no oracle to declare this truism. But it may well be questioned whether the minister who spends much time in the preparation, not only of sermons, but of himself, through the ministries of the most helpful and inspiring literature and the most patient study, may not actually know his people far more truly and sympathetically than the man who spends most of his time in the work, sometimes the dissipation, of making endless pastoral visits. Which of the two will have the deeper well of experience and sympathy out of which to bring refreshment to the doubting and distressed?

After all it is the vision of Christ that brings light and drives away the gloom. By whatever means his life can be made real to men, good will be done. We have been permitted to see a letter written to one who had been able to bring to a group of people something of the vision of Christ. We believe the experience of darkness and mute helplessness of which the writer speaks is far more common than is supposed. The letter is, in part, as follows: "I wish I could tell you what your message did for me. I am afraid I cannot describe it. I only know that it was absolutely the first spiritual uplift and help that I have had since my father went away. I could not bear what any one else had to say to me, and I could not read. Whether my mind was numb from the shock or over-anxious and occupied with the heavy responsibilities that had fallen upon me, I do not know. I read and read without the least idea of what I had been over. The pages might as well have been blank. I had always thought out as conscientiously and clearly as I could what I believed, and supposed I had thrown myself into my work and interests with real love for God, and desire to be of some little service to my neighbor. But I could not remember that I ever had thought, and not one bit of inspiration or enthusiasm would ever come back for what had once seemed so important to me. Little by little the work was all taken up again, because I felt it would grieve my father to have me give it up. It would have killed me to disappoint him, but any duty to God or man was an indifferent and minor matter. I prayed hard, only to realize the prayers were addressed to my own father. I felt sure he was helping me—he had faced the same perplexities, he had suffered great spiritual depression—but God was far away. I knew all would come right some day if I could only hold out, but endurance often seemed at an end. It was too terrible to be outwardly so dead. You will forgive so much that is personal, but you can not know the relief it is to have Christ's life seem such a reality, to feel again that the love of God is something near and personal, and with it all to have the old desire and inspiration for service come flooding back."

Such words might well repay a minister or teacher for many years of toil. They impress once more the profound truth that people crave sympathy, but still more they want the assurance that there is One who really knows, and that underneath are the everlasting arms. That which the world needs most is the vision of the Highest. "Show us the Father, and it sufficeth us." The comfort which men most seek is the certainty of God; and that can come only in the clear shining of the presence of Jesus, interpreted by those of fullest and richest life, who can speak of him because they have spoken with him.

The Liberal Minister in the Conservative Church

A Ringing Statement from the Latest Accession to the Pittsburg Ministry

By John Ray Ewers

As the mariner needs his compass, as the master builder needs his blue-print, so the minister needs his policy. A precise conception of what he proposes to do, a clear view of the place he expects to attain, he must possess. Of all ministers the one who is liberal and who has accepted a call to a conservative church must have a policy at once wise and strong.

Who is Liberal? Who Conservative?

Whom would you consider a liberal minister? In a word, one who accepts the more assured results of historical biblical criticism, who makes much of the human side of Jesus' personality, and whose theological conclusions are determined by rational rather than by superstitious processes. I would like to add, one whose passion is for life-interests rather than dogma interests, although that might not necessarily follow.

What would you consider a conservative church? One in which the majority of the members hold tenaciously to the traditional theology, who believe more or less clearly in verbal inspiration of the Bible and who therefore feel that not a jot nor a tittle can pass from the letter of scripture without the whole being destroyed, who magnify the supernatural in Christ's career, who regard him as a stranger here, a pilgrim from a foreign clime, who make much of the blood atonement, whose theological conclusions, a stronge combination of scriptural and monkish ideas, are usually rigidly held and stoutly defended, although frequently possessed in undisturbed content. In many cases, also, would be found objections to missions, indifference to social reforms and doctrinal rather than ethical interest in the scriptures.

Doctrine and Character.

Strange as it may seem, however, personal character may be developed quite independently of these theological holdings. We all know some so-called liberal men who are in reality narrow, selfish and mean, while we know some people holding the cast-iron theology of the old school, who are generous, sweet, and noble. This is not saying that it does not matter what one believes, but only that character, fortunately, is not always molded over a theological framework. Now it comes to pass, that a liberal minister is called to a conservative church. Evidently he needs a most wise and loving policy or the "irresistible force" will not only "impinge upon" but violently smash into the "immovable object" with fatal consequences.

The Harm That Callow Reformers Do.

If I can suggest a practicable policy, then the following of it will insure great gain to our Saviour's cause, success instead of defeat to many a young heretic, the sparing of a saving amount of faith to the man of the old school, and unity, peace and prosperity within the gates of many a church, otherwise doomed by an earthquake. Knowing the pit we should be able to avoid it. Permit me, first of all, then, to indicate the method most certainly not to be pursued.

There have gone forth from every large and modern school of divinity, men, often of brilliant parts, who have considered it their first and only task immediately to reform the theology of the communities into which they have entered. They have let in the light by destructive lightning flashes, very brilliant but very harmful. Doubtless the theological systems of these men have been correct enough, but their conception of their work and their attitude to real life have been all wrong. The community was stirred. Yes. Men of various types, at first, crowded the church. Yes. The conservative clergy filled the press with all their worst epithets such as "Unitarian" and "Atheist" and manifested most unbrotherly spirit. Yes. But the crowds melted away. Those seeking some new thing found another sensation. And the last state was worse than the first. And what of many good, honest, pious folks of the old school? They have been driven from their church home. Today they wander in a theological waste, their fair temples fallen; they grope in the dark. Confusion reigns in their minds, rebellion rankles in their hearts, the fires of religion burn low upon their altars. The old system lies a weary, wreck, as yet there is no new. What is wrong?

These men have committed a colossal blunder. They have seen theology only. With them theological correctness has outweighed sociological values. Intellect has outweighed love. Again and again has this folly been committeed by some theologically biased man. We have had enough of it. Let us have done forever.

Their theology may be right, but their method is wrong.

This Is Not a Helpful Ministry.

I cannot find words strong enough to denounce this evil method. Such ministry reminds us more of the wolf than of the shepherd. There is no love, no inspiration and no sense in such a procedure. Thus to wreck a church denotes not the master of men but the blundering iconoclast. A little dynamite would wreck the Parthenon. A gorilla could devastate an art gallery. The measure of ability is construction, not destruction.

Many a young theolog with the seminary degree fresh upon him thinks it his first duty to ride forth into the world as a knight of the New Theology. He conceives it his duty to catch some kind old father and let in the light with a battle-axe. Perhaps he does not mean to be so cruel but he has no other weapon. After a time he pauses on some hill-crest and feasts his eyes upon the mangled forms and battered castles that mark his path. This is not the Christian ministry. Not so did Jesus advance the trutth. He fulfilled, he did not destroy.

The Minister's Task.

When the liberal minister sits down in his new study, before his voice has been lifted in the new chapel or his face seen in any pastoral visit, as his first task he could wisely draw his paper toward him and pen words similar to these:

God, the Father, has sent me here to love these people into Jesus' way. I am to move among these whom God has given into my hand, with the same spirit that Jesus breathed forth—brave but tender, strong but compassionate. I am to interpret Jesus by my life. I am to love them, teach them, bind up their wounds, suffer with them, serve with them, rebuke their sins, praise their virtues and guide them in the true path. My constant ambition is the development in them of the kind of life that Jesus lived—the type that will make them pure and happy personally, kind to their families, honest and industrious in their work, inspiring in their social groups, loyal to their church and of value to the community. My ultimate mission is to help to establish the kingdom of God on earth, the reign of justice, mercy, righteousness and truth in society."

My own conviction is that the liberal minister is better prepared to carry out this program than is any other. Truth and love may go hand in hand. Reason and graciousness need not be incompatible. The modern world view does not rule out tolerance, kindly consideration, sympathy and constructive energy, but rather includes all these.

And now precisely how shall the liberal minister proceed to carry out the program which with strict adherence to the truth always fulfils and never destroys?

I.—Friendship Based on Respect.

First of all he must secure devoted friendship. He must lead people both in and out of his church to have absolute confidence in him, to love him. By honest work in his study he must challenge intellectual respect, if not discipleship. By honest work in his parish he must secure admiration and devotion for his love, sacrifice and gracious ministries. By heroic toil in his community he must become a leader in constructive social enterprises with a sane and reliable following.

With all my heart I believe in the attractive power of personality. The first duty of our liberal minister is not to mouth even the truth, but to compel personal love. When people come to be your friends you can teach them. He must master the art of making and keeping friends. But this is not an easy task. It means the giving of self. It requires the unselfish laying of one's very life upon the altar of the community. But love begets love and the price is as nothing in comparison with what it buys. Who is so rich as he who dwells in a group of friends?

Vivid Pictures of Life.

The teacher of modern truth stands up in his throne, the pulpit, before him sit the people. Looking into their eyes he thrills as he feels their love. E'er he speaks, half a hundred or more pictures flit before his mind. There he sees the man whom once he severely rebuked. How angry he was then! How loyal now! There is the poor widow, with several children, for whom he saw that provision was made. There is the man, for whom in the hour of his blackest need, the minister gave up part of his vacation in order that he might return and be with him. There are the bereaved into whose hearts he has healingly entered. There are the married pairs whose joy he has consecrated. There is the humble toiler. To spend an evening with him, he renounced the warm fireside and the interesting book and gave that evening to the man with horny hands. Returning home, he mused of the knowledge never gained in schools and of the loyal hearts of "common" people. There is the young man with whom he consulted regarding the choice of a profession. There is the young woman whom he delicately warned against evil persons who artfully sought her destruction.

There is the man whom he first met in the hospital, and who was won by real love. He recalls now how that pale face lighted up when he first spoke to him. There sits his friend, the lover of books. How often their souls have flowed together as they communed among the volumes of rich lore. There is the old couple most of whose life companions are already on the other shore. He remembers spending an entire day in their home listening intently to their twice told tales of early sacrifice for the cause. And there are the children, for his audience will not lack their charming presence, those confiding little hearts that respond so quickly and devotedly to real interest in them. There they are, and the procession of games and books and pranks flits by—a moving picture. There are those others of hardened hearts, who have confessed to him all manner of hideous sins. His ears alone have heard. No one else, save God, knows. Forgiven and reformed, there they are like burned out craters healed with snow. The church is dear to them and he has led them there.

Tender words over their dead, strong words at their confession of faith, cheering words in their sick chambers, personal sacrifice for their good, holy words at the altars of marriage, these are not forgotten.

Pictures like these and many others pass before his eyes as he rises to speak. Those are his people—those for whom he has given his life, those whom he has won by sacrifice. Rich, poor, wise, unlettered, old, young, good and not so good, all won to him and by him into each life he has entered, to each some holy ministry has been given, each has felt his gracious love. They know it and they love him in return. Such a liberal minister can teach whatever truth is in his soul and they will hear him. Burning is the price of shining. Sacrifice buys love. Of all teachers of truth give me the lover of men. The minister must love men.

To teach theology before capturing the people's hearts, is folly. Let the theology develop naturally in the course of positive preaching. It is not only altogether right, but altogether unavoidable, for a congregation to be built around some man, usually the minister of outstanding personality.

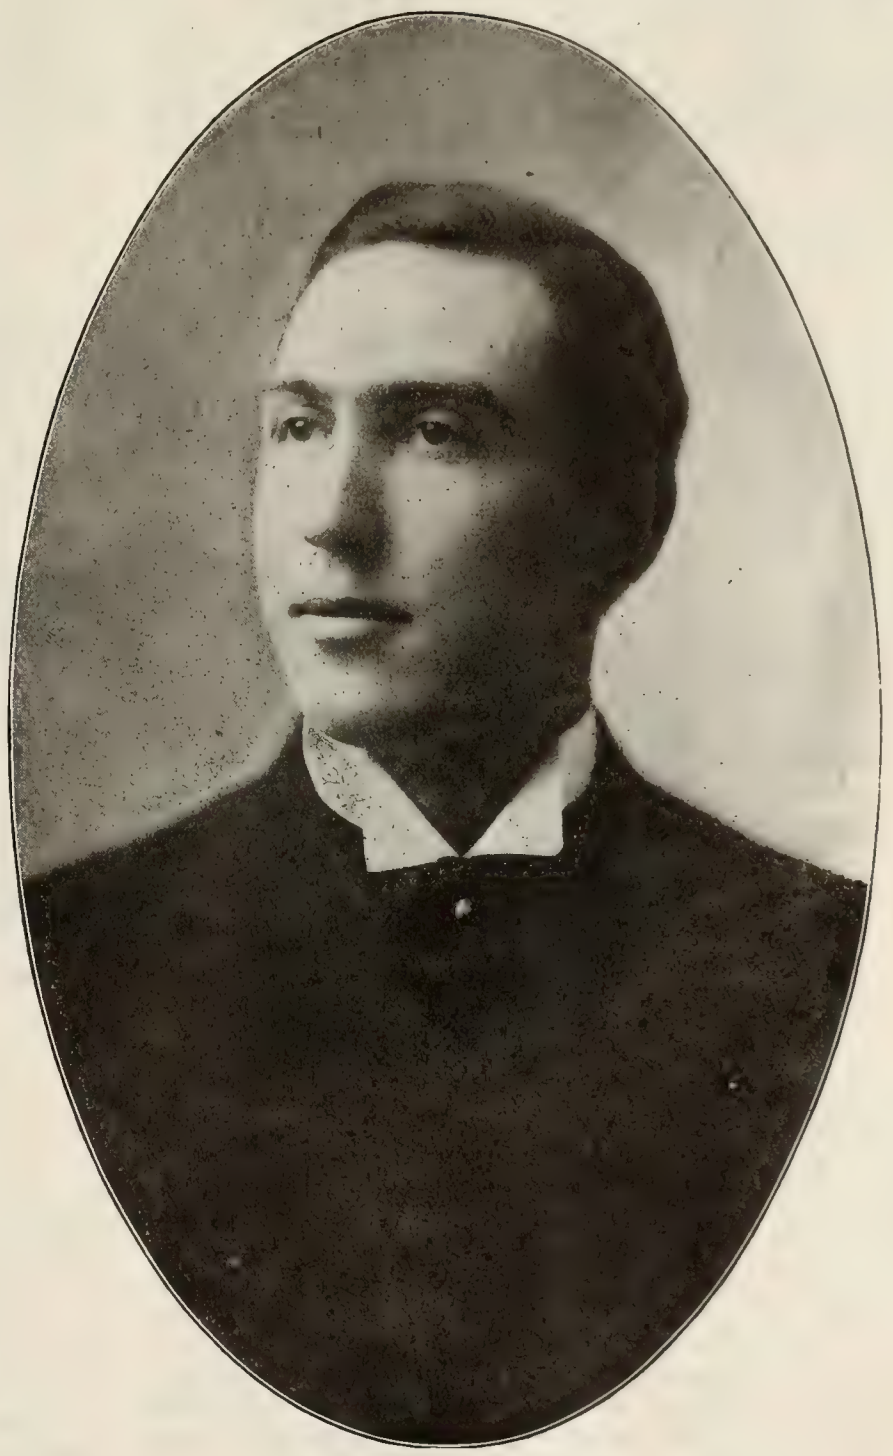
II—Look to the Kernel, Not the Husk.

This leads us to the second element in our policy. Negative preaching must be avoided. After friendship has been established, after the minister's constructive genius and energy have been demonstrated, after the spiritual fires have been kindled and the evangelistic motives evoked, then the minister may begin to teach with Jesus, "you have heard, but I say," and in this way the fuller truth may be developed. The germ of truth lives in the old form. Wrapped in many filthy rags is the priceless jewel. Destroy the rags, but hold up the jewel to sparkle in the light and to attract men's eyes. We are told that over some of the choicest mural paintings of Europe, ignorant monks daubed wretched colors. A process is now known whereby the crude paintings of the benighted brothers can be removed while the original work of the master remains but little soiled.

Thus to find the beautiful original beneath the hideous pictures of later date, and to lead men to be attracted thereto is infinitely better than to wreck the wall.

A great truth lies at the heart of every great doctrine. To develop that truth is the task of the liberal minister.

The Bible is a wonderful book of ethics and religion, recording the ideas and convictions of religious genius. Then instead of thundering, "we have not an infallible book," would it not be the better way, while teaching how the Bible came to be, powerfully to emphasize its truths?



Jesus—Best of Men.

Again Jesus had more of God in him than any other man who has yet trod this planet. Instead of spending an entire morning in denying the virgin birth, would it not be the part of wisdom to reveal Jesus as the expression of God?

Unusual power was resident in Jesus. Instead of blankly denying miracles, would it not be better to speak positively, but rationally, of Jesus' wonderful personality?

Old chestnut burrs can be knocked off with stones and clubs. It is better for the tree, however, to let nature push them off, when the new leaves come in the spring.

Again Jesus is our Saviour, at least he is mine. In place, then, of ridiculing the various old theories of the atonement, would it not be greater evidence of wise teaching ability to show how Jesus does save us?

REV. JOHN RAY EWERS,
Pastor East End Church, Pittsburg.

The World Wants Builders.

The world does not care for confessions of doubts and one Elbert Hubbard, however stimulating and delightful, is enough. Society is not saved by iconoclasm. The wrecking crew is needful, although only a hole evidences their finished labor and unskilled workmen suffice. Architects and master builders are in demand. Robert Ingersoll did God service, not purposely, however. He exposed by ridicule the vulnerable places in our fortifications. He sheared the moss off our religion. He helped to wreck the building where now our fair temple stands. Today Ingersoll would be burning men of straw and fighting the air. He lived in the days when knighthood was in flower, and a black plumed knight he was, but today he would be a Don Quixote driving his lance into decaying wind mills, or groveling at the road side, unhorsed, in the unwieldy armor of another age.

Liberal, But Not Violent.

The policy of the liberal minister in the conservative church will be positive. He will not do violence to the faith of the older saints. He will not bring anguish to the fathers and mothers in Israel. He will take no pleasure in seeing gray-haired men and sweet-faced companions wince under brutal blows. He will find no joy in demolishing the humble cottages of faith, where simple people dwell. He wwill fulfill the law, he will not destroy.

On the cob of the great old doctrines he will find the kernels of vital truth. Quietly he will push back the husks, securely he will lay hold of the kernels, and these he will plant in the rich soil of the heart, which, warmed by love, will come to harvest in joy.

He will find his Sunday-school his greatest opportunity and carefully through his faithful teachers he will instil into the pure mind of childhood lessons that will never have to be unlearned, truths that will not suffer in the scientific shock of coming days, ideas that will be in full harmony with the modern world. It should not be necessary for these children to suffer the pain of the theological earthquake through which many of us have passed. In many a private conversation he will suit the truth to the minds of men. He will attune their harps to the harmonies of God.

III.—The World Honors Experience.

The third element in this constructive program is closely akin to the second. The authority of experience is never disputed, but always accepted without question. Paul knew this and frequently alludes to his own experiences. "I know whom I have believed," he cries, and every heart catches the passion of his glowing conviction.

Thus when the liberal minister tells how the Bible has helped him, what guidance, comfort, profit, inspiration and rebuke it gives him, he is winning his way, and when he adds "the Bible is inspired where it inspires me" all are ready to accept the words even of Coleridge. When he declares the value of prayer in his own life, people will believe. When he speaks through his tears of God's help in sorrow, or tells simply how Jesus influences him for good and becomes his Saviour, he will hear the good confession from the lips of his friends. When he relates his own joy found in service, others will volunteer, and, when he proclaims the great ethical truths of the Bible, which have appealed to him, people will look upon the transfigured face of their prophet.

They will doubt your doubts. They will question your intellectual propositions. They will defy your dogmas, but they will accept the authority of your experience. When you say, "I know" they will be convinced. And here let me emphasize the great truth that our successful liberal minister must possess life-interests rather than dogma-interests. Poor, barren, intellectual theology cannot save society. At best theology is but a white skeleton, which must be clothed with warm flesh and bounding blood.

I yield to no one in my admiration of correct thinking. I have seen enough loose intellectual machinery, where the cogs met only occasionally, with disastrous results, to value properly an accurate mental process. It does matter what a man thinks. His ideas of the Bible, of God, of Jesus, of reward and punishment, of social obligations, do determine, to a degree, his action. Nevertheless, "he that doeth shall know," and I come back again to the value of experience in life intrests.

Social Service.

Our minister's deep, vital and real sympathies must be active in the field of social helpfulness. How can I teach the unlearned, how can I heal broken and wounded humanity, how can I correct the crooked ways, how can I inspire the nerveless and discouraged? These questions and others like them will constantly press upon his keen mind for answer.

With Samuel Walter Foss he will sing:

"Let me live in a house by the side of the road,
Where the race of men go by.
They are good, they are sad, they are weak, they are strong,
Wise, foolish, so am I.
Then why should I sit in the scorner's seat?
Or hurl the cynic's ban?
Let me live in my house by the side of the road,
And be a friend to man."

He must see in every person he meets a most interesting object of social significance, either one to be helped or one who can be led to join the ranks of the helpers. He will be actively interested in housing conditions and tenement reforms, in the fight against the great white plague, in fresh air farms, in night schools for foreigners and the poor, in the saintly work of the Visiting Nurses, in the various homes for the fallen and the broken in the struggle of life in which so many are unable to conquer. The wards of the hospitals will often echo in soft footsteps and weary faces will light up at his smile and encouraging words. The social settlement will feel his power and workers from his church will be faithful servants there. Even the police and juvenile courts will frequently be conscious of his sympathetic presence.

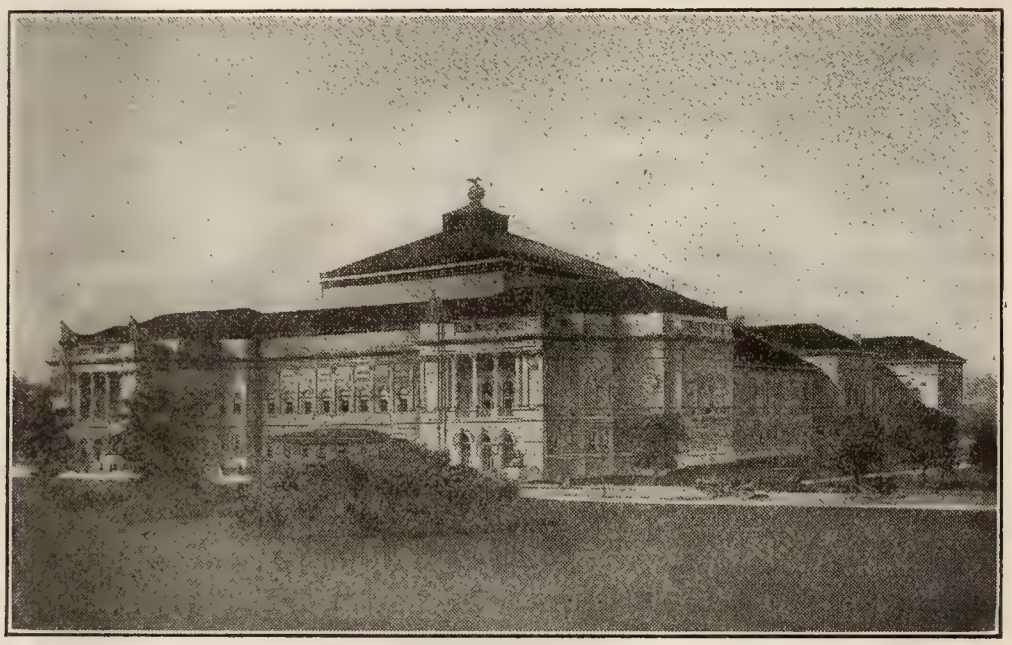
Civic and Industrial Reform.

The battle of the bottle will not be fought without his aid. The regulation of red light districts, the suppression of white slave traffic, the abolition of low theaters and vicious nickelodeons, the overflow of gamblers' tables will all have his wise advice and helpful co-operation. Civic righteousness and political reform will claim his attention. Deeper than all these surface movements will he go and his very life's blood will be given in securing justice and mercy in society, for until a living wage is paid, and reasonable hours allowed and Sunday rest permitted, the mass of men must of necessity be unequal to the struggle. At the same time he will be busy with the developmnt in his own people of the personal graces and virtues. Our liberal minister will be a scholar and lover of books but his interests will be only life-interests. Every idea will have value to him according as it is helpful to life. Every coin minted by his mind will bear the image of a man. The reformation of theology will not bulk so large that the building of life, and the reconstruction of character will be lost to view.

"More Life and Fuller."

The struggle of individuals toward righteousness, the three world battles of missions, temperance and just labor conditions will have place in his program. All that brings heaven right down into modern society; all that helps to establish God's will in the kingdom of earth and to lead men to remember the week day to keep it holy as well as the Sabbath, may claim his hours. Our ministers' time is for such employment. This is his work. Living thus his theological teachings will have weight. The loveless proclaimer of theology either new or old is the finest present day example of sounding brass and clanging cymbal.

People can and will forgive a vast amount of indifferent or even poor theology in the preacher who possesses vital, throbbing life interests, while no amount of correct theory or beautifully articulated theological systems can take the place of the "love for folks." The minister's life becomes the standard of measure for the spiritual, ethical and social activities of his group. Water will not rise above the level of its source.



One other element is needed to complete our program and that is our ability to see theology coming into the lives of men as a part of the new world view. A talk which I had recently with a successful college president impressed this fact upon me.

The New Theology and the Meaning of Life.

One who shares the old world view cannot accept the new theology. He has to reconstruct his universe from top to bottom. He is unscientific. He believes in dualism. If he be an old man it might be a positive cruelty to break up his system and leave him wandering amid the ruins of his universe. Great sympathy is needed at this point. Irreparable harm can be done by violent procedure. On the other hand one trained to the scientific outlook, who has the modern philosophic conception, who has a workable system of ethics, who has social sympathies, who naturally adopts the historical method will find the new theology a part of his world view. Thus the new theology comes in on the rising tide of world movements. It is written on the sky of the new day. It does not need to be forced home with bludgeon or battle-ax. It should not appear in the earthquake, but should be heard in the still, small voice of the new world spirit. As quietly, as naturally and as certainly as the tide or dawn will the new theology come. A beautifully integrated part of the new world view it appears. It is not, therefore, to be emphasized out of proportion to other interests. It is not to be introduced violently. As sure as tomorrow's sun will rise, the truth in the new theology will gradually prevail. As a part, but only as a part, of his other useful work, therefore the liberal minister will lovingly teach the modern point of view.

New Life in Old Churches.

Very probably the liberal minister will not be called to the conservative church unless the members have been led to have confidence in him as a religious teacher, as a preacher of righteousness, as a social reformer, as a devoted pastor, and as a winner of men to Jesus' way. The conservative church does not exist which is not amenable to love, and our liberal minister can by winning the people's hearts by the positive preaching of essentials, by voicing his own vital experience, by demonstrating his interests in life, by seeing the new theology and setting it forth as a part of our modern world view and thus not unduly hastening its coming, he can, I say, lead his people out into the full light of perfect truth. The shepherd goeth before his sheep and leadeth them.

Carnegie Institute, Pittsburg, Pa.

Life, Not Theology.

All this and more the wise, tactful, constructive, liberal minister may see evolving in his parish. Not by violence but by love does the kingdom come. Ridicule is too cheap a weapon for the soldier of the king. Respect for the holy personality of the other man demands constructive sympathy.

All about us are conservative and liberal churches. This classification is too general; rather let us say that all about us are people more or less clear in their theological positions, but all of them sharing the experience of life.

"Toiling, rejoicing, sorrowing.
Onward through life they go."

Oh, husbandman, here is your garden. God forbid that you should despoil the trees and plants or that through indifference you should suffer the weeds and thorns to choke out the good. God grant you the sheaves and the fruitage.

Oh, lover of men, learn from our gracious Saviour, who fulfilling, but never destroying, established the kingdom of heaven in the hearts of men.

First Church, Allegheny.
(Now North Side.)

This is the Old Mother Church, of which Dr. Wallace Tharp has been pastor for the past six years. It is the largest of our Pittsburg churches, and has a membership of 1200. This great old church is aggressive in all lines of activity. The Sunday-school has an average attendance of more than400, with large men's and women's Bible classes. These have been built up by Dr. Tharp during the last year. There is a good auxiliary of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions, and a fine Ladies Circle. The church supports its own missionary on the foreign field.

East End.

J. Ray Ewers, Pastor.

Located in the midst of Pittsburg's most aristocratic people, the East End Church has been doing a work that few churches have been able to do. Until the coming of J. Ray Ewers, September 1, Bro. J. G. Slayter had led them into larger things for some four years. They are thoroughly alive in missionary work. At the present time they support Alfred W. Place in Japan. This is the church home of Samuel Harding Church and Senator Oliver and Dr. Evans. A great men's Bible class has been built up in this, the most aristocratic section of Pittsburgh (a proof that all classes of men love to study the Bible when approached in a manly way). Much is expected of this church with the coming of their new pastor from the splendid work which he was doing in the First Church, Youngstown, O.

John A. Jayne.
Chairman of the Publicity Committee.

Knoxville.

Fred M. Gordon, Pastor.

This is the livest and most up-to-date church in Pittsburg. Seven years ago this was not so. But since Bro. Gordon's coming at that time they have gradually grown. During this time their beautiful and splendidly equipped building has been erected. Theirs is the largest of our Pittsburg Bible schools. The average attendance reaching almost 500—over 100 of these are in the Bethany Bible class taught by the pastor. Their C. W. B. M. Auxiliary deserves special mention. This live wire pastor is chairman of the entertainment committee. No one need fear but that the 50,000 delegates will be most graciously entertained.

Bellevue.

Wm. Ross Lloyd, Pastor.

This is the church that A. W. Place left to go to Japan as a missionary. Since that time Brother Lloyd has been their pastor. This church and Knoxville have somewhat similar surroundings as the East End Church. Since his coming a great men's Bible class with actual attendance of from seventy to eighty has been built up.

In the size of both its membership and Bible school this is the third largest of our Pittsburg churches. They have one of the best C. W. B. M. auxiliaries in Western Pennsylvania.

Central.

C. L. Thurgood, Pastor.

Brother Thurgood is the oldest pastor of our Pittsburg churches, both in age and in number of years of service. He has been with the Central Church for the past fourteen years. In this time he has seen many of their people move from the down town district to places farther out, where they are now leading the work in some of our younger churches. Bro. Thurgood, eternally busy, has been able to meet the problems of a down town city church as few could have done. Along with their regular work they have done much social settlement work. Surrounded by 10,000 Jews, they have a noble band of young people and many good missionary givers.

First Church, Pittsburg.

W. S. Winn.

Now known as Hazelwood. W. Garnett Winn is the hard-working pastor. He has been with the church for the past three years, coming direct from Bethany College. The church is now doing a thorough up-to-date work in all lines of service. Their activity in missions and Bible school work deserve special mention. Bro. Winn is chairman of the usher committee of the convention.

Wilkinsburg.

Geo. W. Knepper, Pastor.

For a church to lose thirty Bible-school teachers, five superintendents, and scores of members by removal on account of the panic, and yet to be in better condition than two years ago, shows that both pastor and people have been eternally hustling. This is the history of the past two years of the Wilkinsburg church. Few men could have placed this church where it is now as has their consecrated and energetic pastor. They are thoroughly alive in all lines of work, especially in their missionary activity. Bro. Knepper is chairman of the pulpit supply committee for the convention.

McKees Rocks.

C. A. MacDonald, Pastor.

The present pastor has been with this church for about three years. During this time the work has steadily grown. Their special work is in the Bible-school. In the past three years it has grown from less than 100 to fourth in size of the Pittsburgh churches. A large men's Bible class (Baraca) was built up and a class of Italians was taught English by the pastor. Bro. MacDonald closes his work November 1 to enter the field as Bible-school evangelist. He will have charge of the Bible-school exhibit at the convention.

Belmar

John A. Jayne, Pastor.

This church has a splendid building and parsonage combined, located in one of the best resident districts out beyond East End. It is a young church with great possibilities. Besides his pastoral work, Bro. Jayne preaches to thousands of people by his illustrated page in one of the leading Sunday papers of the city. He is chairman of the publicity committee of the convention. Through his work with all the leading papers of the country during the past three months, at least one-half of the people of the United States have had a chance to know of the great centennial movement, reading of it in their own home papers.

Crafton

Holly M. Hale, Pastor.

This church dedicated their new $15,000 church building a little over a year ago, while Chas. H. Frick, now of Wilkesbarre, was pastor. Their present pastor has been with them since last spring, but is getting a good grip on the people. Crafton is a small city in itself where many of the professional and clerical men of Pittsburgh live. The work is very young, but growing.

Squirrel Hill

Chas. E. Gies, Pastor.

Squirrel Hill is one of the nearest churches to the convention halls, being just beyond the Schenley Oval and the Golf Links. Lawson Cambell has been their faithful and hard-working pastor for the past three years. He recently closed his work there and on September 1 Bro. Geis of Willoughby, O., became their pastor. Their Primary Department in the Bible-school has been for a long time one of the best in the city.

Fourth Church

F. A. Wight, Pastor.

Of all our churches that have held struggles this one has had the most. But they have won out each time and now are enjoying a season of prosperity. The church is but about six years old.

Homestead

D. R. Moss, Pastor.

The present pastor has been with this church for about one year. During this time they have not only carried on their regular work, but assisted Bro. Keussef to establish a church among the foreigners. The pastor taught English to a class of over forty Russians. He is assistant chairman of the entertainment committee.

Braddock

E. B. Quick, Pastor.

This is one of the oldest churches in Greater Pittsburgh. It has many of the old reliable members still living. Their present pastor has been with them only a short time. He came to them from a successful work at Dravasburg.

Carnegie

O. H. Phillips, Pastor.

The Carnegie church is now enjoying a season of prosperity. It owns its own building and has grown into a good church. They are at present pushing the Bible-school. Bro. Phillips is chairman of the music committee for the convention. He is busy getting the choirs together for the convention chorus.

Calvary

W. H. Weisheit, Pastor.

Some two years ago this church burned its mortgage on its building. A few months afterward the present pastor was called. Since that time the work has slowly grown until now their building is none too large. This church is noted for its large number of boys in the U. B. B. A., due to the efforts of the pastor.

Observatory Hill

W. E. Crerie, Pastor.

This church is in better condition than for a long while, due to the efforts of Bro. Crerie, who has been with them for the past year. The work is very hopeful.

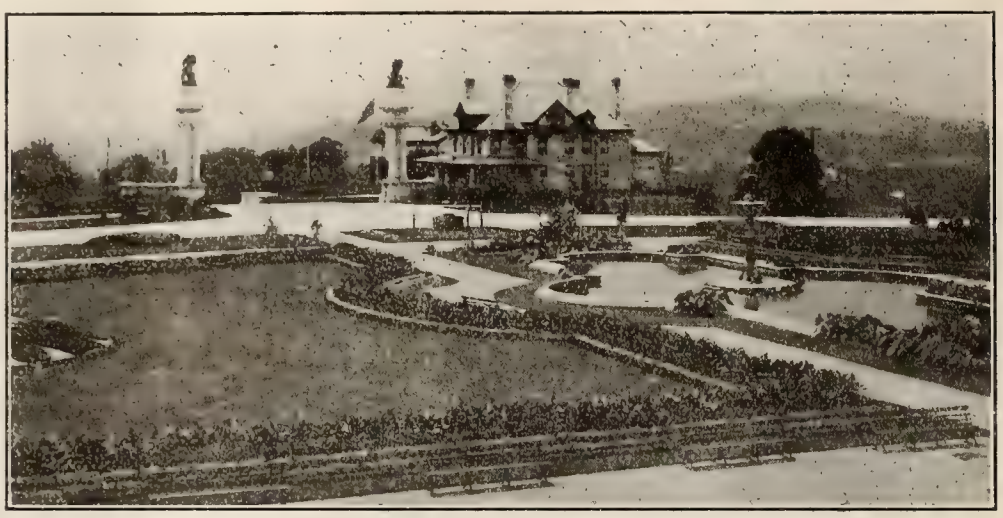
Duquesne

Percy Davis, Pastor.

This church came very near being lost about two years ago. But Bro. Davis, a Hiram College graduate, who was holding a clerical position in the city, volunteered to keep them out for a while. The result was that Bro. Davis is now their pastor, giving all his time to the work. They have had some 100 additions and all lines of work are in good condition. The best thing of it all is that their pastor has given himself for the ministry and is destined to become above the average.

Sheraden

J. A. Joyce, Pastor.



This is our youngest church in Pittsburgh and the only one that is yet without its own building. It is less than two years old, but already has its lots secured and a building fund started. They are planning to have their own church home before another year.

Other churches just outside of Greater Pittsburgh are Turtle Creek, Thos. Hughes, pastor; McKeesport, Howard Cramblett, pastor, and Dravasburg, Bro. Pathuon of Australia supplying.

Beechview

R. S. Latimer, Pres. W. P. C. M. S., Pastor.

This is one of our churches that has had a building enterprise on for the past year. They are still worshiping in the old building. They expect to be able to complete their fine new building in the near future. They are located in a growing resident district. Bro. Latimer has been our faithful president of the W. P. C. M. S. for twenty-one years. In that time he has attended all forty-three of our Western Pennsylvania conventions and missed but seven of the regular monthly board meetings. He is a business man that always finds time to do the Lord's work. He has seen most of the Pittsburgh churches started and helped to care for all of them in their infancy.

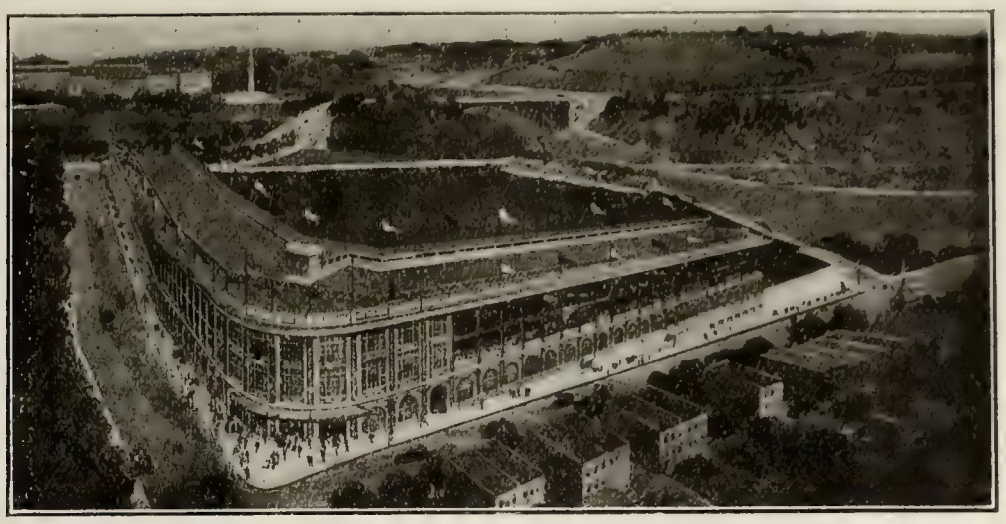
Centennial Bulletin

By John A. Jayne

This is the last letter, but two, of the Publicity Man to the thousands of Disciples throughout the United States, relative to the preparation for the convention. In a brief two weeks, we shall be right at the portal of the great Centennial convention. Right at the doors of that great religious event for which, as Disciples of Christ, we have been planning, preparing and praying for the past four years.

It is well that we should stop for a moment and think relative to the convention and what it means. In addition to the convention proper of our various missionary organizations we are coming to a great celebration of the beginnings of the work of reformation inaugurated by Thomas and Alexander Campbell, 100 years ago. As we study the growth and development of this movement it may be said of us, as Bildad said to Job in the olden times, "Though thy beginning was small, yet thy latter end should greatly increase."



From a simple little church in the hills of Pennsylvania there has gone forth an influence that has girdled the earth and shaken it from center to circumference.

We have been raised to the end that we help raise others. The measure of our loyalty to the plea of the fathers is the measure of our prosperity today. Whatsoever we have gained has been gained at tremendous cost, great sacrifice and heroic work.

We are coming to this Centennial, not that we may felicitate ourselves, not that we may receive the congratulations of others, but that we may show to the world that the realization of the prayer of Christ, "That they all be one," is not an impossibility, that when a body of Christian people persistently and determinately take the New Testament as their only guide and rule for faith and practice and remain loyal to its teachings, they shall receive the blessing of God, the approval of their own conscience and the commendation of all of those to whom Christ is more than church, creed, or custom.

At this writing, it looks as though the expectations of the most sanguine relative to numerical strength of the convention would be more than realized. There is every reason to believe that there will be 50,000, if not more, in attendance upon its various sessions. With such a host coming together in the spirit of prayer and praise to God "The Giver of every good and perfect gift," with a due recognition of its opportunities and obliagtions, there can be but little doubt that when this host shall be distributed to its homes there will come all through the land a great moral and spiritual uplift such as has never before been known in America, and which, in spirit and in power, will hark back to that glorious day in the first century when a mighty host of the people were gathered together, and Pentecostal blessings came to all, who had long continued in prayer and to all who heard and accepted the truth.

As Brother Warren, the Centennial secretary, has well said, "This should be a time of heart searching, range finding and loin girding." It should be a time of new concentrations, new ambitions and new visions of larger and better work. If we come to this convention in this spirit, vaunting not ourselves of the past, but humbly thankful for what we have been permitted to achieve, devoutly determined to rise to larger and better things, then for us and for the world the convention will be a blessing. May God grant that in this spirit we shall come to the convention.

Another Word Relative to Registration

If you have not already made your reservation of rooms, please do so at your earliest convenience. You will find it greatly to your advantage to be able to proceed at once to your home, during the convention period. Those who register in advance will be located nearest the convention hall. Assignment cards are now being sent out to all who have secured their rooms in advance. All that it will be necessary, for those holding assignment cards to do, upon arriving in Pittsburg, will be to go to the information booth in the station to which they come and receive definite information relative to the car line that they take to get to their place of entertainment. Remember this, that this registration for homes is absolutely free of charge and it will be made for you if you send in your name, whether you register for the program and badge or not.

Another Word Relative to the Program and Badge

If you wish to be absolutely certain that you will receive a program and a badge for the convention it will be necessary that you send in the registration fee of $1.00, which entitles you to the program and to the badge. As there are but 20,000 programs ordered and as there are at least 25,000 Disciples in western Pennsylvania alone, you will see the advisability, if you wish a program, of registering for one at once. Upon receipt of your registration fee a certificate wil be mailed you which will entitle you, when you get to Pittsburg, to a program, and if through any circumstance of life, you are unable to come to the convention, one will be mailed you together with the badge.

A Word as to Exhibits

The exhibits of the Centennial convention promise to be the most remarkable of any ever presented in any religious gathering of the world. Forty societies and colleges have already reserved space for these exhibits. The great space under Forbes Field, together with a large hall 50x100 in Carnegie Institute, has been reserved for these exhibits. They will represent our various missionary enterprises in all of their varied forms. Through the media of historical exhibits our growth will be made manifest and by the presentation of much interesting matter the work of our colleges will be made known. The exhibit alone carefully studied will more than repay one for the trouble and expense of the trip to the convention.

Pulpit Supply

Brother George Knepper, chairman of the Pulpit Supply committee, wishes it definitely announced that all preachers, who are asked to supply in Pittsburg pulpits on Centennial Sunday, are expected to present their best life message. Pittsburg pulpits are occupied by an educated, resolute and consecrated ministry. The people are accustomed to good preaching. Through the pulpits, on Centennial Sunday, we expect to be able to reach a great host of people of all denominations who will be but little interested in the work of the convention itself, therefore every Centennial preacher should take, as his motto, this: The best that is in me for Christ and the church in which I am to preach.

The Men's Parade

On Monday, the 18th of October, at 7 p. m., occurs the great parade of the Brotherhood. It is confidently expected that there will be more than 5,000 men in line. The parade will be reviewed, in all probability, by Gov. Stuart of Pennsylvania, Senator Oliver of Pennsylvania, Mayor Magee of Pittsburg, and a great host of people who will be assembled to witness what promises to be a remarkable demonstration.

Some Things Relative to Railroad Rates

The railroads have made good concessions as regards rates to delegates to the convention. The Southeastern Association has made a rate of one fare and one-fifth to Ohio River points. The Central Association has made a rate of a fare and a half, while the rate from the Pacific Coast by way of St. Louis, is $86.75, or by way of Chicago $88.50 for the round trip. Every passenger agent in the entire country has been furnished with a schedule of rates and all that is necessary for anyone, expecting to attend the convention, to do is to make inquiries of their nearest agent and he will gladly give them the exact cost of car fare. Do not hesitate to ask your nearest agent relative to this as he is there to answer your questions and give you all the information you desire.

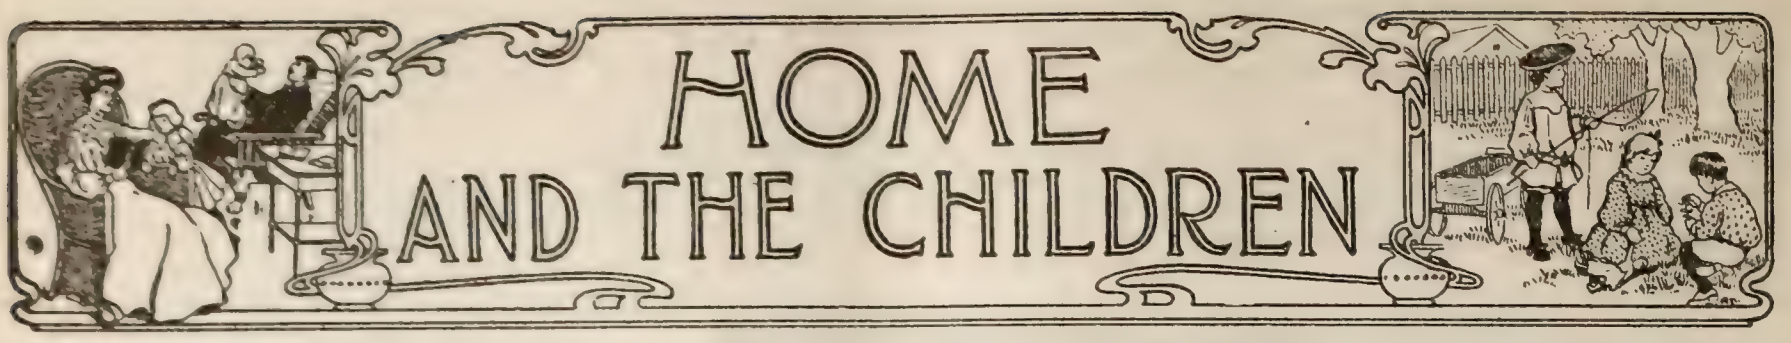
Convention Pointers

The reception tendered by Mrs. Dr. Evans, to the old students and friends of Pleasant Hill Seminary promises to be one of the interesting events of the convention.

Brother Wallace Tharp of the First Church of Allegheny, has charge of the communion service. The arrangements made will conserve all the solemnity and sacredness of this ordinance and add the crown of the century and the fellowship of the 50,000 participants.

W. Garnett Winn, of the Hazelwood Church, will be glad to receive the names of all who will act as ushers at any or all of the meetings of the convention.



Finally brethren, please register for your room as quickly as you can, remembering that this service is free of charge and please send in your Centennial dollar, thereby being assured of receiving a program and a badge.

Trusting that I may have the privilege of greeting you face to face at the convention and praying God's choicest blessings upon you and your inspirations, I am,

Sincerely yours,
John A. Jayne,
Chairman Publicity Com.

THE DAWN OF EVERY DAY

With faint, far buglings in the noble east,
I hear the herald of the struggling day,
Calling each man to victor's earnestness.
To bring in truth the dream of yesterday.
—William Nathan Moore, in the Outlook.

Miss Butterfly's Party

NANCY BYRD TURNER.

Miss Butterfly sent word one day to all the garden people,
That she would give a social tea beneath the hollyhock.
A robin read the message from a slender pine tree steeple—
A note that begged them sweetly to be there by six o'clock.
They came a-wing, they came a-foot, they came from flower and thicket;
Miss Humming Bird was present in a coat and bonnet gay,
And portly Mr. Bumblebee and cheerful Mr. Cricket,
And tiny Mrs. Ladybug in polka-dot array.
There were seats for four and twenty, and the guest of honor there
Was a gray Granddaddy-Long-Legs on a little mushroom chair.

The table was a toadstool with a spider-woven cover;
The fare was served in roseleaf plates and bluebell cups a-ring—
Sweet honey from the latest bloom, and last night's dew left over,
And a crumb of mortal cake for which an ant went pilfering.
A mocking bird within the hedge sang loudly

A Joke on Donald, Aged Seven

BY FRANCES M. FOX.

When Donald was a little fellow, he longed to be seven years old. He says he can still remember when one, sometimes two, of his five aunties would insist upon holding his hand when they were walking on the street. From the time he was three years old he wished to go alone and not be treated like a baby. Aunties are not so apt to make a little boy feel uncomfortable by too much coddling and petting. Donald was five when he tried his best to see a fairy. He intended to say: "Kind fairy, grant me one wish. Prithee, turn my five aunts into five uncles." By the time Donald was seven he didn't believe in fairies. In spite of all his watching he had never seen one and his five aunties were five aunties still. They had promised though, that when he was seven years old they would never forget and say "Our baby," when speaking of him, They agreed also to have more courage and not to shiver every time he climbed a railing or turned a summersault on the lawns. When Donald did bump his head or hurt his toe he never knew which aunt would suffer the most.

At last when Donald was seven years old and three days, the aunties rented a cottage by the seashore. This cottage was in Long Beach and the sea was the Pacific Ocean. Donald straightway wished to go swimming.

"I am seven years old," he insisted.

"You would be drowned in the surf," objected one auntie.

"He is too little to go alone," declared another.

"Let's take him in the plunge at the bathhouse until we all get used to the water." suggested auntie number three.

"Would you like that, Donald? inquired the youngest auntie. "Little boys and girls seem to have such good times in the pool."

"And we would all be in the water with you to take care of you," added the fifth auntie.

Donald pushed his cap back on his curls, put both hands in his pockets and again reminded his aunts that he was seven years old and no longer a baby.

"I want to go in the plunge like other boys," he declared. " I want to go in swimming all alone.

"But you can't swim," murmured one auntie.

Donald kicked at the sand and looked cross. The five uncles would have understood. They would have said, "Why don't you go for a swim, sonny? A boy your size ought not to be walking on the sands dressed in a white suit on Saturday afternoon when so many other boys are in the plunge."

Suddenly one of the aunties laughed and suggested something in low tones to the others. Donald heard only the last of her remarks. "It will be perfectly safe because the swimming instructor is always right there."

"We are going to let you go in the pool alone, Donald!" exclaimed the youngest auntie.

At first Donald couldn't believe in the truth of his good fortune. He went into the bathhouse with his five aunties like a boy in a dream. They bought him a ticket and he walked alone through a gate. He could hear children laughing and talking as they splashed in the big pool of warm salt water below the railing.

Five aunties watched the little fellow get a towel at one window, his bathing suit at another. The last the aunties saw of that tiny boy before they went to the gallery overlooking the pool, was when he disappeared in search of a vacant dressing room. He did look so like a baby in that big bathhouse. The aunties straightway felt that one of them should have bought a ticket that she might have gone with Donald through the gate to the dressing room; in fact they began to worry from the minute they lost sight of their darling's golden curls.

Five minutes passed; ten minutes, and Donald failed to appear. The aunties saw other small boys go down the steps into the water in the shallow end of the pool. Among the number was not a child so pretty and graceful as Donald. The aunties could scarcely wait to see that little figure paddling around in the water. Another ten minutes passed and no Donald ran down the steps into the plunge.

By that time five aunties were frightened. They remembered that the little boy wished to go swimming in the ocean. Possibly he had slipped through the gates in his bathing suit and had gone straight into the surf. Three aunties immediately went out on the sands to search for Donald, leaving two to watch the pool.

Sure enough! Away out in the surf, two men were holding between them a small boy; holding him so high the waves as they broke missed his golden head although salt spray must have dashed in his face. Three aunties straightway began calling and motioning for the child to return. The men heard nothing above the roar of the surf, and the child paid no attention to signals. At last, a girl who was going in bathing agreed to tell Donald Morrison to come ashore. She returned laughing, with the news that Donald Morrison was not the name of the boy the aunties wished to claim.

That was the beginning of a frantic search for a small golden haired child in a red bathing suit. Every one on the sands was questioned in vain. The bath-house was searched from gallery to basement. The swimming instructor comforted the terrified aunties saying positively that no such child had fallen into the pool.

At last a policeman was called. The policeman knocked at every dressing room door saying in loud tones, "Donald Morrison."

When the aunties were so frightened they could scarcely stand, when the crowds in the bath-house and on the sands were full of distressed sympathy, who should walk through the gates but little Donald with his bathing suit and towel over one arm.

At first the child tried to be dignified as became a lad of seven; but finally he broke down and sobbed bitterly in the arms of five aunties.

"I—I couldn't get into my bathing suit alone," he exclaimed. I got all undressed and then it wouldn't go on and I tried and tried and tried and wouldn't give up. Then when I looked through the keyhole and saw the policeman on the other side I thought I better get my clothes on."

"But, Donald dear," remonstrated one of the aunties, "why didn't you answer when the policeman called your name? Why didn't you unlock your door and come out?"

Donald's eyes grew round as saucers. "How did I know what he wanted me for?" was the reply.

"To be sure," murmured one of the aunties. "Now, dearest, do you still want to go swimming alone?"

The small boy laughed through the tears. "Yes, I do," he maintained, "but I don't want to get dressed alone."

Thus it happened that five aunties bought tickets that they might all go through the gate to help a small boy get into a certain red bathing suit. They did not follow him to the steps leading into the water, nor insist upon holding his hands as he descended.

When at last Donald appeared in the plunge, spectators in the gallery clapped their hands for joy, while five aunties looked too proud and happy to be allowed to sit in a group. They should really have been scattered through Southern California to brighten five corners with their smiles, instead of one.

Before the season was over Donald learned to swim as he became the only nephew in charge of five aunties who might some day be shipwrecked among the south sea islands.

"A health to our future—a sigh for our past,
We love, we remember, we hope to the last;
And for all the base lies that the almanacs hold,
While we've youth in our hearts we can never grow old!"

One Kind of Boy

SARAH H. SUTHERLAND.

He was just a little fellow,
  Yet not like the boys, not quite;
For his shoes were neatly polished,
  And his hands were clean and white;
He'd no specks upon his trousers;
  He'd no buttons off his coat;
He'd no wrinkles in his stockings;
'Twas his hair was neatly parted;
  No mere string around his throat.
He was just a little fellow,
  Like a thousand, one would say.
Yet I noted two things different
  As he stood in the doorway.
  No germs shall soil this love of ours,
  Put on, I pray, a sterilized glove
    Before your hand I take.
    Nor menace its fair charms,
  And so I do not bring you flowers—
    Their pollon often harms.

  We know the difference between Bacteria and bliss,
  So give me now, my lovely queen,
    An antiseptic kiss.

The Unconsidered Minutes

BY MARY H. KROUT.

The world is full of people—both men and women—who meant to do many things "if they only had time." Useful reading, improving study, works of charity and public benefit have all failed of accomplishment from alleged lack of time. And yet a great deal might have been accomplished by simply using the odd minutes that were thoughtlessly frittered away

Very few people, if any, can claim uninterrupted days—those being meant, of course, who are mentally and physically capable of performing worthy tasks. The man of business has a thousand calls upon his time in the course of the day, many of them trifling, but none the less stealing his time, with others which demand the closest attention and concentration. The mother in the house is occupied through most of her waking hours and often those that the rest of the world devotes to sleep.

The working woman, engaged in shop or office, or independently in a profession is also hard-pressed for leisure. Yet it has passed into an aphorism that it is only the busy people who can be relied upon to do things, and to do them promptly and well. The first requisite, after natural or acquired qualification, for the accomplishment of good work is system. Nothing worth while was ever done in haphazard fashion, "any way to get through it," or when the spirit moved one. Such methods invariably betray the erratic mind, wherein all is confusion, and which is incapable of clear, practical planning and execution—a species of mental rag-bag. A busy professional woman who never seemed hurried or flurried once said: "I never go down in town shopping—business that I detest—that I do not plan every step of my movements beforehand—to go to such and such a place first, because it saves doubling on my track, to make purchases in the same place, as much as possible, and I provide myself beforehand with a written list, so that nothing shall be overlooked and necessitate a second round for some forgotten item." All this is very simple, and within the scope of every woman. Her own time is saved, and that of the hard-worked clerks with whom she deals.

When the same woman must buy a new gown she proceeds in the same methodical manner. She first decides upon the fabric, then the color and the price which the material should cost, with suitable trimmings and findings. This is all arranged at home beforehand, and clerks are not harassed and imposed upon by being forced to pull down bolt after bolt of goods, to be rejected one after another, the purchaser becoming more and more undecided as the inspection goes on. Having thought it all out at home, she sticks to her decision, and getting a purchase ticket when she reaches the shop, she goes from department to department, selects what she knows she wants, orders it sent home, pays the sum total at the cashier's window, and the business is concluded. It may be urged that she may probably not be satisfied with such an apparently hasty method of buying; but she is. She has made her choice in advance, and the chances are that she will be far better pleased than one who changes her mind a dozen times and then goes back, still undecided, to her first choice.

This model shopper when the gown is bought plans the making with equal forethought. She selects a design which she thinks is suitable to her age and figure, and the use to which the dress is to be put—whether for street, or house wear. This decided, she consults the dressmaker and there is for that often hardly-used person no aggravating alterations which swallow up all the profits that she might expect from her labor. "If all women were like you," she was wont to remark to this model customer, "my business would be simple and easy" and yet the model patron has done only what other women might do.

The complaint of the incapables usually is "that they haven't an idea as to what they want." They have not, because they have never cultivated the art of thinking for themselves. In their self-indulgent mental inertia they have grown accustomed to putting their burdens on the shoulders of others —making others do the thinking they could easily do for themselves.

In the vexed question of dress there are a few simple principles, which, observed are of great help:

For example, the tall, thin woman should avoid perpendicular lines, and the stout woman those that are parallel, and both glaring colors and conspicuous figures. The colors chosen should depend on the age, the complexion and the use to which the gown is to be put.

Regard for all these apparently minor points is not only a means of saving time, but nerves and temper.

In a well ordered house Monday, where it is at all possible, the duties of each day of the week are all mapped out beforehand. Working to this simple program, time will be made for much reading and much pleasant recreation, both of which are accomplished with difficulty where there is no plan, no fixed time for anything, and nothing is in its place.

The woman who had the widest knowledge of the Victorian poets and those of the preceding era—Milton, Coleridge, Keats and Shelly, was the mother of eight children, all of whose clothing she made, a finished cook, a skilled nurse and widely read in general literature, supervising in a large degree the education of her family. It goes without saying that her housekeeping was not carried on by the happy-go-lucky miss rule.

Charlotte Bronte was substantially self-educated, and with the care of an exacting father, teaching in the Sunday-school, working in the parish, helping in every department of housekeeping, we are told that her French grammar was propped up before her as she made the bread. Livingstone learned Latin, in odd minutes, while working at the loom, and in his old age, Dr. Weir Mitchell, after establishing a world-wide reputation as a specialist on nervous disease, has made a literary reputation that might well be the envy of men who have devoted their entire energy to the profession of letters alone. Each and all realized the value of what to the unthinking would have been unconsidered minutes. And they are but examples of other thousands who have excelled and succeeded from the same cause.

About People

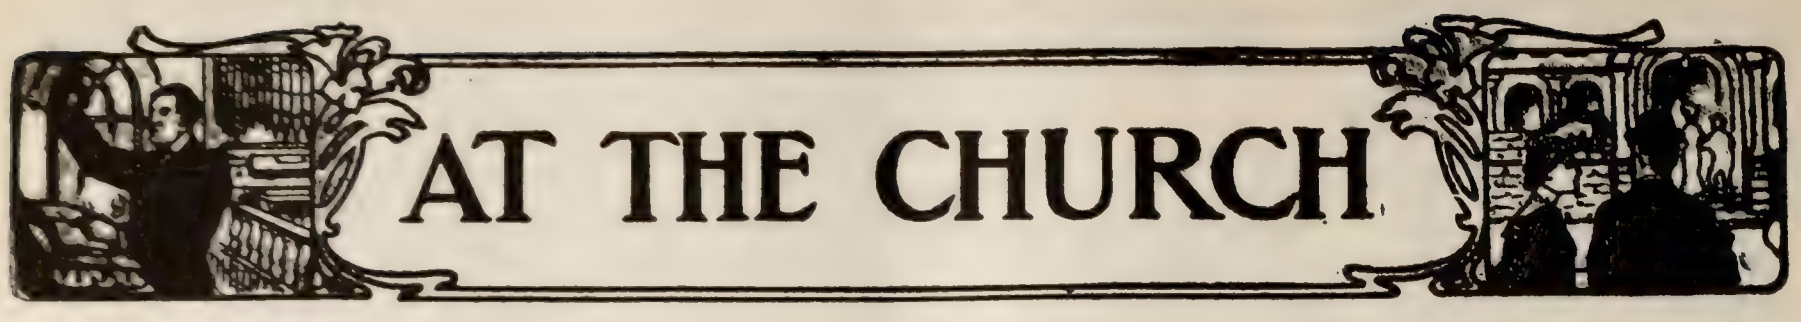
—John R. Bradley, who supplied the funds and equipment for Dr. Cook's expedition to the North Pole, is the silent partner of his brother, E. R. Bradley, who is a well known race horseman and gambler. The brothers own a big South Side family hotel in Chicago, a tailoring establishment and gambling houses at Palm Beach and other Florida resorts. J. R. Bradley has hunted in all parts of the world and his career as a hunter probably has not been surpassed by an American. He has been called "the greatest amateur big game hunter in the world." To scour the African jungles it cost him the sum of $20,000.

—John W. Gates, mining operator, has just given Rev. Foster who married him forty years ago, at St. Charles, Ill., a check for $1,000. When Mr. Gates was married in the Methodist Church in the little town to one of the girls in the Sunday-school he gave the minister a $5.00 fee and this last donation was to make up for it.

—Prince Osman Abdul Razik of Cairo, Egypt, the third son of the Khedive, is in this country. He will study agriculture at the University of Michigan.

—Henry M. Hoyt of Pennsylvania, who has been solicitor general of the United States since 1903, has been made counsellor of the state department, an office created in order that Secretary Knox might have the benefit of Mr. Hoyt's advice in state department matters.

—Nathan Strauss, the great New York philanthropist, on August 31, made an appeal to the International Medical Congress in session at Budapest to save the babies from tuberculosis and other infectious diseases that are often carried in milk. Mr. Strauss, during the last eighteen years, has cut in half the infantile death rate of New York and other cities by pasteurized milk.



—United States Senator W. P. Dillingham of Vermont, chairman of the immigration commission, has gone to the Hawaiian Islands. He will make an investigation of immigration conditions in the islands with a view to recommendation for future legislation by Congress.

—George Cabot Ward, auditor of Porto Rico, has been appointed secretary of Porto Rico, to succeed William F. Willoughby, who has been elected president of the executive council. Gov. Regis M. Post, at the request of Representative M. E. Olmsted, chairman of the committee on insular affairs, is consulting the business men and political leaders at San Juan, P. R., with regard to the advisability of amending the Foraker act at the coming session of Congress.

—United States Senator Nelson W. Aldrich of Rhode Island, chairman of the national monetary commission, which was appointed by Congress last year to improve the currency system of the United States, has sailed from New York, for Europe on the Amerika in the interest of the commission. His principal object, according to an authoritative announcement, is to complete arrangements heretofore made for information regarding the monetary system in Italy.

—The Duke of Newcastle has arrived in this country with the intention of making a two months' tour. He has heavy mining and timber interests in the Northwest and Canada. The Duke declared the British woman's-suffrage movement a foolish one.

—Mrs. Theodore Roosevelt and her children are in France. They have been making a tour of the province of Touraine.

PLOT AND RESCUE.*

One of the inherited rights which came to Saul of Tarsus through his birth in a free city or of free parents was that of Roman citizenship. It conferred special favors on a man, especially, the right of immunity from all legal penalties, unless convicted by due process of law, and the right of personal appeal to the emperor if accused of serious crime. Paul did not fail to appreciate this honor, but he rarely used it for his own advantage. Twice, however, he felt that the cause he represented warranted him in claiming his Roman privileges, once when he was about to be scourged in the castle of Antonia at Jerusalem, and once when the Roman governor, Festus, at Caesarea, was about to remand him to prison for further and needless confinement.

The Roman Citizen.

There is something exciting about that scene in the tower. Paul had just been rescued from the howling mob of Jews who sought his life. As he was taken into the castle the commandant ordered him to be scourged, on the theory that only thus would the prisoner tell the truth. Having given this order, he left his subordinates to execute it, and went his way.

But as they were binding Paul to the pillar of scourging, with bared back and wrists aching with the severity of the thongs, Paul said quietly to the captain in command, "Is it lawful for you to scourge a Roman citizen who has been convicted of no crime?" The centurion started up, alarmed by the question, for it was a high offense to mistreat a Roman citizen. Such men bore the nearest approach to a title of nobility in the empire. "Are you a Roman?" said he, looking perhaps with some astonishment at Paul's ordinary garments. "I, too, am a Roman citizen, but I purchased my franchise with a great sum." "Not so with me," said Paul, "for I was free born." It was a claim that no man would have dared to make had it not been true, for the penalties for perjury in this regard were as heavy as those for the unjust treatment of a free citizen. He therefore went to report at once to the commandant, and this man, learning the facts, hastened to countermand his orders, and to direct that Paul be treated with courtesy, though still a prisoner.

The Council Chambers.

The next scene was before the sanhedrin, the ruling body of seventy, before which Jesus and Stephen had already appeared. They claimed the right of judging Paul, and while the Roman officers kept him in their charge, they were willing to grant the Jews such favors as they could. More than this, they hoped that the hearing would throw light on the evident hatred of the Jews toward Paul, and thus aid in securing the ends of justice. So the apostle was brought down from the tower to the hall of justice, where the council was accustomed to sit. Here, when charges were preferred against him, Paul began his defense of the new career on which he entered as a Christian, by saying, "I have lived before God with perfect conscience until this day." Paul might well have made that claim for his whole life, no doubt, but it was of his recent career in the service of Christ that he spoke. Angered by such words from a man he deemed an apostate from the faith of Israel, the high priest, Hanan or Annas, ordered an officer to strike Paul across the face. On a similar occasion Jesus had said to the priest, "If I have done evil, tell me what it is. But if not, why do you order me to be struck?" But Paul had all the fire and passion of resentment in his soul. It was not possible for him as yet to rise to that high plane of forgiveness on which the Master lived. In stinging words he denounced the priest for his command, and then when they reminded him that it was the highest magistrate whom he was addressing, he burned his rebuke still deeper by saying, in half ironical apology, "I had no idea it was the high priest who could give such an order. One must respect the office of a ruler, even as the scripture says."

Pharisees and Sadducees.

In some manner Paul was already aware that the body before which he stood was sharply divided in its sentiments on many questions, because part were Pharisees and part Sadducees. Into this breach he determined to drive whatever weapon he could find, and the most obvious point of conflict between the two factions was the question of the resurrection. It was not, of course, the Jewish doctrine of physical resurrection with which Paul was in the least concerned. It was the far more impressive truth of the Resurrection of Jesus to the defence of which he was set. But the word was enough to start the ancient feud between the two parties, and for the time the Pharisees found themselves in the unhappy predicament of having to champion the cause of the Apostle whom on every other ground they hated. The clamor grew fiercer, and each side tried to get Paul in its possession, the one for defence, and the other for hostile outrage. The Roman captain said that no good could come of such a scene, and that no light was to be thrown on the prisoner's life and purposes by its continuance. So Paul was taken back to the castle, and the Jewish partisans were left to their war of words.

The Vow of Murder.

His fanatical enemies now said that they were making no headway against him. It was useless to bring acusations against him before a Roman court, because they had no complaint that would stand the test of scrutiny. To bring him again before their own council was to invite a repetition of their recent experience in which Paul had taken advantage of their dissensions to defeat their purpose. There was but one thing to do if they would rid themselves of such a man. Assassination offered the fairest hope of success. They could not reach their enemy in the castle. To wait till he was taken to the provincial Roman capitol at Caesarea was to miss their chance. Somewhere on the streets of Jerusalem the attempt must be made. So they petitioned the Roman official to bring Paul again before the council for further hearing, and agreed, with a pact that bound forty of them to the effort, that nothing should prevent their success. They would not eat or drink till the business was finished, and Paul was dead.

Paul's Nephew.

Somewhere in the city, however, there lived a sister of the apostle. Perhaps it was at her home that he had lived during the years of his school life. It is probable that Paul's Christian career had separated him from the good will of his family. This was one of the sacrifices he made for the cross. Yet they had no mind to see him assassinated, however little they shared his views. In some manner that family had learned of the plot, and the son was sent with the sinister tidings to Paul. In this manner his life was saved. For when Paul turned his nephew over to the captain of the tower guard, it was but the work of a few hours to remove a state prisoner, threatened with death, from the perilous atmosphere of so fanatical a city. The horsemen of Rome threw themselves like a wall of fire about the minister of Jesus Christ, and he was taken by night to Antipatrio, a town about forty-two miles northwest of Jerusalem, and from there to Caesarea. The two centurions sent in command of this little company bore the message of Claudius Lysias, the captain, to the governor, Felix, and soon the prison doors of the Roman guardhouse closed for more than two years behind the apostle.

The Sin Argument

The argument is always in order, either in polite or in impolite society, as to whether sin is original or unoriginal, whether it is purely a matter of the individual or of the environment, whether it is hereditary or acquired, whether it is a question of seed or soil, whether it is germ or germane.

It would be a pity if the question were ever settled. So long as it is in a mooted state, fond mothers are relieved of the necessity of being confronted by inexorable science at awkward emergencies. When the black sheep of the family comes along, it is now a simple matter to place all the blame on environment, associations, or at least the father's side by the house, while still clinging to the family tree and hanging all the white sheep tenderly thereon.

Then, to speak subjectively, if the individuals themselves are what the world calls good, they may now modestly accredit it to their own noble struggles with an untoward environment, while if they are what the world calls bad it is very comforting to blame it on some rascally and paretic ancestor who flourished during the period of the Crusades.

Prayer Meeting

By Silas Jones

THE DEPARTED LABORERS.

Topic, Sept. 29. Jno. 4:37, 38; Rev. 14:13.

Our attitude toward departed friends and co-workers discloses the quality of our lives. We can be selfish in grief as easily as in joy. The woman who neglects her children because her husband is dead or her husband because a child is gone, is not honoring the dead; she is showing that she does not understand her obligations. The man who becomes dissipated on account of the loss of his wife reveals the fact that he does not know what life means. He is thinking of his own comfort of body and mind rather than of his duty as a member of society. Then, there is the pessimist who knows of no virtue except that of the dead. He increases the burdens of the living by his stupidity and meanness which blind his eyes to the virtue before him. The very men he criticises when they are living he praises when they are dead. It would probably do no good; but I think we ought to tell the men and the women who never see any good in the workers at their side that they are basely and meanly selfish and that their words of praise for the dead are disgusting to all sane people.

True Apostolic Succession

There is a sort of apostolic succession which to many of us is absurd. We think of the primitive man's magic when we hear men talk about divine power being handed down through an unbroken line of popes or bishops. We cannot believe that the grace of God is bottled up in any such fashion as some suppose. To justify the ways of God to men it becomes necessary to denounce the attempt to make it appear that God can be found only in ways approached by church councils. But there is an apostolic succession in which every disciple of the Lord believes, and that is a succession of faith and good works. This generation has faith because former generations believed in God. The first disciples of the Lord awakened faith in those to whom they carried the message of life. Those who heard the apostles themselves became the bearers of the light of the gospel, and so the grace and truth which were in Christ have been declared unto us. We do not care a fig whether the bearers of life to us have or have not the stamp of ecclesiastical approval. Paul, Chrysostom, Augustine, Luther, Wesley, and Campbell are living forces in the church today because they put their own lives into the life of the church. We do not bother about their ordination. They are facts of spiritual history which cannot be ignored. We are their debtors. They rest from their labors, but their works remain and will remain to the end of time. But for them and a great company of disciples unknown to fame, some of them being our own pioneers and the builders of the congregations in which we received our spiritual training, we should be living in ignorance of God's almighty love.

The Memory of the Just

What ought the memory of the just to mean to us? Lincoln has told us in his Gettysburg speech what the memory of patriotic soldiers ought to mean to a nation. "It is for us, the living, rather, to be dedicated here to the unfinished work which they who fought here have thus far so nobly advanced. It is rather for us to be here dedicated to the great task remaining before us—that from these honored dead we take increased devotion to that cause for which they gave the last full measure of devotion; that we here highly resolve that these dead shall not have died in vain; that this nation, under God, shall have a new birth of freedom; and that government of the people, by the people, for the people, shall not perish from the earth." It was a message of hope which the President gave to the nation that was struggling for its life. It was a call to service. It is not the monument we erect over our dead nor the eloquence of the eulogy pronounced over them that shows the greatness of their services to the church, the state, and the home. The monument and the eulogy may express nothing more than our cheap pride. We declare our appreciation of the heroism of departed laborers by the earnestness and devotion with which we undertake the task which their labors have put before us. If our fathers lived well, they have left for us important work which we must do or prove ourselves traitors. In this centennial year our study of the past will be a farce if it does not help us to find our present duty and increase our willingness to do it.

Christian Endeavor Lesson

By W. D. Endres

TOPIC OCTOBER 3

Life Lessons for Me from the Book of Ephesians. Eph. 4:1-6; 25-32.

(Consecration Meeting.)

The Christian ideal for the making of a life is vital in its grip and direct in its bearing on the practical side. It gives the angle of approach to all of our duties and activities. Hence Paul's admonition that we "walk worthily of the calling." To speak literally and practically, it is to commit our lives to the cause of righteousness—right doing. This is the highest aim and its goal is in God. This was Jesus' aim and his life is the faultless example. Jesus, therefore, could say that "no man cometh to the Father, but by me." His way is to do right and there can be no other. Every cherished thought, every deed done, every task undertaken and every ambition entertained must be valued by the purpose to do right. According as they meet the requirement, or fail to do so, they are to be accepted or rejected. In short, this standard marks the boundary line of our activities. He who deliberately goes outside, for any reason whatsoever, is untrue to the name Christian, and unworthy of the calling.

But this goodness—this purpose to do right—must be both genuine and aggressive. No perfunctory service here. Agonized sorrow for wrongs done, punctual attendance upon the public services, giving of our means to the Lord's work, singing his praise with loud acclaim, and bowing humbly before Him in prayer are all important unless goodness characterize our thoughts, our words and our deeds. But let us also remember that real goodness is strong and not weak, active and not passive. It will turn the other cheek, but it will overturn the money changers and drive out the thieves as well. Goodness seeks to woo and win men to its cause, but it does not hesitate to tell the corrupt and the self-satisfied that they are fools and hypocrites. It is sentimental and humble, but it is also heroic and ambitious. It knows no limits save that of righteousness; its spirit is the spirit of conquest, and it is satisfied only when it has conquered all.

The practical bearing of such a regulative principle in our own lives is at once apparent. There is not a moment in all our conscious existence when we are free from its restraining power and its inspiring influence. It leads us, of course, to our places of worship, but it goes with us also to our daily tasks in the home and in the shop, in the school room and the counting house, in the sick room and the law court. It follows us into places of amusement and recreation, ever whispering to us, through our conscience, admonitions of freedom and restraint. Yes, it lingers with us still when we retire to our chambers after the toils and the duties of the day are over, to speak its approval of deeds well done or frown a judgment upon a day misspent. And finally it waits to greet us at the waking hour of the morning to arm us and direct us for the duties of another day. Such is our calling. Are we worthy?

Such a life calls for heroism but not for display, and none short of real heroes have sufficient courage to live at such a moral altitude. Business these days is highly organized and young men and women by the thousands are holding positions of trust and responsibility. In many instances their salary is low—far too low—and opportunities for taking that which by law does not belong to them are abundant. And with strong desires to join their wealthy and more fortunate companions the temptation becomes intense. No moral coward will play the heroic part in such a tragic situation. Constantly every day, week after week, these temptations come, but just as many times and just as constantly this Christian ideal calls upon us to resist. Of this struggle the world does not know. For it there is neither bugle call nor battle cry. There is no host to join in combat. Such a life is not spectacular, but who will deny that it is profound? And he who lives such a life must have the elements of meekness and lowliness, forbearance, long suffering, and love. Of such is the body of Christ, of such is the Kingdom of Heaven

Furness Abbey

BY KATHARINE LEE BATES.

The treasure of the valley, red and tall
They rise, those sandstone fragments, overgrown
With fern and ivy and sweet blossom sown
By pitying winds. From broken arch and wall
The harebell glistens; nightshade thickets pall
Bruised effigy and sunken altar-stone.
What man rejected, Nature makes her own;
Her comfort creeps where cross and pillar fall.

Still sacred, though in lieu of white procession
Of chanting monks, the mossy shafts look down
On children's blithe-voiced play; though robins nest
In sculptured angel-wing and carven crown;
Perchance more sacred, for the heart's confession
Lies bare to Him, the heart's eternal Quest.

THE FINDING OF CAMILLA

CHAPTER XIX (Continued)

Pierre Falls Sick.

"I suppose I'll have to," she acknowledged reluctantly. "But," as she accompanied the doctor downstairs, "I'd a deal rather they'd gone further afore troubling me. It was all my lodger as made me take him in."

"What! you have another lodger?" said the doctor. "Come, 'The Robin's Nest' is looking up."

"It never rains but it pours," replied Mrs. Jones. "Not that I cares to have such lodgers as them," with a backward jerk of her head towards the room they had just left. "Now the front parlor gent is different altogether. A real fine gentleman and no mistake. He comes riding by yesterday afternoon with his horse so dead beat that he asks for a night's rest for it and himself. This morning he says he'll be glad to take his rooms on for a week or perhaps longer, if agreeable to me, as the air suits him wonderful. There he be, sir, at the garden gate.

As the doctor went down the path the lodger lounged carelessly towards him.

"I trust your patient is not dangerously ill, doctor?" he said, with a slight bow.

"Not more than a sharp touch of rheumatic fever will render him," returned Dr. Morgan, with a steady glance at his questioner.

"He seems very old," said Rogen Densham carelessly.

"Yes, his hair and beard are very white," was the doctor's reply. But as he drove away his mind pondered over what he had seen and heard of the strange patient he had just visited.

"A young man masquerading as an old one under a white wig and a false beard! For what reason, I wonder? And that exquisite-looking child keeping up the farce by calling him her grandfather. I never had such a case before. And what has that other lodger got to do with them? Something, or he wouldn't be so anxious to take up his abode for a week in 'The Robin's Nest,' even if the air does agree with him."

CHAPTER XX.

Camilla Makes Plans.

Camilla found she had so many duties awaiting her that she hadn't time to sit down and fret. Her own frugal breakfast of bread and milk had to be eaten, and then the dogs and Taras had to have a loaf divided amongst them, as she had seen Pierre do. Next she went down to the stable and paid Chicot a visit, and fed him with some of the hay that Mr. Jones had smuggled into the stable unknown to his wife.

Then with a heavy heart she returned to the sick room, and, quietly shutting the door, unlocked the little box in which she knew Pierre carried the purse—the reserve fund upon which he had lately had to draw.

She stared astonished at the few coins left in it. She was too inexperienced to know quite their true value, but their fewness alone led her to fear that funds were at a low ebb with them. And then came the horrified thought—where were they to get more? The breadwinner was likely to remain on that bed for longer than she cared to think, and in the meanwhile what were they to do? And, oh! dreadful thought! how was the doctor to be paid?

Camilla hid her face in her hands whilst the hot tears trickled down her cheeks. Her trusted friend was suddenly stricken down, and where could she look for protection and assistance to find those grandparents whom Pierre still hoped to discover?

Poor little Camilla! She was feeling very wretched and miserable. Presently she felt a warm tongue touch her hands, and lifting her head found Jacques beside her, his mournful eyes resting pathetically upon her.

No, no, she was not utterly friendless, not utterly alone, with such a faithful protector beside her. She flung her arms round his neck with a convulsive squeeze. "Oh! Jacques, Jacques dear, what shall we do?" she whispered tearfully.

The poodle gave a little cry and looked at her with his heart in his eyes. Do? He was longing to do everything. To comfort her, to protect her, to shield her from all harm, to do exactly what he knew his master would have him do to the little English stranger who had crept into their two faithful hearts from the very day they had known her.

They clung to each other, the dog and the child, until jealous Taras could bear it no longer. He sprang from the bed right on to her shoulder, and, clasping her tight round the neck, kissed her repeatedly with loud smacking sounds. Soon gentle Bebe and Jules left their mournful attitudes beside their master, and creeping softly up came and begged prettily by her side.

Camilla looked from one to the other. Her dear little trusting friends! And they had no one now but her to look after them, to tend them, and to feed them. The thought acted like a tonic on the child. She must be the breadwinner now, with these willing friends to help her.

With this thought she sprang to her feet. They had put new energy into her, the dear, dear dogs, and little Taras, who had wound himself round her heart in spite of all his naughty mischievous ways.

"I'll do it!" exclaimed Camilla aloud. "Pierre will understand when he is well that it could not be helpel. How else can we all live?"

And then with her arms round Jacques, and Taras on her shoulder, and Jules and Bebe resting their heads against her knee, she made known to them her thoughts.

"You must all be very, very good, and do just what I tell you to, won't you?" she pleaded first.

Jacques gave a little gurgle of assent, whilst Taras kissed her cheek, and Jules and Bebe sat up and begged again, as if praying to be told more of this wonderful inspiration.

"It is just this," said little Camilla, in an excited under-tone. "We will do the performances all the same. You will go through your tricks just as if your master were present. All the easy tunes I have learnt I will play for you to dance to, and oh! you will do your parts well, won't you?"

Again Jacques gurgled a ready assent. Many a time had Pierre said that the dog was almost human. Jacques would help her, she knew he would. The others might grow restive under her authority, Taras particularly so, but Jacques would be her mainstay, and administer the punishment that each culprit would deserve if he should fall from his allegiance.

At that moment Camilla heard Mrs. Jones' shrill voice at the foot of the stairs—

"Little gel, little gel!"

For a minute she could scarcely believe it was she herself that was being called. But as the voice grew sharper and louder, she hastily slipped the few coins back into the purse, and, throwing it into the box, ran to the door and opened it.

The landlady's face looked red and angry at the foot of the stairs.

"It's fine doings if I'm to be kept runnin' back'ards and for'ards for a chit of a child like you. See, here's the medicine," holding it out at arm's length. "Now, don't you go and give it him all at once," as Camilla ran down the stairs to take it. "As far as that line, see, and mind you pour it carefully so's not to drop a drop. Money's to be paid for that, you know, so don't you go wasting it. Here's a cup to pour it into."

Camilla took the bottle and cup held out to her with a timid "Thank you." Then turned to go back to the sick room.

Mrs. Jones looked after her. Something in the plaintive little face and timid voice made her call out—

"Do you want me to 'elp you to give it?"

But Camilla shrank from the idea. Pierre's wig and beard might come awry in the landlady's firm grasp, and then where would they be?"

"I think I can manage quite well, thank you," she said softly. "I won't trouble you."

"Well, if you can't, there's the kitchen quite 'andy. It'll stretch them legs of yours a bit to come down and tell," was Mrs. Jones' reply.

Camilla ran up the remaining steps, and with an old-fashioned air measured out the medicine as far as the line indicated on the bottle. It took her back to the days, not so very long ago, when she used to measure out her father's medicine in a like manner. The tears came into her eyes at the thought, but she forced them back, and applied herself to raising Pierre.

But the unconscious Frenchman was too heavy a patient to be lifted by hands so small and fragile. He lay like a log, and Camilla bent over him in dismay, murmuring softly—

"Pierre, Pierre, wake up, Pierre."

But Pierre remained motionless; only a babble of French words broke from his lips.

Bravely Camilla made another attempt, but all to no purpose, and the tears stood in her eyes.

"Jacques!" she said imploringly, as if begging the dog's assistance.

But Jacques' bristles were beginning to rise, and his ears were cocked and his eyes never budged from the door. He gave a low growl and at that moment a slight knock was heard at the door.

Jacques gave a bound forward but Camilla silenced him back. She went to the door and opened it. The downstair lodger—a glimpse of whom she had had when she had given Chicot his morning meal—was standing there.

"I came to offer my services to you" he began. "Is there anything I can do to help you with your—your grandfather, isn't it?"

"Yes, my grandfather," said Camilla, her face lighting up for a minute, and then falling suddenly as she remembered Pierre's disguise.

"Thank you," she continued, her own natural dignity returning to her. "If you wouldn't mind waiting there just one minute, I'll be glad of your help."

Such an old-fashioned air ! And yet showing some inward disturbance, as Roger Densham could not but plainly see.

She closed the door with a little excusing smile at her apparent rudeness, and hurrying to the bedside pulled the Frenchman's wig straight, then nervously re-arranged the false beard, and went to the door, opening it wide for him to enter.

He was in the room and standing by the bed, but he seemed to have forgotten what he had come for. There lay the man whom last he had seen struggling for his life in the surf off the Goodwin Sands. But why had he so transformed himself ? And why had he not given up the child to her relatives ? The disguise was perfect. Even to himself, Roger Densham had to acknowledge that he would never have recognized the sturdy young Frenchman in this white-haired man unless the Italian had put the idea into his head.

But Pierre in health and strength had a more decrepit appearance than had the Pierre lying there. The actor's spirit was missing, so also was the actor's secret of placing wrinkles where none were now to be seen.

This, of course, Camilla was too young to notice. But it had not escaped the sharp eyes of the doctor, nor did it now escape the still sharper eyes of Roger Densham. He still stood staring at the sick man, and was recalled to a sense of where he was by hearing Camilla say softly—

"Won't you help me to give him the medicine ?"

He started then, and awkwardly held out his hand for the cup which Camilla was holding.

But the child shook her head. "I can't lift him," she said. "If you'll raise his head, I'll hold the cup. But do it gently, please, he—he doesn't like his hair touched."

Passing his arm under the Frenchman's shoulders, Mr. Densham raised him, and Camilla's little hands held the cup. When the medicine was swallowed he was gently laid down again.

"I can't thank you enough," said Camilla looking up into his face, and then her eyes dropped, for he was looking at her with such an intent gaze that it perplexed her.

What Roger Densham saw in the child, which he had recognized to be the one he had seen last on board The Fair Nancy, was a strangely mingled likeness to both her dead parents. And whilst his eyes yearned to linger on the likeness to the woman he had loved, he found, himself at the same time hating the resemblance to the man who had married her.

Jacques came to the rescue of both. Not liking this unusual silence, he advanced to sniff at the legs of the stranger, giving a low growl the while. It roused Roger Densham very effectually.

"You have a faithful protector, I see," he said, retreating towards the door.

"Yes, Jacques loves me, and I love him," said Camilla simply.

"I'll come whenever you want me," went on Mr. Densham. "My room is down below, and I shall perform any service for you far more willingly than will our worthy landlady."

His eyes rested on her with a pleasanter look than before. Perhaps at that moment the likeness to her mother was more vivid. Be that as it may, before he had smiled himself out of the room, Camilla had begun to like him.

CHAPTER XXI.

Camilla Gives a Performance.

Pierre seemed easier the next morning. But it was clear to the doctor, when he paid his visit, that the child could not look after the Frenchman single-handed. To Camilla's infinite dismay, he proposed to send a nurse to assist her.

"My grandfather would rather have me—much, much rather," she said, with the tears standing in her eyes.

"That's all nonsense," was the doctor's reply. "You are too young, and too frail, and too—Why, my dear child, the very moving him into a more comfortable position is more than a girl twice your age could do. No, a nurse must come."

Camilla felt reduced to the verge of despair. She wrung her hands, and turned a look of such distress upon the doctor that he was startled.

Just then the door opened gently, and Mr. Densham's head looked in.—

"How is your patient, doctor ?" he asked blandly.

"Better," returned the doctor, somewhat curtly. Then, seeing the visitor's eyes stray to Camilla's tear-stained cheeks, he said more genially, "The fact is he wants more capable nursing than this child can give him, and I propose to send a woman to assist her in work; but she doesn't like the idea apparently, and——Well, I don't quite know what to do."

Camilla's large grey eyes roamed from one to the other with a piteous entreaty.

"Grandfather wouldn't like it. He trusts me, and I know all his wishes."

The two men half smiled, but Camilla was too much in earnest to observe it.

"He will be quite content with my nursing. And I will do it all, oh ! so carefully."

"With me to help you," supplemented Roger Densham quietly.

"You !" ejaculated the doctor.

"If you will give your permission," replied Mr. Densham. "This little lady and I made friends yesterday over giving your patient his first dose of medicine. I've nursed sick men before now, doctor, when in my travels we've been miles away from any medical help. You trust me with your patient, and I'll vouch for it that this little lady will give her consent right willingly."

He moved in front of Camilla, and held out both hands towards her. There was a softened look on his face, for he had caught the child's look fastened on him as he was speaking, and it had reminded him of her mother.

With a feeling she was too childlike to analyse, she put her hands into both his with a confiding movement. "You and I will nurse him together," she said softly.

Dr. Morgan shrugged his shoulders. "When you are tired of it, tell me," he said dryly, "and I will provide a substitute."

He loked full, as he spoke, into Roger Densham's eyes, as if seeking to fathom his purpose, but Mr. Densham's eyes were inscrutable.

Mrs. Jones became kinder and more genial in her manner towards Camilla when she found that her gentleman lodger was disposed to throw over the little girl the mantle of his protection.

"You may thank your stars that he has taken a fancy to your old, white-haired grandfather," she said. "I dessay, too, he will settle some of the bills if you should happen to run short of money."

But at this Camilla flushed all over. She was grateful to Mr. Densham, and much inclined to like him, but the expenses that Pierre and she and the troupe incurred must be paid for by themselves. And this thought brought her to the plan she had made yesterday. She and the troupe must hold a performance, and why should they not start it that very afternoon ?

There was not much to be done for Pierre just now. She could easily steal an hour or two from the sick room, for it would take her that time to go and come from Charnford and give the performance, which would necessarily be a short one, since she could not lengthen it out as Pierre always did.

She made her preparations accordingly, got all the information she required respecting Charnford from Mr. Jones in the garden; so that when the afternoon came and the iced milk and medicine had been given to Pierre with her new friend's assistance, she was able to turn her attention to getting the troupe ready.

But, to her dismay, Taras proved obstinate. He was beginning to enjoy his lazy life, and had made up his mind that he would not leave his master.

There he sat high on the pillow, apparently oblivious of all Camilla's coaxings. He liked his admiral's uniform, and made no objection to being dressed in it, but further than that he would not go. He grimaced at Camilla when she tried to lift him off the pillow, and dodged her all over the bed till he managed to tire her out.

"Jacques, oh ! Jacques, we can't manage the performance without Taras, can we ?" she said, turning to the poodle in despair.

Jacques winked his faithful brown eyes at her as much as to say, "Wait a bit and you'll see something."

Then, when the monkey was off guard, and had strayed down to the foot of the bed, the poodle leapt upon him, and seizing the baggy part of his admiral's uniform between his teeth bore the monkey triumphantly down the stairs. Camilla followed with Bebe and Jules. Chicot was untied and be-ribboned, and the little party prepared to set off.

Suddenly Mr. Densham's sitting-room window was thrown open, and his voice called out—

"Whither away, may I ask ?"

"We are going to give a performance at Charnford," replied Camilla, feeling very small and very lonely and rather frightened now that she was about to start.

Mr. Densham looked blankly at her. Then he closed the window sharply, and coming out into the garden announced his intention of accompanying them.

Camilla looked up at him with a speaking face of gratitude. "Are you sure you can spare the time ?" she asked timidly.

"I am yours to command," he replied, bending a smile upon her.

"What makes you want to give a performance when your grandfather is not by to protect you ?" he inquired when they had started, relieving her at the same time of the violin which she had placed upon her lap in the carriage.

Camilla hung her head. She did not care to let him know how poor they were.

"Do you think he would care for you to go all that way without him ?" he persisted. Camilla's affection for the Frenchman puzzled him.

She shook her head. "He wouldn't like it," she murmured. "He never liked me to go out alone. But—but I can't help it just now."

He walked along beside the carriage in silence for awhile. Then said quietly, "Funds low ?"

The child flushed painfully, but said nothing. Only letting Chicot know that she required him to go faster.

The goat started along briskly, Bebe and Jules pranced on ahead, Taras, recovered from his fit of sulkiness, nestled himself under Camilla's cloak, Roger Densham walked steadily by the side of the carriage with the Frenchman's violin case slung across his shoulder, and Jacques brought up the rear.

(To be continued.)

Church Life

Have you arranged for your lodging at Pittsburg?

The Chairman of the Publicity Committee begins his bulletin this week thus, "This is our last message save two." Did you realize the great convention is so near?

Subscribers to the Christian Century should not fail to send us their new house numbers that we may be sure they are receiving their paper each week. Do it now. A postal card is sufficient.

Read Secretary Muckley's appeal to the churches, and remember this is Church Extension month. Surely you cannot go to Pittsburg with a good conscience unless the offering from your church has been sent to Mr. Muckley.

For the accommodation of our readers, who wish to spend Sunday in Chicago, en route to Pittsburg, we are publishing in this issue of The Christian Century a list of the Chicago churches of the Disciples, their pastors, and the location of the church. Any of the churches will be glad to welcome you at their services. If you are in Chicago Saturday or Monday, The Christian Century editors will be pleased to have you call at their office in the United Religous Press building.

We have not moved, but our number has been changed. It is the inconvenience associated with the improvement that is being made in the street numbering system of Chicago. This new system provides for one hundred numbers to the square. This will be of great advantage in reckoning distances. We will submit to the pain for the sake of the progress. But send your communicants to the new number, 700 East Fortieth street, and you will lessen the pain.

B. S. Ferrall, Jefferson Street Church, Buffalo, is back at work after his vacation.

The Virginia State convention will be held at Richmond, September 20 to 23.

Casper Carrigues, of East St. Louis, spent his vacation visiting at Francesville, Ind., where he preached three Sundays while there.

"We are looking forward, not backward; upward, not downward," is the motto of the aggressive Sunday-school at Bonham, Texas.

P. A. Cave supplied at Marshall Street Church, Richmond, Va., during the month of August.

D. S. Henkel began a meeting with the Fairmonth St. Church, Richmond, Va., the last Sunday in August.

The new building at Monte Vista, Colo., where M. M. Nelson is pastor, is to be dedicated September 19.

"Do the best you can, where you are, with what you have, for Jesus, today," is the motto kept before the Second Church, Warren, Ohio.

W. C. Chapman, for nine years pastor of the church at Sheldon, Ill., has accepted a call to North Baltimore, Ohio, where he will begin work about the first of November.

J. T. T. Hundley held a meeting at Jerusalem, Va., in August. There were twenty additions to the church. W. J. Hall is the faithful pastor.

Louis H. Stine, of Gulfport, Miss., began a meeting with the church at Utica, Miss., September 12. Mr. Stine has made an attractive announcement of these services.

J. Crockett Mullins, who for about a year preached for the Oak Park Church, Chicago, has moved from Mitchell to Orleans, Ind., where he becomes pastor.

G. F. Bradford, Van Alstyne, Texas, has accepted a call to the church at Meridian, Miss., where he begins work the first of October.

Leslie Wolfe reports the work at Manila, Philippine Islands, showing progress. During the first half of July there were fifteen baptisms in his part of the field.

Garabed Kevorkian reports ten baptisms in Asia Minor. He is visiting among the churches and they are much cheered by his presence.

A new church building will be dedicated by the congregation at Brookings, S. D., September 26. There will be a union service of all the churches on that day.

A packed house, largely from the miners' union, attended the service of the Christian Church at Windsor, Mo., on Labor Day, when the pastor, James A. Challener, gave a special sermon to working men.

Round up your Extension Offering on Sunday, September 26, and remit on Monday, September 27, to G. W. Muckley, Corresponding Secretary, 500 Water Works Bldg., Kansas City, Mo.

H. H. Harmon, pastor of the First Church, Lincoln, Nebraska, has been chosen president of the State Christian Educational Association for the next year. This means aggressive work on the part of the organization.

Andrew Scott, who has served the Second Church at Danville, Ill., for the past five years, has been chosen by the Board of the Sixth District to serve as District evangelist. He began this work the first of September.

The church at Anthony, Kansas, is in need of a preacher. J. A. Shoptaugh has just gone from this church to Salida, Colo. The former church is beginning the erection of a new building.

We regret to announce that President Hill M. Bell, of Drake University, has been taken with an acute attack of appendicitis, from which he suffered terribly. It is hoped that an operation will not be necessary.

The First Church, Omaha, joins the rank of honor churches by sending its pastor, J. M. Kersey, to Centennial Convention. Nebraska churches are enterprising and far sighted.

The church at Cameron, W. Va., W. E. Pierce, minister, enters the Living-link class. The faithful preacher has worked hard to this end and the church has done nobly. They have won in spite of a church debt.

A number of Ladies' Aid Societies have sent gifts to fit up the Wharton Memorial Home for the children of missionaries at Hiram, O., A. R. Teachout, Cleveland, O., has given $100 for this special purpose.

The heart of Grant W. Speer, pastor of the Central Church, Toledo, Ohio, is filled with hope as he looks forward to the work of the year. A beautiful new organ is to be installed September 26. To this purpose Mr. Carnegie makes a generous donation.

Mrs. Elizabeth Coates Cockrill, for many years a faithful member of the church at Platte City, Mo., entered itno the larger life beyond, September 4. The funeral service was conducted by Harry E. Tucker, pastor of the church at Platte City.

Allen T. Shaw, pastor at Spencer, Ind., has been critically ill of typhoid fever, but is convalescing and will soon take up his regular duties again. The church has made every provision for his comfort of mind and body.

Virginia churches are succeeding in getting B. A. Abbott into the Old Dominion once in a while. He has atended two of their conventions this year, and will hold a meeting at Unionville late in September, and one at Allen-Avenue, Richmond, in November.

John Johnson, Nantungchow, China, reports six baptisms. Quite a number gathered to see them baptized. He is looking for a large ingathering in the near future. It will be remembered that this is our new station in China.

The aim of the Sunday-school of the First Church, Warren, Ohio, for Declaration Day is 700 present. Automobiles will be used to bring the old people to the service. The Bible classes will attend the evening service in a body.

J. E. Lynn, pastor of the First Church, Warren, Ohio, is preaching some centennial sermons. His sermon on a recent Sunday evening was, "Thomas Campbell and Christian Union." The morning subject: "Some Centennial Ideals Not Yet Realized."

C. A. Exley, who has been studying at the University of Chicago for the past five years, is spending his vacation with his parents at Lincoln, Nebraska. Mr. Exley is a "Fellow" at the University and has made a fine record as a student.

J. H. Wood and his faithful congregation at Shelbina, Mo., are preparing to enter at once upon the task of erecting a fine new building. The church has recently held a meeting under the leadership of John L. Brandt, of St. Louis.

G. F. Assiter has resigned at Sheridan, Ind., and accepted a call to work in Canada, where he goes at the urgent solicitation of the Secretary of the Canada Missionary society. Mr. Assiter was born in England, and will doubtless feel quite at home on John Bull soil again.

The Church Extension Offerings are coming in and showing splendid gains. More churches are co-operating this year, and the prospects are now that we will have a $40,000 gain over last year if the churches will report promptly. Remember the Centennial motto is "LET US MAKE IT UNANIMOUS THIS YEAR."

It is very important that the Church Extension Offerings be sent promptly to G. W. Muckley, Corresponding Secretary, 500 Water Works Bldg., Kansas City, Mo., so as to reach Kansas City on Thursday, September 30, as the books close on that day for the Annual Report.

"The Martin Family" were in a meeting at Humboldt, Kansas, in July and August. The pastor, Duncan McFarlane, says of them: "These people are loyal and efficient workers, and have a host of friends here." The Humboldt church is entering upon a building enterprise.

The new boat for the Upper Congo, Africa, the "S. S. Oregon," will be dedicated at the Centennial Convention, the evening of October 13 at 5:30 o'clock. The services will be held at the firm of James Rees & Sons Company, ship builders. This is sure to be a great occasion.

The receipts of the Foreign Society to September 14 amount to $305,294.74, a gain of $68,932.32. It is hoped that the total gain will reach $75,000 or more by the 30th, when the books close. The churches as churches have given $128,670, a gain of $21,397.63. These figures all look good.

Dr. M. E. Poland and wife and Miss Muriel Molland, three new missionaries, sailed from San Francisco for China on the "S. S. China" September 3. Dr. Poland and wife will be stationed at Nantungchow, and Miss Molland at Nankin. He is the Living-link of the Central church, Indianapolis.

M. L. Pontius, for two years pastor of the church at Taylorville, Ill., closed his work there September 1, and will enter Yale Divinity School this fall. Mr. Pontius' work at Taylorville has been eminently successful and his leaving is felt to be a distinct loss to the community.

September 12, at the close of six years' pastorate in Columbus, Walter Scott Priest asked his church to release him that he might accept a call to the First Church, Wichita, Kansas, recently made pastorless by the resignation of E. W. Allen. Mr. Priest begins work at Wichita the first of November.

Dr. John Thomas, M. A., of Liverpool, England, pastor of the most famous Baptist chapel in his home city, will lecture at 12 noon daily September 20 to 24 in the Y. M. C. A. Auditorium Association Hall, 153 LaSalle street, Chicago, under the auspices of the Moody Bible Institute.

F. F. Walters, who succeeded W. F. Turner in the pastorate of the First Church, Joplin, Mo., has been holding open air meetings during the summer, and is thoroughly convinced that they can be used as a means of reaching a great many people who would not otherwise hear the preaching of the Gospel.

F. M. Rains is to dedicate the new building of the Wilson Ave. Church, Columbus, Ohio, October 24. When complete the building will cost $25,000.00, and is thoroughly modern in every respect. Immediately after the dedication the church will hold a revival meeting. O. P. McMahan is the minister.

E. O. Sharpe closed his first year of work at Lockhart, Texas, the last of August. During the year he preached 147 sermons, received 142 persons into the church, organized one new congregation and Sunday-school, made 661 calls, and reorganized the Junior and Senior C. E. societies.

Dr. Herbert Martin, head of the department of Logic and Psychology in Training College for Teachers of the City of New York, spent his vacation in Kentucky, and a part of the time at Transylvania University, of which he is an alumnus, graduating in '99. Dr. Martin received his doctor's degree from Yale University in 1905.

The East End Church, Pittsburg, gave Mr. and Mrs. J. R. Ewers a reception Thursday evening, September 16. The combination of this strong young man, forceful as a preacher, and capable as a leader; and this great and powerful church, is a source of great satisfaction to all who are interested in the advancement of the cause.

The churches of Des Moines have issued a circular letter inviting the people to consider their city as a suitable place for the next annual convention. Iowa's capitol city has a new coliseum which will seat 11,000 people. There are many reasons why this would be one of the good places for the convention in 1910.

L. C. Howe, pastor of the church at New Castle, Ind., has been chosen as a delegate from the churches of the county to the Centennial Convention. Mr. Howe was also reelected president of the county organization. Oliver W. Stewart gave a temperance address in the New Castle Church, September 19. The Sunday-school will observe Rally Day, September 26.

C. F. Martin, who has been leading the church at Exeter, Nebraska, in a building enterprise, has resigned and will close his work October 1, just a week before the new building will be ready for use. The occasion of Mr. Martin's resignation is the ill health of his wife and youngest child. He will be ready to accept a call to another church in the West.

L. C. Oberlies, Superintendent of the Sunday-school at the First Church, Lincoln, Nebraska, has been elected to the position of Bible-school evangelist of the tsate. Mr. Oberlies will be greatly missed by his home church; but here the First Church must give way to the larger interests of the state. No better man could have been chosen for this important work is the belief of the leading preachers of the state.

C. P. Hedges, writing from the upper Congo, Africa, says: "I never heard anything so inspiring as the work at Monyeka. Bolenge cannot compare with it; neither can Longa. There are vast numbers of people within easy reach of our proposed station and all are eager for us. What is most inspiring is that out of fifty Christians there they are sending ten of their number to preach the same Christ they have accepted."

The Chicago ministers met for the first time since the vacation season, in room 916 of the Masonic Temple, Monday, September 11, at 2:00 p. m. O. F. Jordon gave the paper on "The Future Program of the Disciples." The paper was well prepared and enjoyed by all who were present. C. C. Morrison, Editor of The Christian Century gave the address at the meeting the following week.

L. E. Chase, who began work with the church at Carbondale, Ill., June 10, is encouraged with the prospects. There have been eleven additions to the church, notwithstanding there was no preaching service in the church during August. There is an average attendance of 150 in the Sunday-school. The church is awake to her opportunity with the 500 students at the Normal School, and is making special preparation for their coming this fall.

On November 2, the good ship "Nippon Maru" will sail from San Francisco. She will bear W. H. Hanna and wife and Dr. W. N. Lemmon to the Philippines; Miss Rose T. Armbruster, who will be returning from her furlough, to Tokio, Japan; Miss Edith Parker to Tokio, Japan, a new missionary of the Foreign Society. She goes out from Columbia, Mo. Also Miss Edna P. Dale, to China, who is returning from a furlough, and Miss Kate Galt Miller, a new missionary from Louisville, Ky., to China.

E. W. Allen, the new secretary of the Foreign Society, began his work September 1. He attended the Oklahoma convention, and visited a number of churches in that region. He will be in and about Cincinnati until after the Centennial convention when he will make Kansas City, Mo., his headquarters and radiate among the western churches from that point. He is strong in body, mind and heart and is certain to do a mighty work in landing churches to a larger interest in the world's evangelization.

Barclay Meador, for several years past the assistant pastor of the First Church, Kansas City, Mo., will close his work there the first of November, and is available for other work either as pastor or assistant pastor. W. F. Richardson, pastor of the First Church, speaks words of unqualified indorsement of the work of Mr. Meador, and says that the church is unanimous in its approval of his work, and give him up only because it is necessary to reduce the current expense budget for a time.

October 30, R. S. Wilson and wife of Kentucky, and Miss Edna V. Eck of Charleston, Ill., will sail for Bolenge on the "S. S. Canada" from New York to England, and they will sail on the "S. S. Albertville" from Antwerp to Matadi, mouth of the Congo. The church at Elyria, Ohio, John P. Sala, minister, supports R. S. Wilson. The church at Fresno, Cal., will support Mrs. R. S. Wilson. The church at Charleston, Ill., will support Miss Eck. G. H. Brown is the minister. The arrival of these three missionaries at Bolenge will be a source of great comfort to all the missionaries on the Congo.

The opening exercises of the G. L. Wharton Memorial Home, Hiram, Ohio, will be held Friday, October 1, 1909, at 2:00 p. m., Pres. Miner Lee Bates presiding; addresses by Mr. C. G. Elsam, Bina, C. P., India, "The Missionary Family and Its Problems"; Pres. A. McLean, Cincinnati, Ohio, "The Church at Home and the Workers Abroad"; Prof. C. T. Paul, Hiram, Ohio, "The College and the Evangelization of the World." Following these addresses there will be a reception at the home. This accomplishment makes glad the heart of many a missionary parent and every Disciple in the home land will rejoice with them.

Memorial services have been held at the Vine Street Christian Church, Nashville, Tenn., in honor of the memory of Z. S. Loftis, news of whose death in far-off Tibet has saddened so many of his friends in the homeland. It was under the ministry of George Gowan that this church was brought into the living-link class, and Dr. Loftis induced to become its first missionary. He volunteered to go to Tibet, the most remote and difficult mission field in the world. Up to the time of his departure he was President of the Nashville Volunteer Student Movement. Dr. Loftis was a graduate with honors of the Vanderbilt University.

The board of deacons of the First Church, Warren, Ohio, have decided upon greater publicity within the church of the church's financial affairs. Frequent reports will be made of the exact financial condition of the church. This is done in the belief that when the members of the church know its needs they will help to meet them. The board has also decided to publish a directory of the membership, placing opposite each name the amount of money given during the year to current expenses and to missions. This is a plan that has been in successful operation in the Central Church, Peoria, Ill., the First Church, Youngstown, Ohio, and a number of other churches. It means business methods applied to the work of the church.

John Ray Ewers, the new pastor of the East End Church, Pittsburg, announces the following series of Sunday evening sermons on "Bible nights":

1. A Call Forward—A Night at the Red Sea.
2. A Vision of Strength—A Night at Bethel.
3. A Young King's Choice—A Night at Gibeon.
4. A Wretched Failure—A Night in Babylon.
5. A Battle Royal—A Night in a Den of Lions.
6. A Desperate Temptation—A Night in a Palace.
7. A Secret Visit—A Night in Jesus' Lodging.
8. The Departure of Judas—"It Was Night."
9. "Thy Will Be Done"—A Night in the Garden.
10. Eternal Day in Heaven—No Night There.

Pass The Word Along

It won't cost you a penny to reach out a helping hand to a great army of honest, hard-working and deserving men and women.

Just your moral support will insure work, a living, and comforts which are now either partly or wholly denied them.

How so?

Come on, let's have a look.

You've often been importuned and many have been commanded by advertisement or otherwise to "refuse to buy anything unless it bears the union label."

Looks harmless on its face, doesn't it?

It really is a "demand" that you boycott the products made by over 80 per cent of our American workingmen and women who decline to pay fees to, and obey the dictates of the union leaders.

It demands that you ask the merchant for articles with the "union label," thus to impress him with its importance.

It seeks to tell you what to buy and what to refuse. The demands are sometimes most insolent, with a "holier than thou" impudence.

It demands that you take away the living of this 80 per cent of the American workingmen and women.

Is that clear?

Why should a small body of workmen ask you to help starve the larger body?

There must be some reason for the "union label" scheme.

Run over in your mind and remember how they carry on their work.

During a discussion about working or striking in the coal regions, about 25,000 men preferred to work, they had wives and babies to feed. The union men said openly in their convention that if the employers didn't discharge these men they (the union men) would kill them.

So they dynamited about a dozen homes, maimed and crippled women and children and brutally assaulted scores of these independent workers.

The big boys of the union men were taught to pound the school children of the independent men. How would you like to have your little girl shortly grown from the toddling baby who used to sit on your lap and love "Daddy" pounded by some big bullies on her way home from the school where she had gone to try and please Daddy by learning to read?

The little bruised face and body would first need tender care while you ponder the inscription writ deep in your heart, by that Master and Guide to all human compassion, "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren ye have done it unto me." Then, perhaps, you would drop to your knees and pray Almighty God for strength in your right arm to strike one manly and powerful blow for baby's sake, even if you went to death for it.

Helpless children were brought home, with faces black or bleeding from the blows and kicks of these fiends, teaching independent Americans that they must stop work when told and pay fees to the leaders of "labor." Thousands of men, women and children have been treated thus.

From somewhere, Oh, Father of us all, we try to believe that You look with pitying eyes upon these brutal blows, cuts and scars on the many human bodies made in your likeness and image.

They are beautifully and wonderfully made, each the dwelling place of a Divine Soul.

Is it Your wish that they be crushed by iron shod heels, cut by knives or torn asunder by bullets and dynamite?

May we venture to think that a long suffering patience is extended in the hope that the men and women of America may someday wake to a realization of the awful cruelties perpetrated by this spirit of oppression and that they will some time learn the lesson that the "sacred gift of human freedom and liberty" was given by God and must be defended even to death itself.

Our forefathers were used by the Infinite God to establish our freedom in 1776, and our fathers gave freely of their blood and treasure to establish the freedom of the black. Now again it seems we are called upon to protect our brothers and ourselves from that old time spirit of tyranny which comes up from time to time to force people to obey tyrannous rules and bend the knee of the slave.

In Wellston, Ohio, thirty Americans sought employment in a factory. They were seeking to earn food for their families. They were bombarded by rocks and pounded with clubs in the hands of union men.

One of the injured, John Brannihan, was taken to the city hospital with a broken jaw, crushed skull and other cuts and bruises. He was the father of two children, and was thought to be dying. Perhaps he did. I don't know, but I sometimes wonder what the children said to Mother when "Papy" didn't come home, and how they and the little woman got any food, and how they could place their wrongs before their own American fellows.

Mayhap sometime some kind person will equip a home where the orphans and widows of the victims of the Labor Trust may be cared for and fed.

It would take a big home. It has been said there were 31 Americans, many of them fathers, killed in one strike (the teamsters in Chicago), and over 5,000 maimed, many for life. That's only one "lesson" of these bullies. There are literally thousands of cases wherein your fellow American has been assaulted, maimed or killed by these men. The same work is going on day by day. Suppose you make a practice of picking out each day from the papers, accounts of brutality to American workingmen who prefer to work free from the impudence and tyranny of self constituted leaders (?) than to be always subject to their beck and call, pay them fees and be told by them when and where to work, and for whom. You will discover the same general conditions underlying all these daily attacks.

In every case the workingman prefers to be free. He has that right. He then tries to go to work. He and his family sorely need the money for food or he wouldn't run the risk of his life. Many such a man has wiped the tears away and quieted the fears of a loving wife, left with a kiss on her lips, set his manly jaw and walked into a shower of stones and bullets to win food for the loved mother and babies.

A good many have been brought home on stretchers with blood oozing from nose and ears, some cold, while some gradually recover, and carry for life the grim marks of the "union label."

They are your fellows, my friends, and yet you supinely read the accounts and say "too bad."

Have you grown so calloused that you care nothing for the sufferings of these men who need food and these helpless ones who rely on the life and strength of husband and father?

Let us hope that soon you may be moved by a just God to rise in your might and by a voice and pen, by vote and right arm you will do a man's part in protecting yourselves and your brothers from this onslaught on American citizens. This cruel warfare is carried on not always to raise wages, but to establish union control, kick out the independent men and establish the "label."

Unfortunately the "Labor movement" which started many years ago honestly enough, has fallen under control of a lot of tyrannical, vicious "men of violent tendencies."

There are too many to attempt to name. You can recall them. They include men who have planned the murders of miners, teamsters, pressmen and carpenters, shoemakers and independent workmen of all kinds. Many of them have escaped hanging by an outraged public only because juries became terror stricken and dared not convict them.

Some have been punished slightly and some, including the principal officers of this nefarious crew, are now under sentence to imprisonment but have appealed their cases.

Right here some apologist rises to protest against "speaking thus of laboring men." Bless your dear heart, it isn't the honest and real workman who does these things; it is the excitable ones and the toughs and thugs who don't work except with their mouths, but have secured control of too many unions. I don't even attempt to specify the criminal acts these persons have assisted or winked at in their plan for destroying free workingmen and forcing men to stay in "the union" and hence under their control. The newspapers for the past 7 years contain almost daily accounts of the criminal, lawless and tyrannical acts against American citizens and haven't told half the tale. Right here it becomes necessary to say for the ten thousandth time that there are scores of honest law-abiding union men who deplore and are in no way responsible for the long infamous record of the "Labor Trust" under its present management, but they don't seem to stop it.

The men who manage, who pull the strings and guide the policy have made the record and it stands, as made by them.

Examine, if you please, the record of a string of members of the American Federation of Labor and you will view a list of crimes against Americans, stupendous beyond belief. They defy the laws, sneer at the courts, incite mobs and are avowed enemies of the peaceable citizens of all classes.

This band wields an iron bar over their subjects and drives them to idleness whenever they want to call a strike or exact extra pocket money for themselves.

Men don't want to be thrown out of work and lose their livelihood, but what can they do when the slugging and murdering committee stands always ready to "do them" if they try to work.

The poor women and helpless children suffer and no one dares present their case to the public. They must suffer in silence for they have no way to right their wrongs, while the notoriety-seeking leaders carry out their work.

These men cannot thus force oppression on the weak and innocent or use them to bring newspaper notice to themselves and money to their pockets unless they can "hold them in line."

Therefore, with the craft of the fox and venom of the serpent they devise the "union label" and tell the public to buy only articles carrying that label.

Smooth scheme, isn't it?

They extract a fee from every union man, and in order to get these monthly fees they must hold the workers in "the union" and force manufacturers to kick out all independent men.

Can anyone devise a more complete and tyrannical trust?

If allowed full sway, no independent man could keep working in a free factory, for the goods wouldn't sell no matter how perfectly they be made. Then, when the factory has been forced to close and the employees get hungry enough from lack of wages the workers must supplicate the union leaders to be "allowed" to pay their fines (for not becoming members before) and pay their monthly fees to the purse-fat managers of the Labor Trust. Thereupon (under orders) before the factory be allowed to start they must force the owners of the business to put on the "union label" or strike, picket the works, and turn themselves into sluggers and criminals towards the independent workers who might still refuse to bend the knee and bow the head.

In the meantime babies and mothers go hungry and shoeless, but who cares? The scheming leaders are trained to talk of the "uplifting of labor" and shed tears when they speak of the "brotherhood of man" meaning the brotherhood of the "Skinny Maddens," "Sheas," te al, always excluding the medium or high-grade independent workers.

Perhaps you have noticed lately that the makers of the finest hats, shoes and other articles have stopped putting on the union label. Naturally the Labor Trust managers have ordered their dupes to strike, lie idle, scrap, fight, slug and destroy property to force the makers to again put on "the label." But for some reason the buying public has been aroused to the insults and oppression behind it and in thousands of cases have refused to buy any article carrying what some one named the "tag of servitude and oppression."

The bound and gagged union slave is fined from $5.00 to $25.00 if he buys any article not bearing the "union label." Nevertheless, he, time and again, risks the penalty and buys "free" goods simply in order to help the fellow workingman who is brave enough to work where he pleases without asking permission on bended knees from the bulldozing leaders who seek by every known method of oppression and hate to govern him.

If these poor wageworkers will thus brave fine and slugging to help out other men who seek to live a free life under our laws and constitution cannot you, reader, help a little?

Will you reach out a hand to help an independent workman earn food for his wife and babies? Or will you from apathy and carelessness allow him to be thrown out of work and the helpless suffer until they prostrate themselves before this stupendous and tyrannical aggregation of leeches upon honest American labor?

The successor of Henry Ward Beecher in Plymouth Church, Brooklyn, says:

"Union labor hatred for labor burns like a flame, eats like nitric acid, is malignant beyond all description. But the other day, a woman representing a certain union visited many families in Plymouth Church asking them to boycott a certain institution. . . . Alas this union woman's hatred for non-union women burned in her like the fires of hell.

She was pitilessly, relentlessly and tirelessly pursuing the non-union women and men to destroy the market for goods, to ruin their factory and starve them out.

In the French revolution only 2 per cent of the French people believed in violence. The 98 per cent disclaimed violence and yet the 98 per cent allowed the 2 per cent to fill the streets of Paris with festering corpses, to clog the Seine with dead bodies, to shut up every factory in Paris, until the laboring classes starved by the score.

The small per cent element in the Labor Trust which hates and seeks to destroy the large per cent of independent Americans sends out letters declaring "free" industries unfair and tries to boycott their products. If they could bind everyone it would bring suffering upon hundreds of thousands, immeasurable ruin upon the country, and land it absolutely under control of the men now attempting to dictate the daily acts of our people and extract from each a monthly fee.

There are babies, children, women and honest, hard-working and skillful fathers who rely upon the protection of their fellows, when they seek to sell their labor where they choose, when they choose, and for a sum they believe it to be worth.

Every citizen having the rights, privileges and protection of a citizen has also the responsibility of a citizen.

The Labor Trust leaders may suavely "request" (or order those they can) to buy only "union label" articles, and you can of course obey if you are under orders.

Depend upon it, the creatures of the Labor Trust will, upon reading this, visit stores and threaten dire results unless all the things bear "the label."

They go so far as to have their women pretend to buy things, order yards of silk or cloth torn off and various articles wrapped up and then discover "no label" and refuse them. That's been done hundreds of times and is but one of the petty acts of hatred and tyranny.

Let no one who reads this article understand that he or she is asked to boycott any product whether it bears a "union label" or not. One has a constitutional right to examine the article and see whether its makers are Labor Trust contributors and slaves or are free and independent Americans.

I have tried to tell you something about those who are oppressed, vilified, hated, and when opportunity offers are attacked because they prefer to retain their own independent American manhood. These men are in the vast majority and include the most skillful artisans in the known world. They have wives and babies dependent on them.

These men are frequently oppressed and have no way to make their wrongs known. They are worthy of defense. That's the reason for the expenditure of a few thousands of dollars to send this message to the American people. Remember, I didn't say my "excuse" for sending it. The cause needs no "excuse."

C. W. POST.

Battle Creek, Mich.

N. B.: Some "parlor socialist" who knows nothing of the Russian Czarism of the great Labor Trust will ask right here: "Don't you believe in the right of certain workmen to 'organize.'" Oh, yes, brother, when real workmen manage wisely and peacefully, but I would challenge the right of even a church organization when its affairs had been seized by a motley crew of heartless, vicious men who stopped industries, incited mobs to attack citizens and destroy property in order to establish their control of communities and affairs, and subject everyone to their orders and exact the fees. When you see work of this kind being done call on or write the prosecuting officers of your district and demand procedure under the Sherman antitrust law, and prosecution for conspiracy and restraint of trade. We have the law but the politicians and many of our officers even while drawing pay from the people are afraid to enforce it in protection of our citizens and now the big Labor Trust is moving heaven and earth to repeal the law so their nefarious work may be more safely carried on.

But You. Why don't you strike out and demand defense for your fellows?

Put your prosecuting officers to the test and insist that they do their sworn duty, and protect to your congressmen and legislators against the repeal of the Sherman Anti-Trust law. Its repeal is being pushed by the Labor Trust and some big capital trusts in order to give each more power to oppress. Do your duty and protest. In this great American Republic everyone must be jealous of the right of individual liberty and always and ever resent the attempts made to gain power for personl aggrandizement.

Only the poor fool allows his liberty to be wrested from him.

Someone asks "how about your own workmen?"

I didn't intend to speak of my own affairs, but so long as the question is almost sure to be asked I don't mind telling you.

The Postum workers are about a thousand strong, men and women, and don't belong to labor unions. The Labor Trust has, time without numbers, sent "organizers" with money to give "smokers," etc., and had their "orators" declaim the "brotherhood of man" business, and cry salty tears describing the fearful conditions of the "slaves of capital" and all that. But the "confidence game" never worked, for the decent and high grade Postum workers receive 10 per cent over the regular wage scale. They are the highest paid, richest and best grade of working people in the state of Michigan and I believe in the United States. They mostly own their own homes, and good ones. Their wages come 52 weeks in a year and are never stopped on the order of some paid agent of the Labor Trust. They have savings accounts in the banks, houses of their own and steady work at high wages.

They like their daily occupation in the works (come and ask them) and are not slaves, and yet the Labor Trust leaders have done their best to ruin the sale of their products and force them into idleness and poverty.

It would cost the workingmen of Battle Creek (our people and about 3,000 others) from $1,000.00 to $2,000.00 a month in fees to send out to the leaders of the Labor Trust, if they would allow themselves to become "organized" and join the Trust.

Not for them; they keep the money, school the children and live "free." That's some comfort for white people.

Once in a while one of the little books, "The Road to Wellville," we put in the pkgs. of Postum, Grape-Nuts and Post-Toasties, is sent back to us with a sticker pasted across it saying, "Returned because it don't bear the union label."

Then we join hands and sing a hymn of praise for the discovering by some one that our souls are not seared with the guilt of being conspirators to help bind the chains of slavery upon fellow Americans by placing added power in the hands of the largest, most oppressive and harmful trust the world has ever seen.

When you seek to buy something look for the "union label" and speak your sentiments. That's an opportunity to reach out a helping hand to the countless men and women in all kinds of industry who brave bricks, stones and bullets, to maintain their American manhood and freedom by making the finest goods in America and which do not bear the seal of industrial slavery, the "Union Label."

Church Life

Herbert Jewell became a meeting with the South Prospect Church, Kansas City, September 5.

M. Moore has resigned his pastorate at Yates City, Kansas, to become manager of the Keeley Institute of that place.

J. J. Morgan until lately pastor at Fort Worth, Texas, has accepted a call to Jackson, Pa.

S. D. Perkinson has resigned at the North Dallas Church, Texas, and will be succeeded by Graham McMurry, also of Dallas.

G. J. Masey closed his work with the Second Church, Houston, Texas, and went immediately to take up his kork as pastor at Iona, Mishigan.

J. K. Arnot, who preaches at Btavia, Ill., and his brother E. J. who is pastor of the Armitage Avenue mission exchanged pulpits the second Sunday in September.

Leonard V. Barbre, pastor, closed a meeting at Farmersburg, Ind., September 14 with 12 additions, 7 baptisms, 2 restored and 3 by statement. Margaret Windsor of Muncie, Ind., had charge of the music.

"The Church and the Laboring Man," was the subject of a sermon by J. O. Smith, delivered in the First Church, Oklahoma City, September 5. A large unmber of the members of the local unions were present.

Telegrams

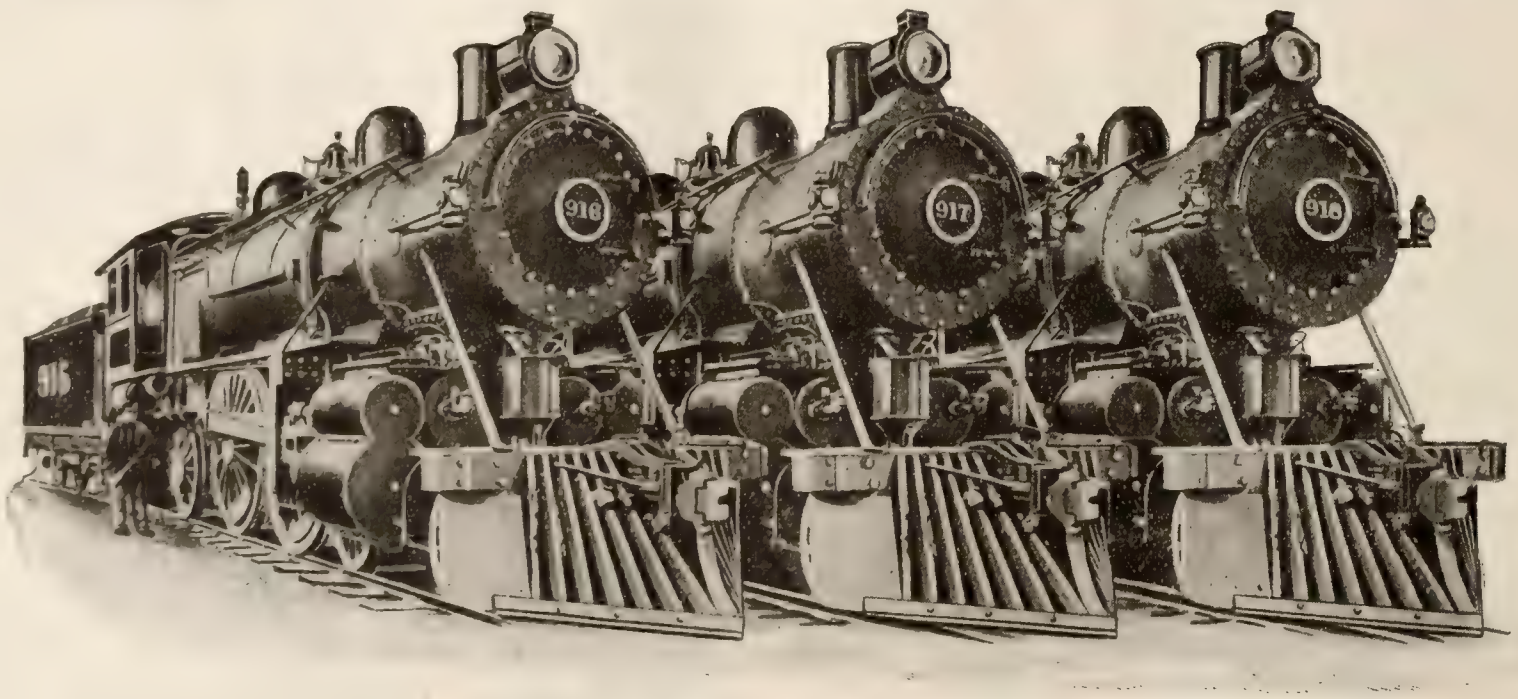
Kansas City, Mo., Sept. 20.—Great day for Independence Blvd. Church. Five thousand dollars raised. Centennial mission's total missionary offering for year ten thousand dollars. Announce call and acceptance of James Small to associate pastorate in connection with Geo. P. Taubman.—Geo. H. Combs.

Altoona, Ia., Sept. 20.—Great day, three inspiring services. Thompson the Egyptian gave great address to lodges this afternoon. House packed tonight. Altoona has never heard such gospel sermons as Thompson is preaching. He is a power for God. R. O. Noah and wife are great leaders of song and personal workers. Additions at nearly every service. We continue.—L. G. Parker.

Marion, Ohio, Sept. 20.—Rufus A. Sinnell is a veritable Apollo, who did the seeming impossible at First Church here. No truer man in field; great audiences crowd our large auditorium. Prejudice melted; whole families won, baptisms every night, eleven today, forty in six days of invitation. Miss Kimbles strong chorus leader and sweet solos a mighty winning power.—Chas. E. Smith.

Kansas City, Mo., Sept. 20.—Closed at Franklin, Ind., Tuesday night. Eighty-three added on Sunday. Lecture Monday; 25 on Tuesday, many the leading citizens of the county; meeting to short; great work should have gone on for two weeks. Have been with Frank L. Bowen, Jackson Ave. Christian Church—fine new stone building—three days; sixty added; forty today; largest crowd tonight ever assembled in this building. Outlook fine. Brother Bowen and his wife have built a lasting monument with church from organization up to the present. Have found a wonderful leader of song in Mr. Buss, and one of the greatest soloists in the land in Mr. Best of Chicago.—Charles Reign Scoville.

Cotner Students and Graduates Attention



President W. P. Alsworth has asked the writer to arrange for a Cotner Rally at Pittsburg. We are going to have that rally. It will be held on the time specified by the program committee for all college rallies. Furthe announcements about the rally will be made later. Every graduate of Cotner University who expects to be at Pittsburg is asked to drop the writer a postal card telling him of that fact. Send same to Vincennes, Indiana. We are planning for a banquet, speech-making and a general good time. Fellow graduates, drop me a card, telling me that you will be at Pittsburg.

Iowa Central District Convention

The best convention ever held in the Central District has come and gone, but we are richer in every way. Finis Idleman sounded the keynote in the first address when he pleaded for "loyalty to the plea at the opportune time." When I say, We had Idleman, Van Horn, W. S. Athern, B. W. Garrett, A. M. Haggard, Laura D. Garst, C. S. Medbury, et al., you will believe me when I say, "Few state gatherings are as good." B. D. Clark, president, and H. E. Van Horn, secretary, were re-elected. The joint plan of work linking state and district boards was heartily adopted. Advance ground was taken in response to the appeal for pledges from Bible schools and C. E.s to support a living link evangelist under direction of the joint board. Not all have reported but we are confident of victory. Central District has eighty-five congregations, and one-third the membership of the entire state, yet only twenty-two congregations report gains or losses.

The Gain Is Great

The receipts of the Foreign Society for the first eight days of September amounted to $27,303, or a gain over the corresponding eight days of last year of $5,727. The gains from the churches as churches were exceptionally large, being $9,137. The churches are making a fine record indeed. There was a small loss in Sunday-school gifts, and also in individual offerings.

The total receipts for the missionary year to September 8 amount to $294,571, or a gain of $67,277. The churches as churches have given $127,362.50, or a gain of $24,413. This is the largest gain the churches have ever made in any one year in our history. We are hoping that there will be no sag in their gifts between this and the 30th.

We are confidently hoping for a gain of not less than $75,000 by September 30 when our books close for the current missionary year.

New England Convention

By Jerome W. Robbins.

The forty-fourth annual convention of the New England Christian Missionary Society convened at Haverhill, Mass., September 9 to 12, 1909.

W. R. Mains the genial pastor of the church at Haverhill, welcomed the delegates to which D. C. McCollum made an appreciative response.

The first formal address was a paper on "The Power of Faith," presented by J. W. Robbins of Swampscott, Mass. Charles A. Hatfield followed with an address on the "Situation and Prospects in Lynn. Friday afternoon was devoted to the C. W. B. M. In the absence of the president, Mrs. Newton Knox of Worcester, whose illness prevented her attendance, Mrs. E. T. Rummell of New York City, representing the home C. W. B. M., spoke entertainingly of the general aims and work of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions. Mr. S. M. Rodgers made a report as N. E. Centennial secretary and Mrs. R. W. Robinson gave an account of the young people's department. A charming program was rendered by the Junior Society of Haverhill.

The evening addresses by G. N. Stevenson of Bridgeport, Conn., and G. A. Reinl of Springfield, Mass., were highly appreciated. The former speaking on "The Program of Jesus," the latter on "Needed Evangelism."

Saturday forenoon was devoted to the interests of the Bible-school. Excellent addresses were delivered as follows: R. Lee Bussabarger of Lubec, Me., subject, "Bible-school Evangelism," "Adult Class Work," by Harold Knott, of Worcester, Mass., and Privity of "New England Missions," by N. D. Wilber, Providence, R. I.

Sunday at 10:30 a. m., E. J. Teagarden of Denbury, Conn., preached. His subject being "The Centennial and What Should Follow," and in the evening H. Minick of Worcester, Mass., spoke on "Home Missions," followed by Lowell C. McPherson, Kenka Park, N. Y., on "Education in the East."

Illinois Christian Endeavor

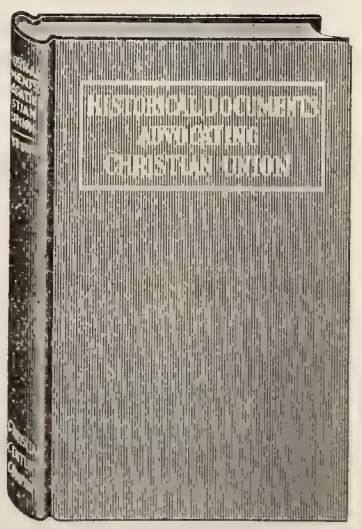
H. H. Peters of Eureka, Ill., who has been State Superintendent of Christian Endeavor for two years has in his annual report some things of special interest to the young people of Illinois. There are 293 Christian Endeavor Societies in the state with an active membership of 8695 and an associate membership of 1479.

We note that the superintendent recommends the following items of interest for the work of next year: that the societies take an active interest in all union movements and especially the union C. E. work; that the societies make a special effort along the line of evangelism and local benevolent work; that we ask for a place on each District Convention program and that our work be given a prominent place on the State Convention program next year; that we organize twenty-five new societies; double the membership of at least 100, increase the membership of all other active societies, revive the indifferent and resurrect the dead ones; that the societies observe "Illinois Day" and "Eureka Day" on the evenings before the offerings in the churches for the causes of Illinois Missions and Christian Education by rendering a program and urging all Endeavors to make contribution through the regular channels of the church.

Chicago Headquarters at Pittsburg

The Hotel Henry has been chosen as Headquarters for Chicago people at the Centennial Convention. This is one of the best hotels in the city. Rates for the convention are $1.50 per day European plan, and $2.50 with two in a room. Prices range higher for rooms with bath. The hotel has a beautiful lobby where convention fellowship will be in full sway. It is new and modern and the manager is determined that nothing shall be left undone to make us quite at home during our stay in Pittsburg.

Chicago will be glad to be host to friends from all parts of the country who wish to stop at this hotel.



It is not one day too soon to make your reservation. We predict that hotel accommodations will soon be exhausted.

CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON AND HERBERT L. WILLETT, EDITORS

The Church on the Dissecting Table

Conventional Christianity Being Subjected to Searching Popular Examination

EDITORS of popular magazines evidently know that a critical discussion of religious problems and conditions awakens an interest in their publications that but few subjects can create. Of late, religion has been the sensation of a number of our leading monthlies. Such topics as "Blasting at the Rock of Ages," "What is the Matter with the Churches?" "The Faith of the Unchurched" and many others have made enormous sales for the publications in which they were treated. The people are profoundly interested in religion. They are interested in it whether they are avowedly religious or not.

That a profound change is passing over the religious world is gradually filtering down from the expert observers into the minds of all the people. Old doctrines are dying. Many venerable forms are being neglected. The church itself with its age-old institutions is being challenged on every hand. Men are asking fearlessly the deepest and most radical questions. Irregular cults are springing up on all sides. It is hard to say whether credulity or incredulity is the chief characteristic of the present mind. On the one hand there is disillusionment, sophistication, a Thomas-like skepticism, which, however, is thoroughly pervaded with intellectual curiosity. On the other hand, there is an easy susceptibility to new "religions" and new theories. He is a poor stick indeed who cannot start out in the morning with a new religion and come back at night-fall with sheaves of converts. When we behold the successes of Dr. Dowie and Mrs. Eddy and Mrs. Besant and all the rest, we wonder if we are not mistaken in our notion that this is a scientific age. An interesting subject for some young candidate for a doctor's degree in the university could be found in the non-orthodox and non-Christian cults of a great city like Chicago. The religious announcements in any Sunday morning paper would put him on the trail of some very interesting specimens.

Meantime the church is on the dissecting table. This is no time for orthodox people to be smart and haughty. We will have to submit to the most searching examination on the part of those who have become disillusionized about the church and conventional religion. Our salvation lies not in resenting criticism, but in participating in it. The popular magazine writers are bringing to bear some very searching tests. They are probing to the vitals. There is much in their articles that is unfair, insincere—evidently put down for the sake of making a sensation and selling the magazine.

But with the chaff there is much wheat. When a magazine writer interprets the uprising of so many irregular cults as a reflection on the adequacy of orthodox religion it seems to us he is on the right track. When another writer contrasts the life of the churches with the work of social settlements he is applying a test to the churches which may be used unfairly, but which, nevertheless, has in it much true suggestion. And when Mr. Ray Stannard Baker, writing in The American Magazine for September, applies the money test to our present day Christianity, we are compelled to admit that he has hit upon a criterion which registers more exactly the quality of our conventional religion than any other external test that could be found. Mr. Baker says the people are not giving money to the churches as they once did. Other agencies of social welfare are receiving the bulk of the money given by the big philanthropists.

"During the past ten or twelve years the almost inconceivably enormous sum of $1,000,000,000 has been given away by Americans for various philanthropic purposes. Of this stupendous sum comparatively little went to the churches. Rockefeller, for example, although an exuberant church-member, has given comparatively little money to church work. He has been interested in outside activities, chiefly educational and medical. Mrs. Russell Sage has been distributing her millions, not among the churches which have been gradually deserting the poor, but she establishes a great fund for studying methods of improving the conditions of the poor. . . . Phipps builds model tenements and D. O. Mills model hotels for improving the living-conditions of people of small means. Last year Morris K. Jesup died. He was one of the most loyal of Presbyterians, but of his gifts not one-tenth went to church work, while nine-tenths was given to outside activities like the American Museum of Natural History. And Mr. Jesup's proportion for churches was very large compared with that of most givers. Even many Roman Catholics who have left fortunes have contributed not exclusively to the Church, as they probably would have done twenty or fifty years ago, but have favored all sorts of public causes. A wealthy Roman Catholic woman recently left considerable sums of money to Jewish institutions. Not only the dollars of the rich but the pennies of the poor have been diverted in large measure from the Church. No one can study even cursorily the Socialist movement, the trade-union movement, the spread of fraternal and mutual-benefit societies, without being impressed with the great sums (in the aggregate) which are being given yearly to maintain these movements."

To our mind, a more damaging disclosure than the relative amounts of money given for church and non-church enterprises is to be found in the methods by which the church secures what money she does now receive. Spontaneous money giving is a sure evidence of vital interest in any cause. Unless a man's religion opens his pocketbook it has not gripped his soul very vitally. The methods to which the church resorts in order to raise its money betray the unspiritual and unvital—the relatively conventional—character of its piety. Among people of refined moral sense the methods by which the Roman Catholic church raises its vast funds constitute a social scandal. Begging, hold-up, gambling, penance and priestly compulsion are the notorious devices for keeping this marvelous church a-going.

But among Protestants, while the methods are not so flagrantly unethical, they are just as indicative of a low level of spiritual life. Not to mention now the silly enterprises of making money by bazaars and pink teas and oyster suppers—means by which money is wheedled out of uninterested pockets—it needs to be said that our direct methods of getting money betray the lack of a vital inner religious consciousness among Christians. Mr. Baker touches only casually upon this aspect of the subject, but what he does say is full of suggestion:

"At the same time that money is being so readily and so generously bestowed upon all manner of outside activities, the churches are having to devise complicated and organized methods of getting money from people. Churches are today advertised like business enterprises; several books have been written on church advertising and promotion which reveal the most adroit business methods of attracting people. In New York I saw really impressive systems of card-catalogs and other business devices among the churches for keeping in touch with contributors. A formidable number of publications and speakers are constantly at work stirring up enthusiasm, urging people to contribute money. More and more either the bishop, the clergyman, or some member of the board of trustees must be an energetic business man. More and more large churches are seeking the safe haven of endowments; they fear the future."

The Christian Century has recently been engaged in the ungrateful duty of saying that the typical successful revivalism of today is an indication of the profound lack of spiritual life in the church. For the same reasons that we are compelled to say that of the revivalism in which so many glory, we are compelled to say it also of the raising of a great portion of the funds by which our churches and missionary enterprises are carried on. Many of our so-called dedication "victories" are a sign of weakness, not of strength. The giving has to be manipulated by a professional leader who organizes a crowd-situation and plays upon motives that are anything but religious in character. The great blessing that the people should have—that of quietly and intelligently making an offering to the glory of God for the service of man—is denied them by the artificial manipulation of their leaders, who well know that their people for the most part utterly lack an appreciation of any such blessing as that. What we say of the typical revival "victory," that it is less significant for the good it accomplishes than for the unspirituality it betrays, we say also of many of our achievements of money getting.

The Trend of Events

By Alva W. Taylor

GROWING CHINESE INDEPENDENCE

The Chinese Government has withdrawn the civil status of Roman Catholic ecclesiastics. In the more helpless days when European imperialism was threatening to carve the limp and hoary empire into "spheres of influence" and even more tangible spheres of colonial government, she yielded to the demands made by Romanists and backed up by France and gave civil powers to the Vatican's representatives. The priests were put on an equality with prefects and the bishops with viceroys. They were given civil and judicial rights over their followers and thus a sort of quasi Catholic government was erected within the confines of the empire and adherents of the Catholic religion were given the same footing as foreigners within the realm. After ten years of this ignominy China feels strong enough to assert her sovereignty over her own citizens and puts Catholic, Protestant, and Confucianist on the same level. The privilege was claimed by Catholics on the plea of protection to proselytes. In fairness, the government offered to grant the same privilege to the Protestant missionaries, but they refused to accept it. It was a means of defeating justice by those who used the sense of sectarian fealty and protection to do things the government would not allow. It was a blow at Chinese patriotism and governmental integrity and the source of much irritation. It had no small part in stimulating the Boxer riots and was a menace to all missionary work. and it no doubt caused the loss of more than one faithful Catholic missionary's life.

CONQUERING DREAD DISEASES

No field of science is achieving such vast and lasting benefits for humanity as is medicine. At the recent International Medical Congress in Vienna, Dr. Geerster, of New York, announced a cure for peritonitis. The time for his paper was trebled, so great an interest did it arouse. Recently eleven lepers were dischargd from Molokai, the famous Hawaiian leper colony, cured. Thus one of the most ancient and terrible of incurable diseases is conquered. Dr. John Bashford, of London, believes he is on the eve of discovering the cause of cancer. Dr. Murphy, of Chicago, has revealed a new way of mechanically treating and curing stiffened and enlarged joints. As nature is better understood, physicians will learn how to better coöperate with her to cure her diseases and to do by the arts of surgery and physiological-chemistry what nature herself cannot do.

PROGRESS IN FAR ZANZIBAR

Far Zanzibar is awaking to the movements of the modern world and her young ruler has adopted both western dress and custom in many things. Slavery is being abolished by decree and provision is made for the aged and infirm slaves that will be unable to support themselves and who may be left helpless by their masters. The government will pension them. Soon the remotest parts of the earth will have forsaken the age-long ancient ways and put forth on the swift currents of modern progress. There are yet cannibal islands in the Pacific, and slave marts in Africa, but another generation bids fair to see the persuasion of the missionary and the strong hands of the civilized nations abolish the savagery of the earth.

THE TINTINNAMBULATION OF THE BELLS

The tingle of the telephone bell fills the earth. Pekin is bargaining for an up-to-date system and the little disks will take up with the impossible Chinese agglutinatives quite as easily as it does the mellifluous languages of the west.

The first bell rang thirty-three years ago. At the end of five years there were 34,000 miles of wire in operation. Today there are 13,000,000 miles, with a capital of nearly a billion in the holdings. There are 120,000 engaged in the operation of these lines and the yearly expenditure is about $150,000,000. It would be very interesting to know what the actual earnings are and how much of the billion is watered stock and bonds sold on valuations created by earning capacity, rather than real cost of construction.

In 1880 there was nine times as much telegraph wire as there was telephone. Today there is eight times as much telephone as telegraph wire. If the telegraph handles a quarter of a billion messages a year, how many must the telephone handle? Stockholm is the best telephonized city in the world. The government took over the wires there some years ago and immediately both greatly improved the service and reduced the rates. No one pays over $26 per year now, and not only is the service the best, but the extensions are perhaps the most numerous of any city in the world. Glasgow reduced rates from $50 to $26 when the municipality took over the lines. The Bell company charges $125 for business houses and from $60 to $100 for residences in cities of like size in the United States.

By its nature the telephone is a monopoly. In smaller towns excessive rates might be met with refusal to use the system, and the erection of another by citizen capital, but in the cities two companies means double cost to business and less than universal use to individual or residence users and wasteful duplication of plant. Competition cannot regulate where competition costs more than no competition. The remedy is either to resort to municipal ownership or municipal regulation of rates. To put an unregulated monopoly under the laws of competition without any competition to regulate it is to put a large margin of pure exploitation into the hands of the privileged company.

REBATES AND THE CUNNING THAT DEFIES SHACKLING

Slason Thompson, the statistical defender of the railroads, asserts that twenty-one roads paid out $28,000,000 last year in "fake personal injury, loss, and damage claims." President Stickney writes the Interstate Commerce Commission that the roads are paying rebates in the form of "damages." The amount paid out for personal injuries has trebled in ten years. Grant that all this is due to extension of traffic, increase of speed, and the better rewarding of injury, and we have the enormous increase in "damage and loss' to freight of $52,000,000 in ten years. In that time the amount paid annually rose from $4,760,000 to $56,700,000. The figures lend suspicion to President Stickney's charges all the more when it is discovered that the main part of that increase comes in the past four years, since rebating began to come seriously under the ban through the Hepburn law. On certain trunk lines the increase was from one-half more to twice as much as on all the lines. On one road it ran up to three times as much.

The simplicity of the thing commends itself to those who are wise, and as conscienceless as serpents. When rebates are forbidden the large shipper can demand remuneration for "damages." His patronage depends upon the checks sent and there is no revision of the books needed. According to Mr. Rockefeller's recent pious dictum, there is no wrong done if the law is observed, and the public must honor the benevolence of the man who thus gains millions for the building of universities and hospitals.

THE BETTER WAY IN LABOR TROUBLES

After several weeks of negotiation the wage demands of the Chicago Street Railway men have been compromised and a settlement that is satisfactory to both the employes and the employers. While arbitration was not resorted to, it was virtually an arbitration of demands in which the men were represented by Mr. Mahon, their national president, the companies by their executive officers, and the public by Mr. Walter Fisher, the city's traction counselor. The presence and recognition of Mr. Fisher's official right to aid in the settlement is significant. The public is quite as important a factor in wage and other labor difficulties as is either of the parties directly involved. When this fact is recognized there will be an end of strikes and lockouts, for the presence of the impartial third party will be a sine qua non of conciliation and the sure forerunner of compulsory arbitration where conciliation is not effective. Mr. Fisher was recognized in this case because the city, which he represented, is a sharer in the profits of the street car companies.

It will be recalled that during Mayor Dunn's administration the people voted overwhelmingly for municipal ownership of the street cars. The people's expressed will was defeated by various means—a story too long to be recounted here. The companies were given a twenty year franchise, the city to have 55 per cent of the profits after certain charges were made against the net balance over operating expenses. The properties were valued, liberal salaries are allowed, large construction and repair funds are set aside, a 10 per cent construction profit is given, a 5 per cent bankers' commission is taken out, and 5 per cent profit is allowed on the valuation made of the properties and, after all this, the city is given 55 per cent of the profits, that is, its share in the excess profits. It reserves the right to purchase at the valuation price plus the cost of extensions and improvements, and there is a joint city and company commission to regulate the quality of service and of the extensions.

This plan gives an accounting of the profits. How much is made over and above all expenses and a clear profit of 5 per cent is made known through the accounting to the city. It was seen that there was more than a million and a half to be divided, after a reasonable profit on a liberal valuation was made. The men thought the division was not equitable to labor. Here is another significant principle made a cause of action—the principle that labor has a right to a part of the excess of profits. Capital has always claimed all excess and charged it up as a reasonable compensation for the risks of success taken and the reward of managerial enterprise. Here labor claims a part of the excess profits—at least such a part as will give a reasonable wage and permit the worker to live comfortably. The new wage scale will give the men about one-third of this excess of profits.

The old wage scale paid the men, 23c per hour for the first six months, 25c for the second six months, and 27c thereafter. They demanded 27c for the second six months, and 30c thereafter. The new scale as accepted will give 23c for the first six months, 25c for the second six months, and a raise of one cent per hour for each year's service thereafter until a maximum of 30c is reached. It will thus be seen that the immediate gain is not great, but that the ultimate increase will be considerable, providing the old men are kept on the cars and not discharged for trivial reasons in order to keep the wage budget down. The old men now on the cars, i. e. those who are drawing 27c under the old scale, will get a raise of 1c per hour until the maximum of 30c is reached.

Is this a reasonable wage? The answer depends upon what one calls reasonable. The men come and go. There are always more new than old ones. But let us strike a medium of 27c per hour as the average wages. By working 12 hours per day a man will earn $22.68 per week of seven days. Or suppose he works 30 days every month and has the extra five days in the year for sickness and pleasure. He will be able to make a little over $1,000 in the year. This looks large. But is it a fair consideration of the question? Should any man receive such a reckoning? Is not 360 days' toil of 12 hours per day, unreasonable and almost inhuman? No man ought to have to work more than ten hours per day, six days per week, and fifty weeks in the year. The remainder of the time should be given to home, recreation, and personal affairs—and we allow nothing for misfortune. This will give a daily wage of $2.70, a yearly income of $810. Remember, too, that this is a city income where rents are high and living expensive. The investigators say that sum will only guarantee a living to a city family and that they must then live a cramped life with actual necessities only, and their children must go to work at a time when they should be in school.

The time will come when the vast excess of profits which capital has always claimed will be divided with labor, and the luxury of great wealth will contribute to the comfort of the workers.

THE QUALITY OF MR. HARRIMAN'S SUCCESS

Mr. Harriman was a Napoleon in the financial world. He had a million before he was twenty-five, and he began without a cent. He made it speculating in Wall street—and of course everyone knows that Wall street does more big gambling than any other spot on earth. The margin on Wall street's legitimate business runs easily over into the speculative, and the speculative just as easily over into gambling in stocks and bonds. Thus one never quite knows how money is made in Wall street, but it may be pretty fairly understood that quick millions can generally be traced to the gambling element in its business. Mr. Harriman dies worth untold millions and piled them up in forty short years, the most of them in the last sixteen. This does not necessarily say he won one of them wrongly. He might have won every one of them without a breach of the law and by the genius of his financial wizadry in developing vast properties and putting their benefits at the disposal of humanity just as Edison has won millions by the genius of his inventions. But did he? The answer to that query determines or not his life was a true success.

Mr. Harriman was more than a financial juggler. He did develop vast properties and did wonders in the world of legitimate railroading just as Jas. J. Hill has done. He was the chief factor in the control of over 70,000 miles of road when he died, and it can be truthfully said that it was in better physical condition and gave better service under his administration than ever before. But that does not tell the story. Must the virtues of a man, if they simply tell largely, excuse, therefore, all his vices? This modern Napoleon was as heartless in the pursuit of his ambition as was his great prototype. He was absolutely devoid of sentiment when it came to business. It was an iron game to him. Personality, friendship, human consideration, counted for nothing. It was not wealth he wanted, but power. He was as silent as a sphinx. He had no chums, he shared no secrets as one eminently human will do, he was an enigma to those nearest him even. He struck terrific blows and let them fall where they would with only the question of their effect on his plan. He used financial juggling just as far as the law would allow. His famous Alton deal was one of the most daring and successful pieces of juggling that ever came to light. He passed out passes to legislators to get favors and did all the other things that public conscience now is condemning and law forbidding. In other words, he played the financial game throughout and with no other consideration than winning at any price. Then what did he do with his wealth and power? Did good government profit by the interest of his genius? Ask Roosevelt. Did charity get any help from his millions? There is no record. Has science been endowed for research? No institution bears his name or knows his benefits. If his life is to be judged by its worth to the world it may be answered that in so far as he developed railroads legitimately, he did good, but the price society paid was financial juggling, and no evil thing can ever be justified by a wrong doing of it. The way he got his money will hardly allow industrial economy to say he was a true success, and the way he used his money will hardly lead human need to call him a human success.

HOW CANADA WOULD DEAL WITH McKEE'S ROCK

Canada has demonstrated the wisdom of her new Industrial Conciliation Law at this very time that the McKee's Rock strike has been demonstrating the unwisdom of "leaving them to fight it out." Five thousand dock laborers of the Canadian Pacific at Ft. William on Lake Superior went out on a strike. The Lemiux law makes a strike or lockout illegal until the difficulty has been fully investigated by a Board of Conciliation constituted under the authority of the governmental Department of Labor. After a full investigation and hearing all sides the findings are published and the combatants are left to settle the matter—if indeed they have not previously agreed to accept the judgment of the commission. In this manner 90 per cent of all industrial disputes have been peaceably settled in Canada since the law was enacted. The threatened strike of 5,000 at Ft. William was then adjusted since the McKee's Rock bloody barbarity began.

It does not compel arbitration, but it compels a truce until an impartial judgment can be rendered by the appointed commission of that important third party to every industrial dispute—the Public. It compels consideration by both parties while waiting; it compels each to listen to the other side of the case; it puts the calm judgment of a fair minded committee into the balance and brings the great weight of public demand to bear upon the contending forces. It would bring public opprobrium to bear upon a man like Hofstat before his dictatorial attitude had been obscured by the lawlessness that it brought about.

Compulsory arbitration is objected to by some labor leaders because, while employers can be fined for not following the award the employee must be imprisoned to compel compliance. In Canada's how fair-mindedness is given the judgment and the opprobrium of public opinion sentences the recalcitant party to the disfavor of public sympathy. As the workingman's cause must depend in the end on public sympathy, he might well advocate such a measure.

EDWARD EVERETT HALE'S RULES FOR A LONG LIFE

1. Rule both mind and body with an iron hold. You are master.
2. For the body, enough good sleep, enough good food, enough good exercise.
3. For the mind, regular work; work in the line of your genius and stop when you are tired.
4. After you are forty you may, if you are not a fool, choose your own rules, your own medicine and your own food. But you will find that the more you are in the open air and the more you are with other people, the better you will succeed. You will also find that there is nothing gained by brooding over failure.

1, 2, 3, 4, 5 (and always). The great central statement of life and history in this matter is: "He made himself of no reputation and took upon himself the form of a servant, wherefore God has highly exalted him."

Editorial

THE addresses of Rev. I. J. Spencer of Lexington, Ky., at the Nebraska State convention, reported in our columns two weeks ago, are suggestive in a marked degree of the shifting emphasis among the Disciples of Christ as we enter the new century. What Mr. Pritchard calls the "climax" of the series of addresses was reached in Mr. Spencer's criticism of our popular slogan, "Where the Bible speaks we speak; and where the Bible is silent we are silent." The Lexington pastor maintained that this motto needed revision. It should read, "Where Christ speaks we speak; and where Christ is silent we are silent." No creed nor personal opinion, nor even the Bible can be made the basis of union among Christians, "but the person of Christ, which is above all these, and the source of the Christian religion is the One, and the only One, in whom all his followers can unite." These are pregnant words. They have been oft spoken before, but rarely with such insight into their significance as Mr. Spencer possesses. The distinction between the two mottoes marks the difference between the two antagonistic conceptions with which the Disciples approach their Centennial. On the one hand there are those who, under the influence of the traditional motto, go forth to unite the Christian world upon the Bible and end by insisting upon their interpretation of the Bible as the basis of union. This, however, is an out-and-out creed, a human creed, and nothing else. It may be a true creed; but, again, like every human creed, it may not be true. That it is not put in written form and formally subscribed to by ministers or members, renders it hardly less rigid and definite than the other creeds against which our fathers and we have, for a century, inveighed. Over against those who hold to this motto stand those who make Christ the basis of unity among Christians. They may hold one view of the Bible or another. They may be conservative or liberal in matters of criticism. They may regard miracles as supernatural interventions of a God residing outside his universe, or they may regard miracles as the exhibition on higher levels of the same divine life that works constantly in nature, or they may have any other theory of miracles. They may interpret specific scripture texts with independent judgment, differing, if they must, from traditional or accepted views. They may hold a dualistic or a monistic or a pluralistic philosophy as their reason compels them. Whatever their views, if with their whole heart they take Jesus Christ as their divine Lord and Savior, believing that he possesses the secret of eternal life for all men, they are Christians, members of the only church Christ has in the world, and ought to be fellowshipped by all who are of like mind with them concerning the Master. The catholic logic of our plea has not yet been clearly worked out. To work it out and boldly to accept its conclusion in our practice and our practical attitude toward other Christian people, is the most pressing necessity of the new century upon which we are about to enter. No better place to begin can be found than where Mr. Spencer begins: in making a sharp contrast between the authority of a body of literature and the authority of the personal Christ.

Heart to Heart

WE have not talked "shop" much in the pages of The Christian Century the past year. Our editorial message and the messages of our contributors, together with the church news, have so completely filled our space that none was left to talk with our friends in a heart to heart fashion about the paper itself.

Throughout the year our mail has been heavy with words of appreciation and encouragement. "You have fought a good fight," one says. And others, "Your stand for liberty has saved the brotherhood from becoming a sect." "I thank you especially for your editorial on 'Talking Religion.'" "The Century—our best paper." "I cannot tell you how much I enjoy the thoroughness with which you are meeting the issues of today." "You are giving us a splendid editorial leadership." "You are giving us the best paper editorially considered put out by the brotherhood in many years." "I take off my hat to you for your last editorial; it is high water mark." "Your paper is the most stimulating and inspiring of any paper published in our own or any other brotherhood." "I should be guilty of a sin of omission if I refrained from expressing to you my deep gratitude and thrilling emotion for your editorials on 'The Re-examination of the Successful Revival.'" "The Century is one paper that gives me a vision of the big things happening beyond the borders of our own brotherhood, and interprets these in the light of our history and plea."

These good words we choose at random from our files of correspondence. We hardly know where to stop when we begin to quote. But we must not use more space in repeating the assurances that have so greatly strengthened and rejoiced us.

The second year of The New Christian Century Company will soon begin. We are projecting our plans for a greatly improved paper, notwithstanding the opinion of one enthusiastic reader that "the Christian Century is just about perfect." We wish to have the practical coöperation of every reader in extending our circulation. If every minister and layman who shares the ideals of this paper would speak to his friends of its worth and get their subscriptions, our list would be increased so that we might indeed make The Christian Century "just about perfect."

At the present moment we are all—readers and editors—making our plans to go to Pittsburgh. Does it occur to you, our readers, what a splendid chance you will have at Pittsburgh to make friends and secure subscribers for The Christian Century? It is a time of social fellowship. Conversations about the church's life and welfare will be hardly less delightful than the public addresses. Every lover of the things for which this paper stands, every sharer of our ideals for our brotherhood, will wish to utilize these conversations for speaking a word for The Christian Century and taking then and there a subscription.

We shall be glad to meet our readers and friends at our exhibit both in Forbes Field at any time during the convention, and we hereby appoint every friend of The Christian Century our agent to receive new subscriptions! If every present reader who attends the convention would bring so much as one other into the ranks, it would greatly forward and strengthen the paper.

Pulpit Carelessness

SUMMER is the time when the minister gets an opportunity to hear his brother ministers, if such a vacation privilege comes to him at any season of the year. And his study of their mannerisms and peculiarities is often of advantage to him in self-criticism. It is not too much to say that one of the minister's chief dangers is his liability to fall into certain habits of speech or of gesture which are limitations of his power as a leader of men. It is astonishing what language some ministers permit themselves in the pulpit, partially growing out of lack of educational preparation, and partially out of a foolish desire to "talk down" to their audiences in colloquial or even slangy terms. No mannerism produces a more painful impression upon intelligent listeners than this.

As a general thing, ministers who have any suitable warrant for preaching have long since gotten past such audacious assaults upon speech as "He gave it to you and I," or "Think of all the blessings received by you and I." A minister who dropped in upon a religious service writes that he heard an able, young man whose sermons were constantly marred by slips of this character. He has plenty of talent, earnestness, a lively fancy, and a good delivery, writes this listener; yet, in a single discourse there were six repetitions of this one irritating mistake of the false use of the nominative. Surely that young man could not have been trained in any institution where attention is given to proper speech.

Another class of bad habits has to do with the use of pet phrases or endearing titles with which the minister frequently addresses his audience, such as "Beloved" or "Dear." Such a mannerism is equally offensive, whether directed at the audience with wearisome iteration or at the deity in the familiar speech of prayer. Other stock expressions, such as "methinks," or "it seems to me," ought to be avoided by the minister who has consideration for the feelings of his listeners.

It is a well known and disquieting fact that too many well informed and otherwise acceptable preachers have not yet sent to the cannery some of their stock expressions which ought to be relegated, if they wish to save their public discourses from the commonness and triteness that these mannerisms give. It would be well if every minister would put up on his study wall a list of phrases to be tabooed, beginning with "that sort of thing" and ending with the tottering veteran, "along this line."

Chicago

A Statement of Conditions and Prospects on the South Side

By Orvis F. Jordan

Ten of the twenty-two churches and missions in Chicago are on the South side. This is true in spite of the fact that we lost two churches on the South side the past year, the only two lost in Chicago during the year. The only new church organized during the year was on the South side. These facts indicate that the South side has much significance for our people.

Of our self-supporting churches, the largest reported membership is that of Memorial church, if we include both Baptists and Disciples who have merged into the union church. Here we have an interesting experiment in practical Christian union. A congregation with an eloquent preacher and no place for him to preach joined with a congregation that had a beautiful meeting house and for two years no settled minister. So far the adjustments have been made surprisingly well and there is no reason to look for anything other than permanent success in the movement.

Harvey Christian Church, W. D. Endres, Pastor.

The Hyde Park church is one of our most interesting churches in Chicago. As an experiment in adjusting the church to its environment, Hyde Park church has much significance. University people represent a small fraction of the total population. They have relatively a greater degree of departure from normal standards than even the slums, though in another direction. They have a different set of interests to which the church must minister. The Hyde Park church has met these special interests with many innovations in church methods and by its church roster shows that it has made reasonable growth in membership and has an unusually high-grade constituency, numbering in its ranks some of the foremost reformers of the city.

The church in Englewood is one of the best congregations in the entire brotherhood. In enthusiasm, spirituality, social service, and loyalty to every good cause, this church ranks high. In money-raising ability, there is no church in Chicago to equal Englewood. This church is located in a different environment, entirely, from the two we have just mentioned and has been as successful in facing the problems of its local environment as the others. Englewood has two living-links in Chicago missions and a foreign living-link, besides giving liberally to every good cause.

We have a self-supporting church on Ashland avenue which has but recently come into independency. The brethren here have been able to fill a local hall at times when their church has not been large enough and seem to have substantial growth in membership this year.

The two churches that we lost this year have stories full of significance. The death of the old Central church revives memories of the long ago. It was, fifteen years ago, our strongest church with nearly a thousand names on the roll and the finest church building in Chicago. The death of such a strong organization in such a comparatively short time challenges our attention. What were the causes? We feel we must tread softly. We may not speak all that is on our mind to speak. Certainly grave mistakes were made. The church did not stand for the high standards of Christian life that it might, at least parts of it. A large and important element in the membership withdrew and formed the First Church, now merged in Memorial. Not only was there this factor, but there is also a story of reckless finance to tell. The congregation had gone hopelessly in debt to build a house beyond their means. They had been careless in the construction and were not able to heat the building. When the crash came after the Columbian Exposition, they were not able to meet their obligations and the long-suffering creditor, John Gunzenhauser of the Batavia Church, had to foreclose. He still owns the building and the tongue-speaking split from the Dowieite church now make the echoes ring with a supposed repetition of Pentecostal linguistic performance. The old Central Church stands as a stately ruin to warn us all that our Christian lives must be above the suspicion of any, and that our finances must be run by sight as well as by faith.

The death of the Garfield Boulevard Church also bears us its lessons. It has had some eminent pastors, among whom was the great evangelist, Updike. All of the pastors have been men of more than ordinary ability. The neighborhood is as restricted as a village in the country. An oasis of American people on the boulevard is surrounded by a solid wall of foreign population employed mostly in the stockyards. It would be impossible, probably, to hope to gather both foreigners and boulevard people into the same church. The little oasis is already sadly over-churched so that hardly a one of the over-numerous protestant churches of the neighborhood are making more than a struggle for mere existence. This calamity stands as a lesson to us to make more careful studies of neighborhoods before entering in.

The church nearest the loop district is the mission church among the negroes. A square or two off the main lines of travel and one enters into a district at Armour avenue and Thirty-sixth street, which is exclusively black. Here the streets swarm with little pickaninnies and a white face is a curiosity. Our Armour Avenue church was founded in 1886, but afterwards disbanded for a while. It acquired its present property through a loan from the C. W. B. M. and has paid all but five hundred dollars of the original three thousand dollar loan. We also have a settlement among the negroes in Englewood run by C. E. Winston. He is proceeding along lines of industrial education. When he failed to convince his white friends of the feasibility of his plans, he went ahead to success without them. He has a thoroughly up-to-date program with more vision to it than is shown by most of his pale-faced brethren.

The remainder of our South side missions have great similarity of problems. South Chicago, West Pullman, Chicago Heights, Harvey and Gary, are all factory districts. In these districts there are the skilled mechanics and foremen who are usually American. The remainder are usually from Slavic races. Our churches in these factory districts are rapidly coming to self-support. Harvey has a beautiful little stone building and with superior equipment and good leadership made the largest net gain of any of our missions last year. West Pullman has a good frame building out of debt and is making good progress. Chicago Heights has an old frame tabernacle. Our best people there will not attend church in such a disreputable building. They must either build or die. They are encouraged to look forward to the former outcome. Two missions in halls are those at South Chicago and Gary. With the handicap of asking people to climb stairs to hear the preaching, they are not making much progress and will not until buildings are provided. All things else being equal, we can say that the church with a good church building comes quickly into self-support and begins to reinforce the whole program in Chicago, while the others may drag along for a generation a millstone around the neck of the brotherhood.

We have completed our brief survey of conditions in Chicago. Of necessity we have barely scratched the surface for lack of space. In many instances a single congregation would lend itself to a study full of missionary significance. In fifteen years we have grown greatly in many ways, but have lost many churches in the process. It is interesting to note that we have never lost a church over a theological issue. We have lost churches through immoral preachers, through bad financial methods, through imprudent locations for missions, and through the natural change of neighborhoods in the city, but none on account of what some of our journalism is pleased to regard the crux of the Chicago situation. Where a single church in our history has divided over theology, we have had divisions often, over ruthless preachwho have stayed to prosecute their schemes at the expense of the peace of the brethren. We have much wreckage from the men who came to storm the city and who left to explain their defeat in a few years compared with the little that has come through a theological situation that has been aggravated all the time from the outside and not from the inside. Yet a single, little theological flurry gets more attention than all the wickedness of a generation.

The future is bright for Chicago with all of our failures. Our equipment is very meagre; we are far behind the rest in membership; but through the years we have developed an esprit de corps. We have all the brands of theology from "anti-ism" and "near-anti-ism" to the most modern brands, but we have learned to live our plea "In opinions, liberty" and work at the job. With this new vision of what things are paramount in importance, we are more ready than ever before to seriously attack the city problem.

On October 3, we observe the day for Chicago missions. Every church in the city will bear its share for the redemption of Chicago.

Armour Ave. (Colored) Church, F. C. Cothran, Pastor.

It is a recent experience to have down-state churches have fellowship in this the greatest missionary problem of Illinois. Last week two Illinois churches sent in offerings. Not only the money but the good-will arouse sentiments of liveliest gratitude. It seems like an omen of a better day. The Chicago Christian Missionary Society will be glad to make suggestions for the observance of Chicago Day to those who inquire.

A Week of Crises in Constantinople

Daily Riots that Threaten Lives of the American Visitors.

By Edward A. Henry

It was on the afternoon of Saturday, October 3, 1908, that the good ship Preussen reached her berth at the mouth of the world-famed Golden Horn, the beautiful harbor of Constantinople, and we went ashore for our first visit in an Oriental city. The strange sights and stranger customs which we met on every hand were most fascinating, but we can not recount them at this time as our purpose in this and our next few articles is to give our readers some idea of the momentous changes which have taken place in the Ottoman Empire during the past year as seen by one residing in the Empire.

Position of the Sultan

As we all know, the Sultan Abdul Hamid had, in July, 1908, granted a constitution to his people and the real ruler of the Empire at the time of our visit was not the Sultan, but the mysterious "Committee of Union and Progress," popularly known as the "Young Turk Party." The eyes of all the world were upon this committee to see whether or not it would prove itself equal to the task of maintaining peace and abolishing the abuses of centuries. No one realized more fully than did those "Young Turks" the inflammable disposition of the Mohammedan peoples on the one hand and the suspicion of the powers on the other. Let them suffer from any great national crisis which the fanatics might claim that the Sultan could have prevented, had he been in power, and the whole Moslem world would be ablaze.

Edward A. Henry.

Let them fail to keep peace and carry out the reforms promised in the constitution and the powers would interfere. If any one ever stood "twixt the devil and the deep blue sea," those "Young Turks" did.

Bulgaria Revolts

With these facts in mind, one can realize our feelings as we stepped out of a funicular railway car on the afternoon of Wednesday, October 7, and heard the news boys shouting an unintelligible jargon which the purchaser of a copy of the afternoon "Le Stamboul" translated to mean that Bulgaria had revolted from the Ottoman Empire, declared her independence and set up a king. That night we kept inside our hotels, for mobs thronged the streets and a wild rumor had it that such a national calamity would break the "Young Turk" power so that the Sultan would rise and crush his enemies in the old way and win back Bulgaria by force of arms. The English embassy was besieged by the mob until the ambassador came out and announced that England would stand by the "Young Turks." Loud cheering followed this announcement and the mob moved on to the Italian and French embassies and heard similar statements and gave more lusty cheers. The American embassy was also visited and the great nation of freedom cheered.

Thursday dawned bright and clear and the beauty of the weather seemed to have inspired a spirit of confidence in the natives. We spent the early afternoon in the grand bazaar and there met a Turk who talked poor English, but gave expression to the universal respect for England's power when he said, "Bulgaria say, 'We have a king.' Ingleese say, 'Who is your king? I don't know your king. You have no king.' In two, maybe three weeks there be no king."

Tide of Trouble Rises

But the tide of trouble had only begun to flow in. About four o'clock the news boys again began a clamor. When we had translated the French paper we found that Austria had annexed Bosnia and Herzogovina. Again there were ugly rumors of the downfall of the "Young Turks." That night the mob was more ugly than the night before. Again it cheered the English, French and Italian embassies, but now it hissed and hooted the Austrians and Germans and, since a London telegram had announced that America would recognize Bulgarian independence if the European powers did, it also hooted the American embassy. With the mob in that humor, it was really dangerous for an Austrian, German or American citizen to be on the street. Many people that night almost held their breath as they asked, "What mean these two disasters so close together? Is a big plot on to overthrow the constitution by showing the weakness of the Young Turks? Can they stem this tide?"

Friday dawned clear again. There was not so much good cheer as on Thursday. People everywhere were discussing the situation and wondering. During the forenoon we learned that the leaders of the mob the night before had been Greeks and Armenians whose only purpose was to stir up a riot, hoping in that way to arouse the powers to dismember the Empire, trusting that such an event would result in freedom for Macedonia and Armenia. The "Young Turks" had shown their wisdom and power by very quietly placing all these leaders under arrest. The whole thing was done so quietly that few people knew of it and no resentment on the part of the natives had been aroused. The foreign residents were assured that order would be maintained.

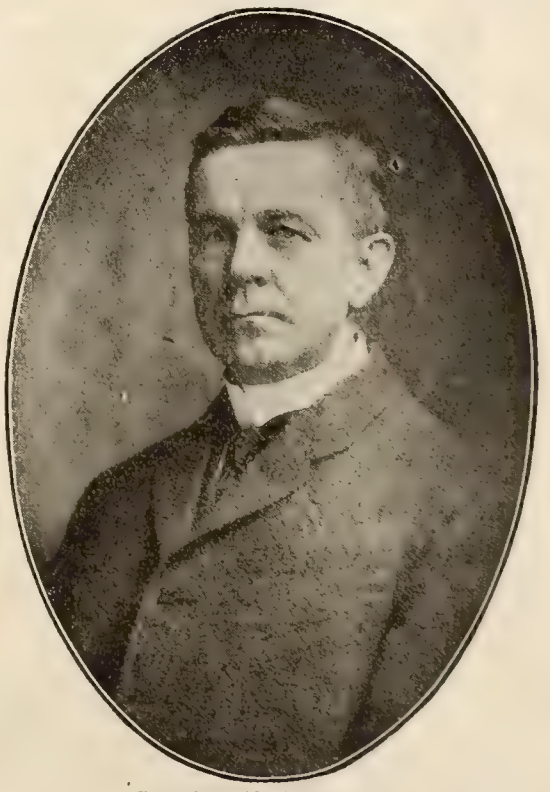
Foreign Residents Tremble

But troubles were not yet over. Late in the afternoon the news boys again became noisy and the papers told the story that Crete, soon to be released from the guardianship of the powers, had announced her intention of applying for admission to the kingdom of Greece. The foreign residents almost turned pale with fear and apprehension. "What next?" were the words on every lip. As evening shades began to lower we looked for a worse mob than ever, possibly riot. But the "Young Turks" had done their work well. No mobs appeared, but instead the steady beat of the watchmen's staves announced through the night that peace and quiet reigned supreme.

Saturday dawned and set without further calamity, and once more we all drew full breaths of confidence. The "Young Turk" party had passed through its first great crisis since the granting of the constitution. It had proven to the world both its power and its wisdom. Strenuous were the days of boycott against Austria which followed, but never again was its life threatened until the great revolt of last April—but we must wait until next time to study that.

Our Church Records

A Business-like Method for the Church.



By Charles M. Fillmore

In his description of the judgment scene, John says, "I saw the dead, the great and the small standing before the throne: and the books were opened." Theologians may differ as to what books are referred to in the passage, but of one thing we may be sure, no reference is made to the record books of the churches. They certainly are the most unreliable set of books to be found anywhere from which to make up righteous judgment. All hail to the Centennial Committee in its attempt to get church records that mean something!

When I became the minister of The Hillside Church of Indianapolis, I was given a little book which, I was told, contained a list of the members. Many of these I never saw at church. Many, I could not find. Many, no one seemed to know anything about. After nearly a year, I invited the elders to my home, and we went over the entire list together, with a view to revising it and making it accurate. We found it necessary to have another meeting and then others.

After much prayer and meditation and counselling together we mapped out our campaign. First, we decided that we wanted an accurate list. Second, we wanted to make the people realize that being a Christian meant business. Third, we believed that the responsibility of deciding the matter of membership should not be arbitrarily settled by the elders, but be placed upon the hearts and consciences of the individuals.

As a basis of our work we resolved to have a "Covenant Service" on the first Sunday in October. A letter was sent to every one on the list whose residence could be found. Conditions were explained and our purpose plainly stated. They were told that if they wished to be enrolled as members upon the new record book, they should sign the enclosed covenant card and turn it in at the "Covenant Service," or mail it to the pastor if unable to be present at the service.

Here is the covenant card:

COVENANT CARD
of the Hillside Christian Church

By the grace of God, I hereby covenant with the members of the Hillside Christian Church, Indianapolis, Ind., to continue steadfastly with them in the teaching of Jesus, in the fellowship, in the breaking of bread and in the prayers.

As the Lord prospers me I will lay by in store that on the First Day of the week I may regularly contribute to the support of the Hillside Church. Fraternally,

.....

Date..... Address.....

The response was most gratifying. The "Covenant Service" was unanimously voted one of the most impressive ever engaged in by those present. After the usual opening exercises with a short sermon on "Covenant Making," based upon Josnua 24 and Acts 2, there was a roll call of members. The congregation then stood. The elders were in the pulpit with the minister. The deacons were in a body at the right of the pulpit.

The first verse of "Blest Be the Tie" was sung. The minister covenanted fidelity in the discharge of the duties of his office. The elders and deacons responded, urging him to diligence in glorifying his ministry. The people responded, promising to pray for him. The minister charged the elders to carry out faithfully the duties of their office. They responded, covenanting to do so. The minister and elders charged the deacons, and they responded, making their covenant. Last of all, minister and people covenanted together. All this in exact scripture quotations. The second and third verses of "Blest Be the Tie" were then sung.

The elders immediately divided among themselves the names of those who had not reported at the service. Non-residents were written, urged to take letters and unite with the congregations in the communities where they were living. Those living in the neighborhood were visited, and given the alternative to enter into renewed covenant relationship with the church or be dropped from its membership. Many took letters, many were never found, a few voluntarily dropped out. Instead of a nominal membership of 365, we obtained a bona fide list of 242, every one of whom could be accounted for.

To those who have a fondness for numbers, it may look as if we made a big blunder. But the board of officers and the entire church are unanimous in saying that the church never was in a healthier, or more efficient working condition. It was voted to make the "Covenant Service" an annual affair, and we are preparing now for its second observance.

We have lost several members during the year by death and removal, but our net gain has brought the membership up to three hundred. Very few of these will be dropped off by the next "Covenant Service."

But the board of officers is not satisfied to have a large list of nominal members, and early in the spring after several weeks' consultation, it was decided that every member of the church would be expected to pay at least five cents per week to the current expenses of the church unless excused by the elders. The finance committee apportioned the members. A quarterly report is to be printed showing the exact financial standing of every member. Following the publication of the first quarterly report the elders visited those who were delinquent for the quarter, asking if their apportionment was too large; if they must be excused from contributing from inability; or, if they would meet the obligation. The results of the work have been extremely encouraging.

At the last monthly meeting of the board of officers it was agreed that the general condition of the membership was gratifying, and that we are entering upon our fall and winter work under most auspicious conditions. We must have a new building. We have plans and specifications calling for a $15,000 structure. The plans for financing it are outlined.—but as this article is already too long, I must pass that by. But I would say this: while we feel confident at Hillside that we have solved the problem of an exact and reliable method of enrolling our membership so far as we are concerned, we do not claim universal success for it. We do believe, however, that the plan will solve the problem if faithfully carried out in most of the churches. But it will not work itself. It requires faithful, patient, persevering labor by elders who are devoted to the church, and sincerely desire its prosperity and success. If any one can show us how to improve upon the plan and make it more efficient for the Master's service, we will thank him. If any one wishes our counsel in helping to carry it out, it will be cheerfully given.

Religious Education

The Graded Sunday-School

By Harry F. Burns

The Texas Sunday-school Association, at its last annual meeting, requested a number of pastors of the various denominations to prepare articles on Religious Education to be published in their denominational journals. The following word written by H. B. Robinson, pastor at El Paso, Texas, is in response to this request.

AN EDUCATIONAL BASIS.

The effort to realize the watchword "All the church and as many more in the Bible School" calls forth another more important slogan, "Every Bible School worth being in." The efforts of earnest workers are making schools and classes large. They generate enthusiasm. "Hurrahing" all the time to keep a crowd leaves little opportunity or even inclination for other interests. "Hurrah" is most excellent now and then as a picnic meal, but as a regular diet it gives very unsatisfactory results. Wisdom, not arrogant detraction, has asked "When is a school not a school?" and answers "When it is a Sunday-school."

Such an estimate of the Sunday-school makes even thoughtful people indifferent toward it, and embarrasses those who work in it. The school must be such that parents may know that their children receive the same skilful classification, adaptation and teaching that they receive in the day school and that the Bible School is more fruitful for daily conduct and character than the school of any week day. Such assurance in the heart of the parent will greatly help to fill the school with earnest pupils and keep order when it is full. Such a school cannot be without trained teachers. The school that does not demand trained teachers courts failure. If all the teachers and prospective teachers are not trained, organize a training class for them now.

The results of no teaching or poor teaching do not stop with the school as such. The church is directly affected. The estimate that there are a million unattached Disciples, even if it be wide of the mark, is enough to cause the wisest in the brotherhood to write a new series of books upon church polity and put them in the curriculum of every Bible college and into the hands of all the officers of every church. It is enough to make every evangelist know that he is a derelict if he does not strive earnestly to leave every convert in a permanent class under an efficient teacher. Churches should be training the teachers now for the revival they expect to have next year.

Mr. Robinson here lays his finger upon the present weakness of the Sunday-school. Its work has usually not been upon a basis that would command the respect of educators. It has been a work not of education, but of exhortation. But this disheartening condition is rapidly passing. Church workers are taking the task of Religious Education seriously. They are seeking to make the Sunday-school an educational force. With many, this desire even outweighs the desire for numbers. The desire must become purpose. As purpose it must become clearly defined. We must make clear to ourselves just what is necessary that the work of the Sunday-school may have educational value. What is essential that the Sunday-school may be a school indeed?

I. Graded Classes.

First, the school must be graded. The necessity of a graded school is no longer questioned. But when is a school graded? When it is more or less clearly divided into departments? The separation of the school into divisions there must be. But the grading must go farther. The departments themselves must be graded, before the school has a right to claim the honor of being a graded school. The interests, capacities and needs of children change rapidly. Between a boy of seven and a boy of ten there is a great gulf fixed. The boys recognize this, and boys of these divergent ages do not group together in their play. The teacher must be as wise.

The classification may be either according to age, or according to the standing in the public school. Usually there must be a modification of either principle to meet the needs of individual cases. The system of the public school offers a convenient plan for grading. It is as follows:

Elementary Division

Kindergarten—three to six years of age.
First Grade—Six years.
Second Grade—Seven years.
Third Grade—Eight years.
Fourth Grade—Nine years.
Fifth Grade—Ten years.
Sixth Grade—Eleven years.
Seventh Grade—Twelve years.
Eighth Grade—Thirteen years.

Secondary Division

Ninth Grade—Fourteen years.
Tenth Grade—Fifteen years.
Eleventh Grade—Sixteen years.
Twelfth Grade—Seventeen years.

Each grade may contain a number of classes. In some schools, for lack of pupils, it may be necessary to omit certain grades entirely, but the system as a whole should be maintained.

II. Graded Lessons.

Then there must be the graded lessons. The time for topical exhortations in the Sunday-school has passed. The churches are now demanding systematic instruction. In this systematic work the child is the center of interests. Its changing interests and capacities must determine what shall be presented to it at each advancing stage of its development. This principle, which has been so carefully and scientifically worked out in the public school, is now being applied to the Sunday-school. The plan for graded International lessons, presented last week, is evidence of the scope of this movement. Let us hope that every school, which has in it a reader of the Christian Century will at least advance to the ground recommended by the International Sunday-school Association.

III. Graded Teachers.

For this work we must have also graded teachers. This is most important of all. A good teacher will be able to do some sort of work with nearly any scheme of lessons, and with almost any sort of class; but an unskilful teacher will defeat the purposes of even the most perfectly organized school. Our great imperative need is of teachers who know something and who know how to teach it. I will refrain from caricaturing the teaching (?) often seen in the Sunday-school. But has your heart not ached as you have (when visiting a school, not your own) watched the teacher who has been pressed into service because there was no one else to take the class? Have you not pitied the children as this teacher groped around for something to say, and punctuated her remarks with exhortations to attention. Your imagination can supply the details of the picture—I wish it could not. The picture is a sad one. To change it, and it is being changed, we must require more than piety of our Sunday-school teachers. They must be good. But it is as necessary that they be "apt to teach." Your friend may be ever so good a man, and deeply interested in your welfare, but that it not sufficient ground for calling him as your physician, or trusting him to use the surgeon's knife. The teacher must be trained to teach.

Where shall we get the trained teacher? This is the question of questions. Given trained teachers, and other essentials to successful Sunday-school work must follow. To get trained teachers we must train them. Teacher training, then, is the fundamentally important work before the church. But who will do it, and how shall they do it? These questions let us hold over until next week, when we shall talk of teacher training.

President Eliot on "The Religion of the Future"

The meagre and conflicting newspaper reports of President Eliot's recent lecture before the Harvard Summer School of Theology were the cause of so many discussions and misunderstandings that it is gratifying to see that the complete text of the address has been given to the public in the October issue of the Harvard Theological Review.

This number also includes an important article by Professor Royce on "What is Vital in Christianity"; a discussion of "Modern Methods in New Testament Philology," by Dr. Angus of Hartford Theological Seminary; and articles on the philosopher Eucken and on Froude by Rev. N. Brown and Rev. Paul Revere Frothingham.

And hayyp human hearts heard, in their speec
"Joy is a duty"—so with golden lore
The Hebrew rabbis taught in days of yore,
And happy human hearts heard, in their speech,
Almost the highest wisdom men can reach.

But one bright peak still rises far above,
And there the Master stands whose name is Love,
Saying to those whom weary tasks employ:
"Life is divine when Duty is a Joy."

THE FINDING OF CAMILLA

CHAPTER XXI (Continued)

Camilla Gives a Performance.

Camilla was relieved, trustingly relieved by Roger Densham's company. The one fear at her heart about going that distance alone was now taken away, and the child dared to be as happy as she could with Pierre lying ill.

And Mr. Densham, if he wondered why he was taking all this trouble for Rexington Falconer's child, and turning himself into a sick nurse for a French traveling showman for whom he cared not a brass farthing, made answer to himself that it was only to save the child from falling into the clutches of "that black-hearted villian Bartoletti." What was to be the end of it he knew not. Nor why the Frenchman had subjected the child entrusted to his care to these ceaseless journeyings, instead of handing her over directly to her grandparents, as he had no doubt the dying father had commissioned him to do.

"When Monsieur Francais is conscious and able to talk, he will have to give me a reason for all this," was his inward thought as he strode along. "But until then I will not meddle in the affair."

He talked by-and-bye to Camilla, and made her talk to him, but found that she was singularly silent about the last few months of her life. Nothing of the shipwreck, nothing of her father's death, nothing of the life she had led since then with Pierre did she speak of. Of her life abroad she spoke cheerfully, and a stranger might easily have come to the conclusion that the "we" she spoke of referred to herself and to the man she now called "grandfather."

"A discreet little damsel," thought Roger Densham, casting sidelong glances at her every now and then.

And in her discreetness, and in her sober, old-fashioned air of expressing herself, he traced another likeness to the mother he had known and loved.

They reached Charnford before long, and Camilla's relief was great when she found that her new friend intended to stay and see her through the whole performance. A corner was chosen as one most likely to attract attention and yet not obstruct the general traffic. A crowd soon came round when Camilla began to tune her violin and start a simplt waltz tune.

Densham thought she would fare better were he to join in the crowd, where she could see him and yet not seem to belong to him. And so from a distance he viewed he performance, and marvelled to think that so young a child should have gained the knowledge she had in só short a time.

Bebe and Jules danced right merrily, and bowed and chassed so gracefully that the onlookers were filled with delight. Chicot, too, did his part just as well as if his master had been present. It was Taras who proved the troublesome one. "Take a horse to the water, but you cannot make him drink," is an old saying, and Taras who had been brought to the performance sulkily refused to perform.

He sat in his admiral's uniform and calmly contemplated the crowd, clapping his hands in an indifferent manner whenever Camilla urged him to do his part with the skipping rope. Bebe and Jules held out the rope invitingly towards him, but Taras looked above and beyond it, and winked knowingly at the crowd.

Poor little Camilla! She thought the performance must be a failure, if Taras refused to take his part. Moreover, she dared not pass him over for fear of his falling into the same bad behavior every day, for to give Taras the usual inch this time was to allow him to take a very big ell the next time. She cast an imploring glance at Jacques.

The poodle had been sternly observant of all the monkey's misdemeanors. At Camilla's look he left her side, and seizing Taras by his uniform lifted him high, and, giving him a tremendous shake that must have made the monkey's teeth rattle, deposited him in Camilla's lap.

The jeering laughter of the crowd changed to one of admiring cheers. The audience thought it was all a part of the performance. Taras found he was an object of interest. Admiration was dear to his soul. He sat up and shook himself, with a vicious glance, however, in the poodle's direction.

"To please me, dear Taras," whispered Camilla in his ear.

And forthwith the monkey made play with the skipping rope, and then danced on the tight rope to the uproarious laughter of the bystanders.

Jacques' part was done as cheerfully and as faithfully as if his master had been present. Then Camilla rose from her seat with a trembling nervous fluttering at her poor little heart. Throughout the time she had been dreading this portion of the performance which she had made up her mind must be gone through to make up for any little irregularities due to the Frenchman's absence. The thought of working for Pierre alone kept her up.

Daintily lifting ends of her skirt as the Frenchman had taught her to do, she danced. Danced as none of those now looking on could have danced or could ever have seen such dancing. On her toes she pirouetted, now this way, now that, whirling this way, whirling that, till at length she came to a full stop, and with a low bow stepped back beside the poodle who had watched her every movement like a sentinel on guard.

The clappings of the crowd were loud and long. It chanced to be market day at Charnford, and the farmers collected round vowed they had not enjoyed their day so much for a long time. Only one person's face bore a cloud on witnessing the final performance. That face was Roger Densham's.

"She must never do so again," he muttered through his shut teeth. "What! the daughter of Madeleine make herself a dancer for these gamins to gaze at and to applaud!"

His brow still bore the cloud as Taras sprang nimbly about holding out his tin mug for money. Then the monkey with an audacious grin paused before him, and held the mug out. Mr. Densham looked into it. Only coppers lay there, and not too many of them. He looked up and saw Camilla's face looking eagerly round at the crowd. It was flushed with excitement, and bore a look of such strained anxiety that Roger Densham's heart was touched, and a feeling of intense compassion for the child took possession of him.

The monkey was passing him by with a queer look of disappointment on his mischievous face. Mr. Densham stayed him with an uplifted hand. Then thrusting the other into his pocket he brought out a fistful of coins. There was more silver than copper, and a gold piece glistened amongst it. He poured the whole lot into the outstretched mug. It weighed it down, and the monkey had to put his other hand to help to hold it up.

He cocked his eye into the mug, and saw what he knew to be a gold coin amongst the rest. With a low bow he turned away, and carried it straight to Camilla. The mug was full! As full as it could hold!

Camilla's eyes—those childlike eyes that Roger Densham said impatiently to himself ought not to know as yet a gold piece from a silver—glistened as the monkey's had done at seeing so much wealth in one day. With an old-fashioned air she brought out a bag from her pocket, and slipped the contents of the mug into it. Then drawing the string round it she put it back into her pocket.

"The very thing that would cause some of these fellows to give her a knock on the head in some lonely part on her way home," thought Mr. Densham to himself, "and she would have no one to stand by her."

No one to stand by her! One glance at Jacques would be sufficient to make a ruffian quail. Mr. Densham's eyes rested on the poodle as he stood beside her, and as he looked he withdrew his last words.

"But he's only a dog," he said to himself again.

Ay, only a dog, but in faithfulness and intelligence more than a match for many a human being. No fear of any one injuring Camilla while Jacques is near; no fear of any one attempting to rob that little bag while Jacques stalks solemnly by her side.

The performance was over. The crowd began to disperse. Only a few loungers stayed behind to see the end of the little girl and her performing animals. Camilla's heart was light. Her nervous fear had gone. That bag—hidden away in her pocket—contained enough to pay for the doctor and his medicine. She looked blithely up at Roger Densham as he approached. Her little face had lost the careworn expression it had worn whilst Taras was collecting the money.

"Such a lot!" she whispered to him as he slung the violin case across his shoulder for the homeward journey. "Such a lot of money!"

"And what will you do with it?" he asked.

"It will go toward the doctor's bill and the medicine for grandfather, and perhaps pay our lodging for the week."

To get them to some purer eminence
Than any hitherto beheld for clouds!
What height we know not,—but the way we know
And how by mounting aye, we must attain,
And so climb on. It is the hour for souls;
That bodies, leavened by the will and love,
Be lightened to redemption. The world's old;
But the old world waits the hour to be renewed:
Toward which, new hearts in individual growth
Must quicken, and increase to multitude
In new dynasties of the race of men.

—E. B. Browning in "Aurora Leigh."

Bringing Autumn In

Annie Willis McCullough in October St. Nicholas.

Grandma's paring apples,
  Sign that's full of cheer;
Summer's nearly over,
  Autumn's nearly here.
Cozy evenings coming,
  Mornings brisk and cool;
Long vacation ended,
  Busy times at school.

Grandma's paring apples,
  Some of them she dries,
Some make sauce and puddings,
  Some make spicy pies.
Pantry smells delicious,
  Nicest time o' year;
Children with their baskets
  Roam the orchard-side.

Grandma's paring apples,
  Nicest time o' year;
Firelight and lamplight
  Fill the house with cheer.
Odors sweet in cellar,
  Rosy fruit in bin;
Grandma, paring apples,
  Brings the autumn in!

My Picnic

The Story of "I" and Rob and Gamboge on the Lonely Island.

Marian Warner Wildman in October St. Nicholas.

I am afraid that that title will make you think, gentle reader, that the picnic of which I am about to tell you is the only one to which I ever went. That is far from the truth. No, indeed, it wasn't the only one—and I eleven years old the ninth of September! The fact is, I have been going on picnics as long as I can remember, big picnics and little picnics, nice picnics and stupid picnics, picnics on the seashore, and picnics in the woods, and picnics upon the tiptops of mountains. I dare say no child was ever more fortunate in the picnic line than I have been. But the picnic I am now about to tell you of was the very nicest one I ever had, and that is why I shall think of it as my picnic as long as I live and breathe. Another reason for calling it my picnic is that I was the only one at it. Except, of course, Rob Roy and little Gamboge. But they don't come in till later, as you will soon see.

In the first place, I had better tell you about my ancestry and so forth, and then that will be over with. You are not a bit anxiouser, gentle reader, than I am to get at the picnic part. But I must explain a little, first.

My father is an artist and paints the most beautiful pictures in the world. Some of them we sell, but we have a great many left. He is the jolliest father you ever heard of, too, and perfectly splendid at corn roasts and things. Probably he would have been at this very picnic if he hadn't been so busy painting a picture of mother standing in the red sumacs that grow along the top of our bluff.

You see, what I am about to relate took place on Turtle-Back Island, where we spent all the summer, last year, and all the fall up to Thanksgiving week.

It's a lovely place, and we liked it all the time, but the very best was after all the summer people had gone away and we had every bit of the island to ourselves. The day the last family except ours went away, we stood on the bluff, father and mother and I, and watched the steamer out of sight around the other end of the island; and then we all joined hands and had a dance of delight, and father shouted just as loud as he could that poem of Robinson Crusoe's about:

> "I am monarch of all I survey
> My right there is none to dispute!"

Finally mother got all out of breath dancing and laughing, and she had to be fanned with father's hat while I found her hairpins.

I see I forgot to describe mother when I was telling about my ancestry. She is something like other mothers, but nicer; and she knows the names of all the butterflies and birds on Turtle-Back Island—spangled fritillaries and tufted titmouses and all those hard ones.

I think I have now got nearly to the picnic part.

It was upon the thirtieth day of September that the last of the summer people went away, and after that we were all alone and never saw a soul for a whole month and most of another one, except old Uncle Johnnie MacDonald, who came over from the mainland every day in his sailboat to bring us milk and mail and things, because the steamer had stopped running. Mother let me wander anywhere I wanted to, because there was no one to molest or make me afraid. That is how it happened that one beautiful morning in October I asked her if I might take my lunch in a basket and go around by the beach clear to the other side of the island, where the big mansions are that they call "cottages" but that aren't. Mother said I might go, but that it was a pretty long walk and she was afraid I would get tired. I told her I knew I shouldn't, and so she packed my little basket full of lunch and covered it with a napkin. I didn't once watch to see what she was putting in, because I wanted it for a surprise. Then I went down the steps cut in the bluff and started north along the beach, and father and mother stood up above in the red sumacs and waved their hands and called good-by.

The lake was blue as blue and all sparkly with whitecaps, and the little waves made so much noise among the rocks that I wouldn't have know I was singing except for the feeling in my throat. By and by I came to the place where the beach gets broad and sandy and the beach-grass is taller than my head. There are great beautiful clumps of it there, and they wave in the wind like plumes. When I got to the first of the big cottages, I climbed up some stairs so I could see it better. Of course it was all shut up tight, and it looked sort of funny and lonesome. I hadn't meant to go in, but as I was walking slowly I noticed some nasturtiums in blossom by the piazza, and I thought I'd better pick a few for mother, since there was no one there to enjoy them. So I went in and was picking the flowers, when all of a sudden I heard footsteps pattering around the corner of the porch. At first I was a little frightened, but in just a minute I wasn't, for there before my face and eyes stood my own dear, darling Rob Roy. Of course I didn't know then that it was Rob Roy, but I did know right off that he wouldn't dream of biting me. He just stood looking at me and wagging his tail in a sort of slow, droopy way, and after a while he began to make soft little whines, and I knew he was trying to tell me all about it. I put my arms around his shaggy old neck and hugged him hard, and told him he didn't need to try to explain. I understood perfectly how it happened. We've been to a great many summer resorts, father and mother and I, and we know all too well how wicked lots of the summer people are about going home in the fall and leaving their pets behind. They always say: "Oh, they'll find a home! Some one will take them in!" And once in a while some one does, but just as often some one doesn't. It's the poor kitties that are the worst sufferers, and it almost breaks my heart to think how many little birds they have to eat to keep from starving.

I might as well tell you right here, gentle reader, that afterward we learned that Rob Roy's family had forgotten all about him till they had got started away on the boat. and that all they did when they remembered was to send word to Uncle Johnnie MacDonald that if he ever saw a black-and-tan collie dog when he was at Turtle-Back, to take it over to the mainland and give it to any one who would have it. They told him the dog wasn't thoroughbred and they didn't care anything about it. Perhaps it is just as well for me not to dwell too long on what we think of such people. It might spoil the story of my picnic.

We hadn't known each other more than twenty-five seconds before we understood, Rob Roy and I, that we belonged to each other. I told him that he was to be my dog and that I'd take care of him, and the minute I said that he looked at my lunch basket. Poor dear, I hadn't thought before that he must be almost starved! It was more than a week since the last of the summer people had gone away, and he couldn't have had anything to eat since except the few scraps he could pick up and the dead fish on the beach, of which he is still, I grieve to state, fonder than we could wish. I suppose he formed the habit during those dreadful days of hunger before I rescued him. Of course I opened my lunch basket at once and gave him a sandwich. It had cold chicken in it and looked very good. The poor dog enjoyed it so much that I gave him another and another and another. There were only four, but I filled him up fairly well on cookies and spongecake and hard boiled eggs. There wasn't anything else but a bottle of milk, and I hadn't anything to pour that into, so I had to tell him that he must wait till we got home for more. He was very nice about it, licked up the last cooky crumb from the piazza floor, and followed close after me as I went back down the steps to the beach.

We decided to go around the point and home that way. That is a nice thing about an island: you don't have to go back the way you came. If you keep on long enough you get to the place you started from. We walked slowly along the beach for quite a way. Rob Roy was hunting for dead fish, and I was looking up at the big cottages along the bluff. We had just passed the last of them when I suddenly noticed that I was a little tired. I thought I would sit down for a minute under a willow tree and take a drink of milk from my bottle. Gentle reader, it was while I was in the very act of uncovering my lunch basket again that I heard a mysterious sound. It seemed to come from the thick bushes that grew all over the bluff, which wasn't very steep right there.

"Tinkle—tankle—tinkle—tankle—"

What could it be?

Once I should have thought of fairies, but I—well, I wouldn't for the world have the fairies think I didn't love them just as much, and of course there are times yet when I just do believe in them. There was that day last winter, at "Peter Pan," you know.

"Tinkle—tankle—tinkle—"

The sound came nearer and nearer. I fairly held my breath. And then, all at once, out from under the bushes popped my little Gamboge—my dearest, sweetest, loveliest yellow kitten that ever wore a bell around its precious neck! Of course I didn't know then that it was Gamboge. (It was father who suggested his name and mother who suggested Rob Roy's.) But I knew he was to be my kitten, just the way I'd known Rob was my dog.

Gentle reader, can you imagine a person cruel enough to abandon a poor little helpless yellow kitten to its fate on a desert island? I wish I could think the same family that left Rob Roy had left the kitten. That would be better than to feel that dear old Turtle-Back has to have two families so "outrageous and undesirable," as father said.

I fear, however, that Rob and Gamboge had never met till this eventful day. If they had been old acquaintances I feel sure that dear, kind Rob would never have done the dreadful thing he did do when he came back from his last dead fish and found me cuddling and comforting Gamboge under the willow. For before I knew what he was doing, Rob came bouncing at the kitten with great barks, and poor little Gamboge, scared half out of his wits, had jumped out of my arms and was flying across the beach with his tail as big as an Angora's. Of course Rob Roy went after him, helter-skelter, and I couldn't do anything but stand and scream at Rob to come back, which he didn't. (I have always thought that if I had had a name to call him then he would have minded me, but all I could call him was "Sir," and of course he didn't mind that.) Little Gamboge, in his blind terror, ran right down to the water's edge, and before my horror-stricken gaze up came a good-sized wave and washed him right off his paws and out into the deep. Rob Roy plunged after, and in a minute had the kiten in his mouth. At first I was too terrified to speak, but suddenly I had an inspiration, and I began to call: "Bring it here, sir! Bring it here! Good dog, bring it to me, sir!" And, if you'll believe it, Rob brought that kitten straight to me and let we take it out of his mouth. There he stood, looking up at it and wagging his tail, and I think he thought I would throw it in again for him to fetch.

Rob Roy, you know, had been bringing me sticks to throw in all the time we had been on the beach together. I think it is needless to say that his cruel desire was not gratified.

I had to be very stern after that with Rob. I made him lie down on the beach while I took little Gamboge back to the willow shade, dried his soaked yellow fur on my dress and soothed his fears. Then I found a clean clamshell and poured some of the milk into it. He lapped it up so hungrily that, if you could have seen him, it would have made you feel the way I do, gentle reader, about those summer people that left him. I filled the clamshell again and again till he'd had every bit there was in the bottle, and then he cuddled down in my lap and began to purr.

I felt that the moment had arrived for him and Rob Roy to become friends, so I got a firm though gentle grip on Gamboge, around his body, behind the front legs (they scratch least when you hold them that way), and then I called Rob, who had gone off on another fish hunt.

It was an anxious moment when he approached. However, the kitten seemed braver for the nourishment it had taken. In fact, I doubt if he could have run very far. That was a very good-sized bottle of milk. And as soon as Rob really understood that I didn't want him to hurt the kitten, he behaved himself very well. At the end of about half an hour they would sniff noses without barking or spitting, and I felt that the worst was over. And my hands had got only a few little scratches.

The rest of the way home seemed longer than I had expected, for I was quite tired and a good deal hungry. But, oh, gentle reader, it had been such a happy picnic!

In the Magazines

McClures.

"The Most Powerful Man in America," by Burton J. Hendrick, a dispassionate review of E. H. Harriman's career as a railroad magnate; "The Ominous Hush in Europe," a paper by H. R. Chamberlain on the possibilities of war between Germany and Great Britain; "Eusapia Palladino, the Despair of Science," by Hereward Carrington, who personally investigated the famous Naples medium who has puzzled Lombroso, Flammarion and other eminent scientists; and "The Vampire of the South," the story of the ravages of the hookworm disease in the South, by Maron Hamilton Carter, form the leading features of McClure's Magazine for October. In addition to these articles Lieutenant Shackleton tells of his dash for the South Pole, and there are a number of good short stories: "On Kindilini" by John Fleming; "The Problem" by Oscar Graeve; "The Man Who Went Back" by W. R. Hopkins; and "Pioneer Goes Suffragette" by Helen Green.

Success.

(Orison Swett Marden in "Success Magazine.")

We hear a great deal of criticism of the greed of rich men, which keeps them pushing ahead after they have more money than they can ever use to advantage, but the fact is many of these men find their reward in the exercise of their powers, not in amassing money, and greed plays a comparatively small part in their struggle for conquest.

Of course this is not true of all rich men. Many of them are playing the game, and keep on playing it, for the love of accumulating. Their selfishness and greed have been indulged so long that they amount to a passion, and the accumulators oftentimes become money-mad.

But the higher type of man plays the game, from start to finish, for the love of achievement; because it satisfies his sense of duty, of justice; plays it because it will make him a larger, completer man; because it satisfies his passion for expansion, for growth. He plays the game for the training it gives, for the opportunity of self-expression. He feels that he has a message to deliver to mankind, and that he must deliver it like a man.

Atlantic.

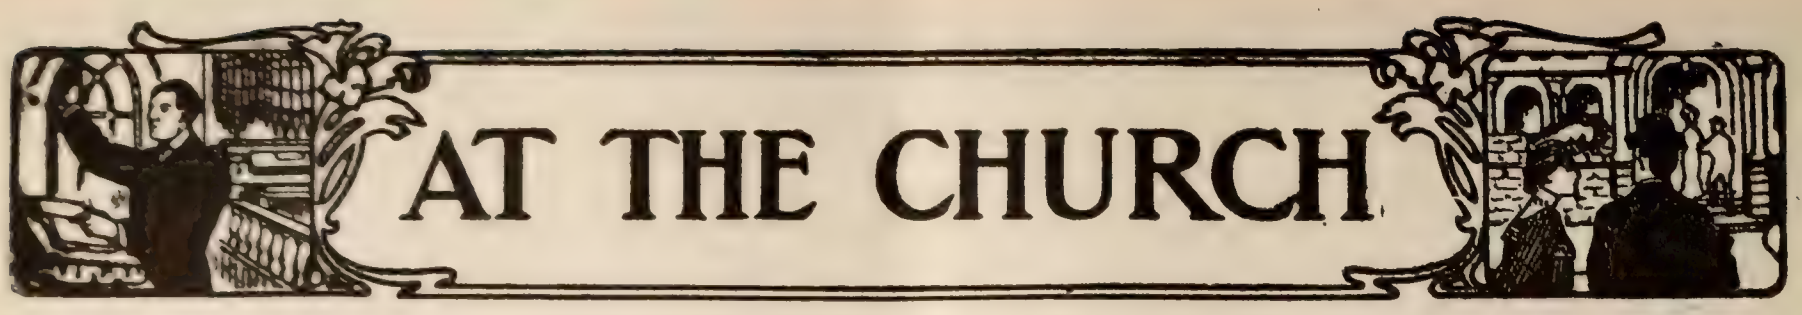
S. M. Crothers, in the August Atlantic.

Dr. Holmes stood aloof from many of the "reforms" of his day. Yet he too was "a soldier in the battle for the liberation of humanity." In The Professor at the Breakfast Table there are keen thrusts against theological dogmatism and bigotry. No wonder that the book was for a time in danger of being placed on the Protestant Index Expurgatorius. There was often consternation at the breakfast-table, and much shaking of heads. "It was undeniable that on several occasions the Little Gentleman had expressed himself with a good deal of freedom on a class of subjects which, according to the Divinity Student, he had no right to form an opinion upon." And the Professor himself was no better.

Dr. Holmes lived to see the battle for religious toleration won, at least in the community in which he lived, and says of the once-startling opinions of the Professor, "That which was once an irritant may now act as an anodyne, and the reader may nod over pages which, when they were first written, would have worked him into a paroxysm of protest and denunciation."

But it is in The Poet at the Breakfast-Table that Dr. Holmes is fighting a battle which is still on. As he was an enemy of Bigotry so he was an enemy of Pedantry. Born in the same year with Darwin, he felt the change which was taking place in the ideals and methods of education. The old classical culture was giving way to the new discipline of science. As a scientific man, he sympathized with the new methods. But he perceived that as there was a pedantry of classical scholarship, so there was developing a scientific pedantry, which was equally hostile to any generous and joyous intellectual life.

American.



Ray Stannard Baker, writing in the September American Magazine on what he calls "The Faith of the Unchurched," says that he was surprised not long ago, when he was told by one of the foremost church laymen in New York City, in answer to his query as to why the churches were losing ground, that the trouble was the lack of money." Mr. Baker continues:

"By this, he said, he did not, of course, mean to imply that money in itself would make a church successful, or the lack of it would necessarily mean failure.

"'But money giving,' he explained, 'that is, spontaneous money giving, is the surest evidence of vital human interest. A man does not voluntarily give his good dollars to a cause unless that cause really stirs him: and we in the churches must face the fact that people are no longer giving to the churches as they once did.'

"This remark set me to examining somewhat carefully the long lists of bequests and benevolences of the past few years in this country: and I have been astonished to find

Paul and Felix*

The soldiers, who were commissioned to remove Paul from the danger of Jerusalem to secure quarters at the Roman city of Cæsaret on the coast, delivered their prisoner over to the keeping of the governor on the day following their departure from the Tower of Antonia. Probably the first section of that journey at night was made in rapid time for foot-soldiers, for there was always danger that their plan might be discovered and they might be pursued by the fanatical Jews. There would have been no serious danger even in that case, because Roman troops were skilled in dealing with rioters, but it was safer to be away from the place where contentions between soldiers and citizens always provoked official inquiry. Stopping at Antipatris on the journey to the northwest, the centurions next day dismissed the foot-soldiers and allowed them to return to Jerusalem. The little company of seventy horsemen went on with Paul and arrived at Cæsarea probably on the evening of that day. The apostle was delivered over to the governor to whom the chief captain at Jerusalem had written a letter in explanation of the matter. Until Paul's accusers arrived from Jerusalem he was kept in a portion of the old Herodian palace in which the Roman governor, Felix, lived.

The Jewish Deputation.

Five days later a company of Jews came down from Jerusalem to Caesarea, headed by Annas or Ananias, the high priest, and a certain lawyer of repute, named Tertullus. As his name seems to imply, he may have been a Roman. The choice of such a man as an advocate would doubtless strengthen the case of Paul's accusers. The character given to Felix by Josephus, the Jewish historian, is far from favorable. He was both weak and cruel. Yet probably the Jews, though they hated and detested him, found it worth while to take the most adequate means of securing his favor, and so employed the Roman lawyer. On the other hand, Paul, who must have been aware of the character of the man, used as far as possible the courtesy which a wise prisoner is perhaps compelled to employ in facing a judge.

The Judgment Hall.

The hearing probably took place immediately after the arrival of the Jewish deputation in Caesarea. They would wish not to be kept longer than was necessary, and probably hoped to secure Paul's condemnation without delay. The scene was the audience chamber of Felix. Paul was brought in as a prisoner and the Jewish deputation took its place, headed by the priest and the lawyer. The Roman guards and attendants made up the remainder of the audience, unless some of the Christian community, Paul's friends of earlier days and members of the church in Caesarea, were able to secure admission.

The Roman Lawyer.

Tertullus began by complimenting the governor upon his administration and the privileges which he secured for the people,—a sentiment which must have found little echo in the hearts of the Jews present. After this preface he started in at once with his accusations against Paul, which fell under three heads: first, he was a disturber of the peace in Jerusalem; second, in the Jewish communities throughout the world he had stirred up strife as a ring-leader of the hated sect called Nazarenes. This was the term of contempt which the Jews employed in speaking of the followers of Jesus. The third point in the accusation was that Paul had tried to profane the temple at Jerusalem by his presence there, accompanied by gentiles who had no right in the holy building. The character of these charges we know from previous acquaintance with the facts. They had just enough of truth to seem plausible, but their falsity as statements of fact is clear to the reader. The lawyer, however, attempted to fortify his case by insisting that if Felix would examine the prisoner himself, he would easily discover the truth of all the charges they made. His address was followed by others from the Jewish deputation to the same purpose.

Paul's Defense.

Then the governor turned to Paul and nodded to him to speak. The apostle began, as usual, with a courteous reference to Felix. But the point which he especially made was the fact that a man acquainted, as was Felix, with Jewish affairs would be able to see the hollowness of the charges made against him, because he had arrived in Jerusalem too recently to be a serious disturber of the peace. Beyond this, Paul denied flatly that he had ever stirred up any strife. The only point which could be urged against him was the fact that he had stood as an advocate of the resurrection, which some of them in that presence maintained to be a doctrine implicit in the Jewish faith itself. Paul had maintained a clear conscience in all of his conduct. His arrival in Jerusalem after some years was for the very purpose of aiding his people by gifts of money for the poorer members of the church, and he had made offerings at the temple, by which Paul probably referred to the completion of the vows which had brought him daily into the temple as a worshipper. More than this, he insisted that his enemies who had brought the charges in Jerusalem should have been there before Felix to make their accusations.

The Opinion of Felix.

The address of Paul seems to have made a favorable impression upon the governor. A man with any shrewdness would have seen the shallowness of the charges, at least from the standpoint of Roman interest in law and order. In questions of theology Felix had no interest. He was only attempting to administer the police duties of the province, and it was clear that Paul had committed no crime worthy of condemnation. So he remanded the apostle to a mild imprisonment, where he had considerable freedom and daily opportunity to meet his friends in Caesarea.

A Private Interview.

The governor showed his shrewdness by not offending the Jewish deputation. He did not decide, but only put off the matter for a later hearing. But in the meantime he seems to have wished both to know more of Paul's personality and to gratify his Jewish wife, Drusilla, who had expressed her curiosity to see this strange prisoner. In this private interview Paul spoke with enthusiasm on the great questions of conduct and duty. He must have known something of Felix' own corrupt life as a taker of bribes and an oppressor of the people, as well as of his unjustifiable conduct in marrying his wife, whom he forcibly divorced from her husband for this purpose. To such a man's conscience the calm, earnest, warning words of Paul were full of terrifying significance. He did not need to denounce Felix himself. He only spoke of those matters which a man of the governor's type liked least to consider. To relieve the situation Felix dismissed the apostle, telling him that he would call him again. And this he seems to have done—not for the purpose of hearing him discuss righteousness, chastity and the coming judgment, but rather the likelihood of Paul's release, in which probably the governor cunningly insinuated that the proper payment of money would hasten the event. Probably Paul had no funds with which to buy his liberty, and certainly he disdained to use bribes even to secure good ends. And so two years dragged wearily by and at last Felix gave up his governorship about the year 60 A. D. and was succeeded by a better man, Festus. Meanwhile, Paul was left a prisoner with no hope of immediate release.

Rome's Favorable View of the Truth.

In this narrative, as in every other recorded in Acts, it appears to have been the author's purpose to show the favorable light in which the Christian preachers and teachers were seen by their Roman judges. It was a convincing answer to the common charge that Christianity was a suspicious and disturbing element in the empire.

—The late E. H. Harriman proved his estimate of his wife by leaving her, untrammeled, his entire estate which is said to approximate $100,000,000. If the figures are correct, this makes her the richest woman in the world. She has always been extremely modest and unassuming, caring nothing for society, and will doubtless so continue. Mr. Harriman's father made a will similar to that of the son, bequeathing his entire estate to his wife, and appointing her sole executrix.

Prayer Meeting

A CENTURY OF WORK ON THE APOSTOLIC FOUNDATION.

Topic, Oct. 6. Acts 2:42; I Cor. 3:11; Rev. 22:16-21.

The centennial of the Disciples of Christ affords them an opportunity to scrutinize their aims and methods. The saying of Socrates: "A life unexamined, uncriticised, is not worthy of man," applies to religious movements. Life in common needs criticism as much as the individual life. If we think of nothing except self-laudation during the centennial year, we shall show ourselves unworthy of the place we pretend to fill in the service of Christ. It is necessary for us to remember, too, that a century is only a brief period in the history of the church. The full significance of a movement does not appear within a hundred years. What seems to us vastly important may have no permanent meaning. It is also difficult for us to criticise ourselves. Our religious neighbors can help us with their interpretations of our work. Of course some of them are partisan. They take delight in saying mean things about us. But an exhibition of wrath is not criticism. The critic aims to discover what is good in men and movements. He uncovers the bad only that it may not be mistaken for the good. We have religious neighbors whose motives are good and whose judgments on our work of a century we cannot ignore except at our own cost.

Numbers.

There is no virtue in belonging to the minority. The virtuous man is in the right. He may stand alone or he may have the majority with him. The Disciples have increased in number. They are now a great host and their aggressiveness warrants the expectation that they will continue to grow. It is easy to despise a small company of earnest men who cry out against a great wrong, but the sentiments of a people a million and a half strong are not so easily disregarded. Let us rejoice that we have so many to celebrate the achievements of a hundred years. If there were only a few thousands of us it would be harder to give the world an impression of our mission. A convention attended by fifty thousand people will command attention.

Organizations.

A church is an army, not a mob. A mob is gathered by the frenzy of the moment, an army is held together by strict discipline. The Disciples have made some progress in the matter of organization. Their educational system is very imperfect but it is better than its detractors would have us believe. Our doctrinaires have been telling us how we ought to build educational institutions, but their advice will not work in the world as it is. What we need is men who know how to deal with the actual situation. We have a goodly number of these and there is reason for expecting our institutions for education to become worthy of a great people. Some of the missionary societies are admirable instruments for the propagation of the gospel. Their strength is such that bitter opposition serves only to reveal their worth and to increase their hold on the brotherhood. There is need of closer supervision of weak and needy congregations. There ought to be some moral authority to which they would look with confidence. They have numerous difficulties that could be avoided if they had the counsel of wise men representing all the churches. We need machinery for dumping the rascally preacher upon the rubbish heap the moment he appears in any part of the land.

Aims.

It would add to the joy of the centennial convention if it could be said that every one who calls himself a Disciple had the spirit of a Disciple. The sad fact is that many are Disciples only in name. They have no conception of the mission of the people with whom they are nominally identified. Even where there is genuine loyalty to the local interests there is often narrowness of mind with respect to the larger things of the kingdom of God. The ignorance of the church's obligation to preach the gospel to all the nations is alarming. There are congregations that never hear a sermon in behalf of missions and in whose prayers there is no mention of the missionaries at home and abroad. But these congregations are becoming fewer in number and their influence is rapidly diminishing. It is beginning to dawn upon us that the cities present problems which cannot be solved without sacrifice. We feel more keenly that salvation is for this world as well as for the next, for society as well as for the individual. If the celebrations of the centennial year open our eyes to human need and to the resources of the church of Christ for meeting those needs, the review of our first hundred years will not be in vain.

Christian Endeavor Lesson

By W. D. Endres

HOW CAN WE HELP OUR PASTOR?

Topic Oct. 10. Ex. 17:8-13.

We should rejoice to study such an important subject though the form of statement might be improved. "How Can We be Most Efficient in Our Christian Work?" seems better. Strictly we are under no more obligation to help our Pastor than to help anyone else. He is no pope, nor is his office that of dictator. He is simply the leader and chief instructor in a congregation in the work of which (theoretically, at least) the members are as much interested as the Pastor. The point, then, is that what we do, we do not for him, nor to help him, but for the promotion of the common cause of righteousness as set forth by our Lord. It is OUR work, not his. He is included in the "our."

People Must Help.

The Pastor is called because he is regarded an efficient leader. To this he gives his entire time. It is for him to analyze conditions, to devise ways and means to meet them, and make them yield to our spiritual uplift. But, however, keen his analysis and clever his devices, he can do little alone. The work in which he leads is for and with people. The work is, therefore, in the nature of the case, co-operative. Without the co-operative spirit, success is impossible. Probably there is no harder and no greater lesson to learn than this. This teamwork, to use an athletic term, calls for perfect self-control. Here we must not only consult our own feelings and ideas, but we must deal with these, along with the feelings and ideas, peculiarities and capabilities, the weaknesses and limitations of our colleagues as well. Sweet temper and patience, self-denial, and tenacity are indispensable qualities. Delays, disappointments and discouragements often crowd in upon us until nothing but the abiding purpose of our Lord, together with these qualities of character, can sustain us.

The Church Services.

Let us also remember that it is our common Christian task to cultivate a moral sense and a mode of right living, both in the lives of ourselves and others. We help, then, whenever we contribute to this end. Of course, the more we do the more effective is our work. Specifically, we have the regular services of the church through which we may render such a service. Take for example the music of a church. Who of us have not attended public worship where the music has dispelled our gloom. We have gone in to the room with a heavy mood, with little desire to sing praises of our heart to Jehovah. But the spirit of gladness was in the room. The rich tones of the instrument and the still richer ones of the sweet voiced singers whose joyful hearts were singing praises to their God bore in upon us and e'er we knew it, we, too, were singing and rejoicing in that glad hour. The soul that is thus touched is so much richer than one who has denied himself that sweet fellowship. No man can pass through such an experience and do a vicious deed without some struggle. Someone has said with fine insight into the uplifting power of music, "Let me write the songs of a nation, and it matters little who writes its laws or what kind of laws are written." We have said this about the music, and a similar paragraph might be written about our work in the Sunday-school, the Mid-week Prayer-Meeting, our Christian Endeavor meetings, etc., etc.

Beginning New Enterprises.

Then we ought to be ready to give our hands to any new enterprise. Conditions are constantly changing and, therefore, making new demands upon us to conserve our spiritual interests. If some new plan is proposed, we should look it over carefully, and if in our judgment it is a good thing, we should throw our strength into it and also try to enlist others that the new movement may have an auspicious start. We must remember that in the beginning is when an enterprise needs support.

The fact that we are young is an asset of great value. In youth life sings its glad song. There may be dark moments, and they must quickly give way to its surplus energy, and its abounding enthusiasm. The joy of sheer living gives to young lives a buoyancy that is both inspiring and attractive. Consequently, where the young are, there both old and young delight to go. And the church, like every other social institution which is without young people, is neither attractive nor largely attended. What power and what opportunity inhere, then, in youth! We can render valuable and effective service for our Lord whenever and wherever we will. We should remember that with ability goes also responsibility from which there is no escape.

What if the sun be darkened?
Eyes shall be hopeful still!
Souls in themselves are torches
And light what realms they will.

Church Life

Pittsburg October 11-19.

Read the Centennial Bulletin.

Register! Register, today.

Call at the Christian Century booth at Pittsburg.

This has been a great year in the missionary work of the churches. Read the reports especially of the Foreign Society in this number of the Christian Century.

Inadvertently we omitted last week the list of Chicago churches and pastors, but they appear this week. Those who are in Chicago Sunday, October 10, will find a hearty welcome at any of these churches.

* * *

E. F. Metcalf has resigned his pastorate at Alexandria, S. D.! and is available for work elsewhere after October 1.

F. F. Wyatts has resigned and will close his work with the church at San Angelo, Tex., the first of October.

The church at Taylor, Texas, will send its pastor, Mr. Perkinson, to the Centennial with all expenses provided for by the church.

The first days of registration at Eureka College shows an increase in students over last year.

In the enrollment of ministerial students at the Bible College, Columbia, Mo., there is an increase of seventy-five per cent.

Fred E. Hagin, of Tokio, spoke at Jackson Boulevard Church, Chicago, last Sunday morning and at Irving Park in the evening.

Frank M. Bare goes from Water Valley, Miss, to Fayette, Mo., where he becomes pastor of the church.

All Illinois Disciples should remember the name of the new state treasurer, C. A. Dennis, Normal, Ill., to whom all offerings for state work are to be sent.

Edward Scribner Ames took "The Calling of Dan Matthews" as the basis for his sermon at the Hyde Park church, Sunday, September 19.

Granville Snell is assisting Chas. M. Wales in a meeting at Union Star, Mo. Mr. Wales is doing the preaching and the meeting is growing in interest nightly.

Mr. and Mrs. Clarence Rainwater have returned to Chicago and will give their entire time to study at the University of Chicago for a year or more.

Royal L. Handley, of Waukegan, has declined the call given him by the church at La Porte, Ind., and will remain in his present field.

With a fine new house and a united people, M. L. Rose begins his sixth year of service with the church at North Yakima, Washington.

J. K. Ballou has declined a call to the church at Stockton, Cal., and will remain with his church at Calousa, where everything is moving most encouragingly.

E. J. Arnott, pastor of the Armitage Ave. Church, Chicago, entertained the members of his Young People's Society at his home, 5815 Drexel avenue, Tuesday evening, September 21.

A. A. Doak, Colfax, Washington, seeking to utilize the interest in the Centennial, has been preaching a series of sermons on the faith and practice of the New Testament church.

After Prof. Chas. M. Sharpe presented the work of the Missouri Bible College to the church at Centralia, Mo., they responded with an offering of $2,166 to help meet the proposition made by Mr. Long.

"The Basis of Friendship" and "How to Maintain Friendship" were subjects for sermons by Jno. Ray Ewers, at East End Church, Pittsburg, Sunday morning, September 12 and September 19.

The following series of sermons were delivered Sunday evenings during September by J. A. Wharton, Minerva, Ohio: The Ideal Young Man; The Ideal Young Woman; The Ideal Marriage; The Ideal Home.

Hiram College is planning for a great reunion of all old students and friends at Pittsburg. The request is made that every old student and every friend, who might care to attend the reunion, notify President Bates at Hiram at once.

Since E. W. Thornton took charge of the work with the Naomi Avenue congregation, Los Angeles, July 15, there has been an average attendance at the Sunday-school of 304 and an average prayer-meeting attendance of sixty-four.

L. M. Francis, pastor, is doing the preaching in a meeting that is being held by the church at Athens, Ill., with Chas. E. McVay as leader of song. There were thirty-nine accessions to the church the first few evenings.

Arthur Long, of Burlington, Iowa, assisted the church at Timewell, Ill., in a meeting during August. There were twenty-four accessions to the church, and the pastor, B. H. Cleaver, writes that the meeting was a great help to the church.

Lyman E. Sage, an elder of the First Church, Mobile, Ala., and superintendent of the Sunday-school has decided to devote his entire energies to the ministry and was ordained to this service by the Mobile Church in July.

Chas. M. Fillmore, whose article in another column should be read by every preacher and church officer, is pastor of the Hillside Church, Indianapolis, and is one of the editors of "Clean Politics," a paper which goes after corruption and drunkenness without gloves.

W. A. Harp has closed his work with the Lenox Ave. Union Church, New York City. He and his wife were given a farewell reception, Wednesday evening, September 22. The church is worshipping in a new auditorium and laying plans for a more aggressive work.

The Southern California Preachers' meeting will assemble at First Church, Los Angeles, Monday, September 27. An interesting feature of the meeting will be the review of Harold B. Wright's new book, "The Calling of Dan Matthews." The review will be made by Mr. and Mrs. W. G. Conley.

Crowded houses greeted William Price on his first Sunday at the Howett St. Church, Peoria, Ill., after his return from his trip to England. At the Bible-school there was an attendance of 257. The average attendance is 200. During Mr. Price's absence the pulpit was supplied by Charles Adams, a student in Eureka College.

F. H. Schmitt, pastor at Herington, Kansas, and his family have just moved into their new $3,000 parsonage, located just across the street from the church. It is a seven-room house, lighted with electricity. The Ladies' Aid Society cleared over $64.00 at their last regular meeting, and over $200 in the last few months.

Prof. L. M. Sniff, for twenty-five years President of the Tri-state Normal at Angola, Ind., has gone to California, where he will make his future home. During September and October he is supplying the pulpit of the Magnolia Ave. Church, Los Angeles, the pastor, J. P. McKnight, being away during that time.

H. C. Shropshire, who has formerly served as pastor of the churches at Sanger, Wheatland and College City, California, has accepted a call to the church at Gilroy, Cal., where he has been supplying for several weeks. It is hoped that this will mark the beginning of a new day with the Gilroy church.

B. H. Hayden, pastor of the Christian Church, London, Ontario, has put out a very attractive invitation to the church services with a good strong announcement of the sermons for both morning and evening during September and October. A very attractive card of invitation is put out by the Sunday-school of this church.

B. S. Ferrall, Jefferson street, Buffalo, N. Y., was given a home-coming reception upon his return from his vacation spent in Angola, Ind. This is double assurance of the love in which he is held by this great church. John G. Slayter will assist the church in a meeting beginning the Sunday following the Centennial. The Sunday-school of the church has an attendance of nearly five hundred.

The church at Paxton, Ill., made this year the largest offering in its history for church extension. At the evening service, September 19, the church extended the hand of "Farewell Greeting" to two choice young men, Glen Mills and Jay Bonham, who go to Johnson Bible College to prepare for the ministry. The church will send their minister, S. Elwood Fisher, to Pittsburgh.

B. H. Cleaver leaves the work at Huntington, Mo., and Timewell, Ill., to locate with the congregation at Lewistown, Ill., beginning there October 3. In addition to preaching, he has also been teaching in Christian University the past six years, but is now succeeded there by Prof. Garn, of Augusta, Ill., who will also probably minister for the church.

Geo. L. Peters, pastor of the Central Christian Church, Springfield, Mo., has been elected the church's delegate to the Pittsburg Convention, with all expenses provided by the church. This is the honorable and the Christian thing to do. There are hundreds of churches that should do this for their pastors. The pastor goes on business for the church. He is their representative, and they should provide his expenses.

The corner stone of the new church at Veedersburg, Ind., was laid Monday, September 20. It was a great event for the town. Business houses were closed at the hour of the ceremonies. The address was made by S. D. Dutcher, pastor of the church at Terre Haute, Ind., on the subject "The One Foundation." In the stone was placed a history of the church, a list of the membership, a picture of Evangelist H. A. Davis, and of the present pastor, O. E. Kelley. The building will cost about $12,000.

The State Board of Northern California consists of I. N. McCash, Berkeley; H. J. Loken, Alameda; G. W. Brewster, Healdsburg; Frank Stuart Ford, San Francisco; G. L. Lobdell, Chico; and D. F. Stafford, Watsonville. Each of these men have promised to give especial attention to the offering for State work the first Sunday in November, and urge the other preachers of the northern part of the state to begin now to prepare for that day.

F. D. Draper, late of the Hillman St. Church, Youngstown, Ohio, preached at Ashland, Ohio, the third Sunday in September. The services of the morning were held in the church, and the evening services, in which all the churches of the city participated, were in the opera house. Mr. Draper preached the sermon, taking as his text, "Thou Art the Christ, the Son of the Living God." The local paper commends the sermon.

H. B. Robison has resigned at ElPaso, Texas, and the church has extended a call to P. . Rice of Minneapolis. Mr. Robison has been in El Paso about three years and has done a good work, reaching out in many ways beyond the confines of his own church. If Mr. Rice accepts the call, and we have not heard whether he will, he will carry the church forward to larger and larger work, as he has done in former pastorates at South Bend, Ind., and Minneapolis.

C. A. MacDonald, until recently pastor of the church at McKees Rocks, Pa., is just entering the field as Bible School Evangelist. Mr. MacDonald is a graduate of Hiram College, with ten years' experience as a preacher. He has been pastor of the churches at Kent and Akron, Ohio, and for two and one-half years at McKees Rocks, Pittsburg. He plans to visit school to hold a two weeks' institute, with an aim of getting all the church into the Bible School, and leaving the school thoroughly graded, and organized for aggressive work.

The Long Beach, California, Convention was honored this year with three notable guests: B. B. Tyler, "the most commanding personality of the meeting"; Judge Frederick W. Peabody, Boston, attorney engaged in much of the litigation against Mrs. Mary Baker Eddy, Mother of Christian Science. Mr. Peabody addressed a great audience, to which he exposed the system taught by Mrs. Eddy. The third guest of honor was R. A. Long, President of the Men's Brotherhood. He spoke at the Men's Banquet.

Sunday evening, September 19, instead of the regular Sunday evening service at East Liverpool, Ohio, the graduating exercises of the first Teacher Training class was held. There were seven graduates: Enoch N. Jones, John Farrish, Rachel Jones, Mesdames Catharine Bradfield, Julia Provo, G. C. Hostetter, and James Calhoun. After introductory remarks by the pastor, Prof. F. T. Weaver, the teacher of the class, gave a fine drill. Prof. F. H. Warren, superintendent of the city schools, gave the address. A new class was formed and will begin work at once. E. P. Wise, the pastor, directs the work of this church with intelligence.

J. A. Wharton closes a two years' pastorate with the church at Minerva, Ohio, October 31. During the time Mr. Wharton has been with this church he has wrought well. Fifty-seven members have been received into the church; an old debt of $500 paid, the Bible-school has had an attendance of from 300 to 400; the adult class, which was organized and taught by the pastor, has an average attendance during June, July, and August of fifty-seven. Before going to Minerva, Mr. Wharton was for seven years pastor of the church at Niagara Falls, N. Y. Mr. Wharton has not yet decided upon his future location.

The Memphis, Tenn., preachers are enterprising. They are securing space in the local papers for giving the people facts about the Disciples of Christ and the coming Centennial Convention. The Commercial Appeal, of Memphis, for Sunday, September 19, devotes two full pages to this purpose. These pages contain articles from J. B. Briney, W. F. Richardson, Z. T. Sweeney, W. J. Wright, J. H. Garrison, and others, as well as the pictures of the four fathers of the reformation, and of the preachers of the Memphis churches of the Disciples. They are: Homer F. Cooke, R. H. Jones, L. D. Riddell, V. R. Smith, W. H. Sheffer, and J. E. Garsuch.

A letter enclosing payment for two years' subscription in advance from a Kentucky reader says: "I have enjoyed your paper for the past twelve months. I have wanted such a paper for years. The need of it is being felt all over the country. I never subscribed for it and do not know who sent it to me, but I am certainly thankful to whomsoever it was." Here is one of a multitude of instances where the sending of The Christian Century by one who is sympathetic with its ideals to one who is not now a reader will bring a manifold blessing. Some time ago it was announced in the Christian Century that on account of G. D. Edwards being ill with typhoid fever, Dean C. M .Sharpe of the Bible College of Missouri would take the field to raise funds to meet Mr. R. A. Long's proposition, in which he proposed to give $50,000 provided $50,000 more was raised by October 1, 1909. The action proposed seemed necessary since Mr. Long's proposition matured October 1, and it was evident Mr. Edwards would be unable to do anything more before that time. However, as soon as the news came to Mr. Long he again showed his generosity, and his earnestness in making the proposition he did, by replying as follows: "Dean Sharpe should stick to his own particular task, which he and he alone is responsible for; the raising of funds should be left to Mr. Edwards on recovery, and to make this possible I will extend the time of meeting my propositions as far beyond October 1 as Mr. Edwards laid off on account of illness." The time for meeting Mr. Long's terms have been extended to December 1; and the month for our whirlwind campaign is changed from September to November. Mr. Edwards was taken ill August 2 and was dismissed from the hospital August 30. The doctor instructs him not to return to work before October 1.

The Wabash County (Ind.) Association of Christian Churches held its third annual convention with the Wabash Church, September 12. The day sessions were held in the city park, the evening meeting in the church. Representatives from the eight churches of the association were present and a basket dinner served at the noon hour to a multitude. Vernon Stauffer, of Angola, was the messenger of the day. He spoken in the morning on "The Christian's Inheritance in the Truth," at night upon "Obligations Which No Man Can Escape." The afternoon meeting was given to the communion service and the business matters of the Association. All churches giving encouraging reports. There is a membership in the county of fifteen hundred. There were above one hundred additions to the various churches in the year. The churches of the association pool their offerings for four interests, viz.: Foreign, Home and State Missions and Church Extension. Officers for the year were elected: President, J. W. Lewis: Vice President, A. L. Martin, La Fontaine: Treasurer, Thos. Hardman, LaFontaine: Secretary, E. F. Daugherty. Ministers present were I. P. Watts, Winchester; W. A. McKowan, Fairmount; A. L. Martin, LaFon-Wabash, with a number of local denominational visitors.

The church at Middletown, Ind. (Henry county), progressive and zealous in every good work, is sending its pastor, L. E. Murray, to the Centennial Convention. Their missionary offerings are larger than ever before.

Big Basket Meeting at Hallville

Sunday, September 12, was a great day for the Christian Church at Hallville, Ill. It was the occasion of the annual basket meeting of that historic church. The pastor of the church, A. L. Huff, of Eureka, Ill., had made thorough preparations for the occasion. Mr. Huff is a senior in Eureka College, and in connection with his work there, is pastor of the churches at East Galesburg and Hallville. The speakers of the occasion were, T. T. Holton, of Bloomington, who was pastor of the Hallville church for twenty-one years and H. H. Peters, field secretary of Eureka College. Brother Holton preached in the morning and in the afternoon, gave a talk on the history of the church in Hallville. Brother Holton stated that he began preaching in the year 1871, at Old Union, a strong country church from which the Hallville church sprang. The church at that time had a membership of 300, and the congregation often numbered 600.

Many men have gone from this church to render excellent service as preachers of the gospel. Among these are found the names of A. W. Henry, Marcellus Piatt, Thomas B. Piatt, C. G. Cantrell, Simpson Ely, H. M. Barnett, and J. A. Barnett. Besides these preachers a great company of other workers have gone forth into the world to be a blessing to humanity. As the village of Hallville grew in importance, many people began to feel that the congregation should make its home in Hallville instead of in the country at Old Union. The Hallville church was dedicated in 1887, and for some time services were held at both places. Several other congregations have received inspiration and help from members of this church who have moved elsewhere. The membership of the church at the present is over 200 and the outlook is good. Brother Huff has been with the church almost two years and his work is mentioned very favorably in the community. The services of the day were closed by an address, by H. H. Peters; and everybody left feeling that it had been a good day. Eureka College has many students from this community during the past, and in the years to come many more will take advantage of her opportunities for higher education.

Adult Bible Class Parade

By Marion Stevenson, National Superintendent of Bible Schools.

The attention of every Adult Bible Class and every Bible School in the brotherhood is called to the following announcement of the great men's Bible Class parade at Pittsburg, Penn., Monday evening, October 18, 1909. Thousands of classes should be represented in this parade. Every class should carry a banner so that the spectators in the reviewing stand can tell what state, what city and what school the class represents. Brother J. W. Darby, of Beaver Falls, Penn., will be the chief marshall and will be assisted by the state superintendents of Bible Schools who will severally have charge of the state sections of the parade. The parade will start at 7 p. m. promptly. Men only will be in the line of march. Women who are members of the Bible classes will have a definite place in or near the reviewing stand, and every woman present will count for her class just the same as a man in the line of march. The parade will be reviewed by the convention officials, and especially the invited guests. An American flag will be presented to the state making the best showing in the parade according to the following points. 1. The number of classes represented in the parade in proportion to the number of Christian Bible Schools in the state. 2. The number of persons represented in the parade. 3. The aggregate mileage traveled by those participating.

In the Magazines

how completely the great streams of voluntary and spontaneous giving have been diverted from the churches, and from church work generally.

"During the past ten or twelve years the almost inconceivably enormous sum of one billion dollars has been given away by Americans for various philanthropic purposes. Of this stupendous sum comparatively little went to the churches.

"Rockefeller, for example, although an exuberant church-member, has given comparatively little money to church work. He has been interested in outside activities, chiefly educational and medical. Mrs. Russell Sage has been distributing her millions not among the churches which have been gradually deserting the poor, but she establishes a great fund for studying methods of improving the conditions of the poor, or she purchases an island in the Hudson river and dedicates it to the United States government. Carnegie builds libraries which are open not only to Protestants, but to Catholics, Jews, Mohammedans, Negroes. No lines are drawn. Phipps builds model tenements and D. O. Mills model hotels for improving the living conditions of people of small means. Last year Morris K. Jesup died. He was one of the most loyal of Presbyterians, but of his gifts not one-tenth went to church work, while nine-tenths was given to outside activities like the American Museum of Natural History. And Mr. Jesup's proportion for churches was very large compared with that of most givers. Even many Roman Catholics who have left fortunes have contributed not exclusively to the church as they probably would have done twenty or fifty years ago, but have favored all sorts of public causes. A wealthy Roman Catholic woman recently left considerable sums of money to Jewish institutions!"

Important to the Friends of Bethany College

In order to give an opportunity for those who may attend the Centennial celebration at Pittsburgh to go or come by Bethany College, and investigate for themselves the importance of the plea which the friends of Bethany College are making, and thereby to interest them enthusiastically in the Centennial Fund for that college, the brother who made the proposal to give $25,000 for every $100,000 raised by the whole brotherhood, up to $400,000, has authorized me to extend the time from the first of October to the first of November for the completion of the Centennial Fund. Arrangements are being made by which a great Bethany banquet will be held at Pittsburgh during the Centennial celebration, and it is hoped that at least twelve hundred people will attend this banquet. It is proposed to make this one of the great features of the Centennial, and my friend wishes the brotherhood to have the benefit of this occasion to meet his liberal proposition.

Now, brethren, let us have a strong pull, a long pull and a pull all together. We should secure at least a good part of the amount set for this fund. Surely, after this concession, the whole brotherhood will be equal to at least one man in answering the most imperative call and one of the most reasonable calls that has been made during this Centennial year. The celebration would surely not be complete without a handsome sum raised for the endowment of Bethany College.

A COMPREHENSIVE HISTORY OF THE Disciples of Christ

BY WILLIAM T. MOORE, L. L. D.

¶ At last every member of the Disciples Church may rejoice over an authoritative history which will make his church and its teaching better and more generally understood.

¶ The facts, regarding its genesis, spirit, progress, are presented by a man of unquestionable authority, long association and wide reading.

¶ Everyone who has the interest of the church at heart, cannot afford to withhold his heartiest effort to extend the circulation of this most important work.

DRAKE BANQUET

The friends of Drake University, attending the Convention at Pittsburg, will banquet at the Rittenhouse, Friday evening, October 15. Plates, two dollars each. Apply to Rev. C. H. Morris, Marshalltown, Iowa, who is in charge, or at the Drake University booth at the Convention.

The Ministry of a Man

By Arthur Holmes

Rev. L. G. Batman, pastor of the First Church, Philadelphia, Pa., has recently closed a six years' ministry with that church and opened another with the First Christian Church of Youngstown, Ohio.

In such a simple announcement there appears nothing especially noteworthy. Hundreds of such news items appear weekly in any of our papers. To understand something of the significance of this notice one must know something of the circumstances of that ministry and some details of its achievements.

The church itself is worthy of note. It is one of the oldest in the brotherhood. It was organized in 1832, in the session room of an abandoned Presbyterian Church, with about a dozen members. Alexander Campbell first visited the church in 1833, spoke in Music Fund Hall for three hours and twenty minutes on the "Reasons for the Christian's Hope in God." While in the Bank street building a meeting was held under the leadership of David S. Burnet, one of the great lights of the restoration.

About 1838 the flock removed from Bank street to Pearl street, and while there in 1842, held a meeting conducted by Walter Scott with crowded houses. In the same year the church removed again, this time to a Presbyterian church at Fifth and Gaskil streets. Here it was that Benjamin Franklin, coming from Tennessee to study medicine, preached for the church.

The next move was into their own new building at Twelfth and Wallace streets, in 1852, where they dwelt for a generation. Alexander Campbell preached the opening sermon, making his third visit to the church. In 1892 the church bought and moved into its present home at Berks and Mervine streets.

Both by age and interest in other Disciple churches of the city it is Mother Church. Today the congregation numbers about 500, a body of people unsurpassed for their devotion to the plea of the fathers, intelligently interested in every step of history which has made the Disciples a great people, ardent in their support of all Disciple traditions, and yet all of it tempered with a courtesy, a sweetness of spirit and Christian culture that ornaments and dignifies every principle for which they stand.

The church is further characterized by a dignity of aim, purpose, method and achievement which gives its services and its whole atmosphere an exceptional reverent and uplifting tone, just touched and warmed with the perfect, quiet, unobtrusive manner peculiar to Philadelphia. Altogether, it would be hard to find a congregation with such a happy combination of history, spirit and splendid membership.

During the six years of Brother Batman's ministry, 260 persons were added to the church; about $42,000 were raised for all purposes; 1,400 were enrolled in the Sunday-school and all other organizations were vigorously promoted.

Such an achievement under the circumstances, would have satisfied most pastors. Mr. Batman, however, is a man with a restless disposition to be doing something. Energy flows from him as readily as Niagara pours over its precipice. Besides his own pastoral work, he was president of the Christian Missionary Society of Eastern Pennsylvania for over five years, attended all the conferences, made frequent trips over the state and was full of helpful advice for all the congregations in the district. The estimation with which he was held by his fellow ministers in the state is indicated by the splendid testimonial letter from the Board of Directors of the Missionary Society on the occasion of his resignation.

In the religious affairs of the city, outside of the Disciples, Mr. Batman took a prominent part. His energy, unlimited common sense, tact, constructive ability, and earnestness in everything he undertook made him a most respected representative of the Disciples amongst the other denominations.

Rev. L. G. Batman, Now Pastor First Church, Youngstown, Ohio.

He was prominently connected with the program of the Federation of Protestant Churches at their meeting in this city, consulted on many projects of religious importance and active in evangelistic campaigns. Not the least of his contributions were the three years of noon-meetings held in the Pennsylvania Railroad shops where the men sent a written petition for his return after the first year. Many of his staunchest admirers are numbered among the shopmen.

In the affairs of the Disciple churches, however, his most marked and most permanent contribution was made. No pastor in our city ever took a more practical and continuous interest in all the congregations than he did. He was always ready in every emergency with good advice backed up with the most practical aid in helping any weaker church either to maintain its position or to advance a new work. He was undoubtedly the largest factor in preserving two of our local congregations from disruption and destruction, and they stand today as thriving churches, monuments to his unselfish labor, unfailing patience and unquenchable optimism.

It is not at all too much to say that he marked a new era in our Philadelphia work. He revealed to us the secret of our possible success. His episcopalian hand was felt in every congregation. His missionary spirit infused itself unconsciously into every home disciple. He accustomed each member to feel himself in a larger relation than merely as one member in an isolated fold, satisfied when the demands of his congregation were fulfilled. He set a new pastoral ideal and opened many eyes to the possibilities of this splendid field. In these matters, while no material mark may be left for the passerby to read and note, the influence of this bishop of Philadelphia will live and be remarked by those who know him best as his greatest contribution amongst many, during his useful pastorate.

With a congregation like the First Church and achievements like the above, most men would have been content. As a pastor he might have remained indefinitely. Philadelphia is the easiest place in the world to stay in. Six years might readily have doubled themselves and Brother Batman would have found himself more respected and beloved than ever. However, with his restless energy, with his ambition to make each new day a larger one than yesterday, he could not be contented with a mere record of longevity. He must be up and doing. Hence, when the call came to a field with many more difficulties, with innumerable problems, with fewer benefits, but with the seethe and stress of complicated life the lure of doing things was too strong. He bade farewell to a reluctant people and to many friends.

It would not be fair to the facts to close this notice without a mention of the largest element in Mr. Batman's success. It is the old story, of course. He had back of him in his home the constant and intelligent sympathy of a pastor's best helper—a noble and sacrificing wife. As a pastor's wife Mrs. Batman is perfect. Ministers and ministers' wives will know all that that entails.

Something of the feelings of the congregation for both of these noble souls was expressed in a beautifully embossed set of resolutions presented to them on the occasion of the farewell reception tendered them in the church on the eve of their departure to their new field. They go with the most cordial esteem of all who knew them, with regrets of Philadelphia friends at their loss and with heartiest good wishes for continued success and enlarging usefulness in the brotherhood they serve so devotedly.

Good News

More than $40,000 have been secured by the Foreign Society to meet the conditions upon which R. A. Long agreed to give $10,000 for the two new Bible Colleges, one at Vigan, Philippine Islands, and one at Bolenge, Africa. R. A. Long, the splendid Christian business man, has promptly fulfilled his part in this enterprise. Many friends will rejoice over this achievement.

The total receipts of the Foreign Society to September 15 amount to $317,741, a gain over the corresponding time of 1908 of $79,253.

We are hoping for still better gains before the 30th, when our books close.

Declaration Day is upon us! All signs indicate that this is to be one of the most remarkable days in our history. It is earnestly hoped and very widely expected that we shall have the largest attendance at Bible-school that day in the history of our people. Multitudes of schools will have all the church and as many more present.

One of the first purposes of the day is to secure the Adult Bible Class Movement among us. To this end every adult Bible class should be organized with the International Certificate of Recognition. The future of organized classes should be secured by having a permanent teacher ready to take charge of them. Teacher training classes should resume work and the classes should be organized both in first year's work and in the advanced year's work, so that the future will bring us well qualified teachers. We are hoping that not less than 50,000 pupils will be enrolled on this great day.

Ohio Fourteenth District Convention

The annual district convention of the O. C. M. S. held at Chauncey, was the best for several years. The attendance was good and the program was carried out almost entirely as printed. The district which has been unweildly because the east and west parts were not easily accessible to each other was divided into east and west districts. Athens, Gloucester and Nelsonville are the strong churches of the west division. J. A. Holton is doing a good work at Gloucester. W. H. Boden, president of the district, has done and is doing a good work at Athens. He is on his third year there. The church at Nelsonville reported the largest numbers of additions for the year. J. A. Long, a student at Ohio University, preaches at Chauncey and Trimble. He is doing a splendid work at both places. T. J. White, southern Ohio evangelist, and L. L. Faris, state Sunday-school man, were both absent owing to light attacks of typhoid fever. They were greatly missed. H. N. Miller, state secre-

The Tennis Champion Says

MAY SUTTON

Tells American Girls How to Be Healthy and Graceful.

SAN FRANCISCO, Cal.

Don't drink coffee.
Don't drink tea.
Don't exercise too much.

These three don'ts constitute the advice of Miss May Sutton, champion woman tennis player of the world, to girls who would go in seriously and systematically for athletics.

Eat what you want.
Take long walks.
Get all the fresh air you can.

These are the three rules Miss Sutton lays down for girls who desire merely to be strong and healthy.

The little champion recently appeared on courts in San Francisco in a series of exhibition matches. It had been reported that she was not in the best of health, but she gave no indication of having "gone back," playing her strong game that made her world's champion, with her same old dash and accuracy.

At the close of the series Miss Sutton was asked to tell what system of training she had found most effective and what, in her opinion, is the best form of exercise and diet for the average American girl. In part, she said:

"While I advocate hearty eating, I cannot say too much against the use of tea or coffee. They are nerve destroyers and no one can be healthy who persists in their use.

"Too much exercise is as bad as too little. Walking is the best exercise there is. Early each morning, after drinking a glass of hot water, dressed in loose clothing, I walk for nearly an hour.

"Athletics should receive some attention from every girl. If her time precludes the playing of tennis or golf she should take long walks in the open air, both before the morning and evening meal, throwing the head and shoulders back and taking long, deep draughts of that which money cannot buy but is in reach of the poor as well as the rich—pure air.

"Pure air and a moderate amount of exercise I cannot too strongly impress upon girls as being the only secret of health and grace. Medicine for that out-of-sorts feeling may cause girls to imagine they feel all right, but what they really need is more fresh air and not quite so much sitting around the house in tight-fitting clothes as a great many of them do."

Miss Sutton is declared by physicians to be a perfect athlete. Tennis experts declare that every movement is "a picture."—Lexington (Ky.) Leader.

POSTUM

is, as a morning cup.

A hot, steaming cup of Postum is as invigorating and bracing as coffee. But instead of caffeine-wrecked nerves, headaches and heart troubles that overtake the coffee drinker, Postum furnishes a liquid food which strengthens head and body.

A ten days' trial of well-made Postum (boiled 15 minutes) convinces.

"There's a Reason"

WONDERED WHY

Found the Answer was "Coffee."

Many, pale, sickly persons wonder for years why they have to suffer so, and eventually discover that the drug—caffeine—in coffee is the main cause of the trouble.

"I was always very fond of coffee and drank it every day. I never had much flesh and often wondered why I was always so pale, thin and weak.

"About five years ago my health completely broke down and I was confined to my bed. My stomach was in such condition that I could hardly take sufficient nourishment to sustain life.

"During this time I was drinking coffee, didn't think I could do without it.

"After awhile I came to the conclusion that coffee was hurting me, and decided to give it up and try Postum. I didn't like the taste of it at first, but when it was made right—boiled until dark and rich—I soon became very fond of it.

"In one week I began to feel better. I could eat more and sleep better. My sick headaches were less frequent, and within five months I looked and felt like a new being, headache spells entirely gone.

"My health continued to improve and today I am well and strong, weigh 148 lbs. I attribute my present health to the life-giving qualities of Postum."

Church Extension Receipts

For First Fifteen Days of September as Compared with the Same Time Last Year.

Churches.

Last year	$1,695.24
This year	1,644.30
Loss	$50.94

Individuals.

Last year	$1,215.40
This year	570.12
Loss	$645.28
Total Loss	$696.22

It will be noted that, from the above statement for the first fifteen days, we have a total loss of $696.22. The $50.94 is from the churches, and $645.28 from individuals. The most of the falling off in receipts is due to the fact that we have not received as much Annuity money this year for the first fifteen days of September as last year. We have gained five in the number of contributing churches.

From the churches the offerings are always small after the first two Sundays. The larger churches hold their offerings until after the third and fourth Sundays. Most of the churches take the whole month for the gathering, and remit after the last Sunday. Churches should be sure to get their offerings to Kansas City before September 30. Offerings mailed promptly on September 27 should reach us by the 30th. Remit promptly to G. W. Muckley, Corresponding Secretary, 500 Water Works Bldg., Kansas City, Mo.

Eureka College Rally

Eureka College will hold a great reunion during the Centennial Convention. There will be no banquet, but the energy that is usually consumed in eating will be used for even more important purposes. The plan is to select some auditorium that is convenient, and at a convenient time gather together all the friends of Eureka College, including everybody from Illinois, and have an enthusiastic program. The details of the matter have not been worked out and many of them will not be until the people gather at the Convention. But enough has been done to guarantee the success of the enterprise, and between now and the opening of the convention everything that can be arranged for such an affair will be. We take this opportunity to invite the friends of Eureka College throughout the brotherhood and everybody from Illinois who attends the convention, to get ready for a great rally in the interest of our Illinois School. Eureka College will have a story to tell, and her friends will be on hand to tell it. The main reason for having a rally instead of a banquet is, that we cannot accommodate all the friends of the college at a banquet, however great may be our preparations. Besides, there will not be much time for eating.

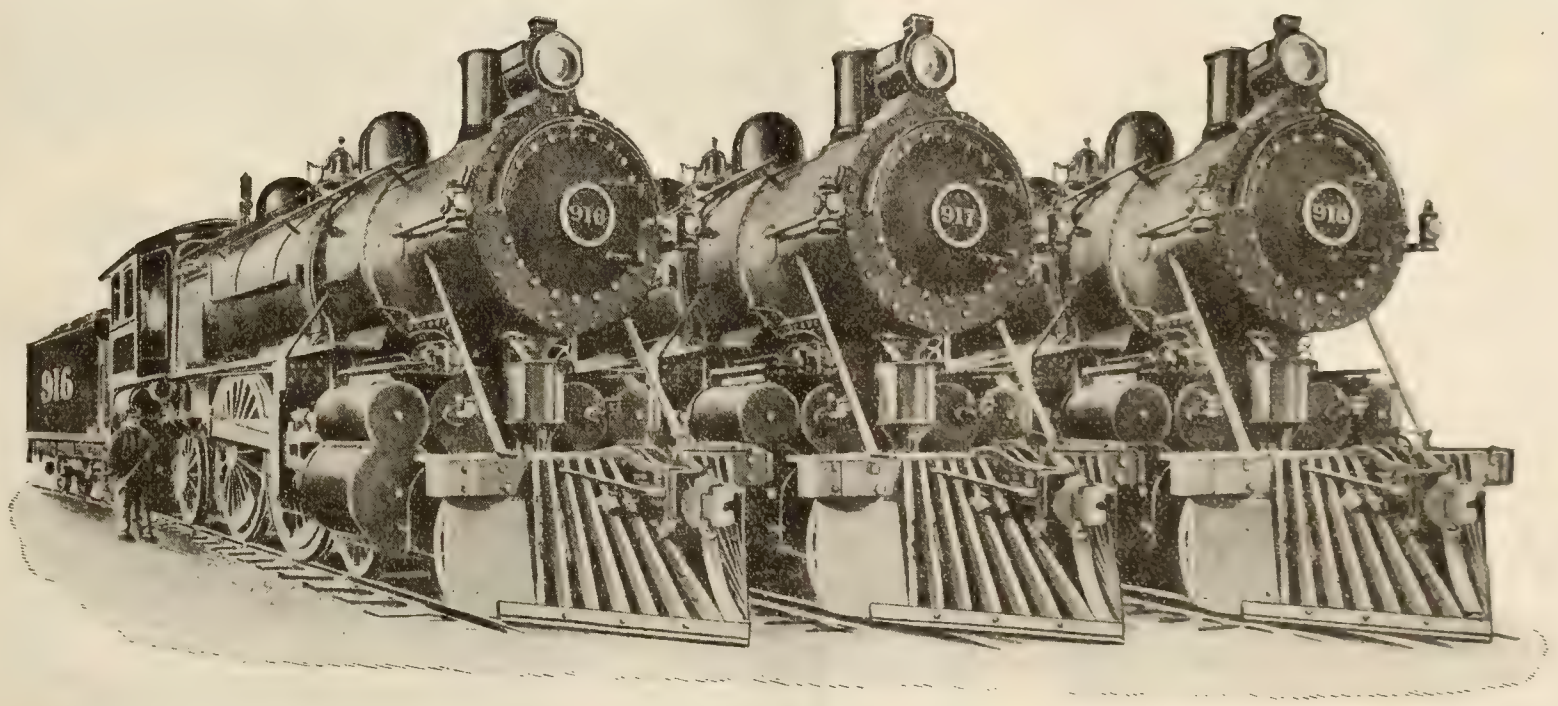
Atlanta Christian Church is sending their minister, Ralph V. Callaway, to the Pittsburg Convention. They are giving him a liberal purse in addition to paying the regular expenses of the trip.

E. M. Todd, pastor of the West Jefferson St. Church, Fort Wayne, Ind., with his church, held a special service of song, Sunday evening, September 19. The theme for the evening was "Christian Life and Experience as Reflected in Our Hymnology." The service was to introduce the new hymnal of the church: "Hymns of Worship and Service."

Cotner University



Registration for the year 1909-10 began Monday, September 6. The great number of new students was indeed a surprise to our most sanguine friends. More than one hundred new students registered the first three days. These, together with others who will come later, and the old students who return will undoubtedly give us a student body of over five hundred students this year; thus the latter part of our "Centennial Aim" ($100,000 endowment, and 500 students by 1909.) will be realized. Nor are we altogether despondent about the former. Last year added over $15,000 to our permanent endowment fund, which gives us a total of approximately $50,000 at the present time. Now is a propitious time for brethren of means to consider well the possibilities for good that lie in an adequate endowment of Cotner University.

The institution is without debt and owns property worth approximately $200,000, but is in great need of an adequate endowment fund. Equipment to the amount of several hundred dollars per year is being added to our laboratories and class rooms.

Last year the university graduated the largest class in its history: more than fifty students received diplomas and certificates of graduation, while eighteen received the degree of Bachelor of Arts.

Forgetting the struggles of the past, it seems that a brighter day is dawning, and every indication points to a successful future for Cotner University. With an alumni increasing in usefulness and power as well as in numbers; with a rapidly growing, enthusiastic, and loyal student body; a tireless and energetic field agent: and a constantly increasing number of devoted friends, the future of the institution seems assured. Let us endow it that it may fulfil its true mission. Stand up for Cotner and talk it to your friends.

Centennial Bulletin

By John A. Jayne

Already the first rays of the sun of the Centennial are looming in the horizon of the Eastern sky. Already some delegates to the Convention have begun to come into Pittsburgh. Already 8,000 people from various parts of the country have registered for rooms and by the time this reaches your eyes these will have been assigned to their homes during the Convention period. Already upwards of 2,000 have sent in their Centennial dollar and are guaranteed the beautiful Centennial program and badge.

It is wonderful the number of inquiries that there are relative to rates, rooms and entertainments of various kinds. The brotherhood seems to be aroused as it has never been aroused before by any convention. Every mail brings interesting letters, and we know that from firesides all through the brotherhood, prayers are ascending for the convention and its success. In the midst of the hurry and the worry of convention preparation when nerves are on edge and physical strength is worn to a frazzle, it is encouraging and comforting to know that these prayers are ascending and that the workers have the sympathy of those for whom great preparation is being made Unless one is directly attached to the office force he cannot know the vast amount of labor necessary to prepare for a gathering such as we will have in Pittsburgh, October 11 to 19.

Brother W. R. Warren, our energetic and enthusiastic centennial secretary previous to the latter part of the spring of this year, traveled an average of 36,000 miles a year for four years, speaking at conventions, preaching in pulpits, and interesting people everywhere in the great centennial gathering When this work was finished he gathered round about him a corps of efficient workers from all of the churches in Pittsburgh, and these, with him, have been working out the idea of the prospectus and writing countless people answering questions that have come from all parts of the land. At the present time there is an office force of upwards of twenty-five putting the finishing touches on what is believed will be the greatest gathering of modern times.

And what a gathering it will be! A gathering of consecrated hearts and hands celebrating the completion of a full century of an American movement for the restoration of New Testament Christianity.

What remembrances will be in the minds and hearts of those who come! The remembrances of the sacrifices of heroic fathers and mothers, sons and daughters who toiled and labored in the early history of the reformation to the end that the cause of primitive Christianity might be established in the land.

What a time of recognition it will be! We shall stand face to face with the wonderful achievments of the Foreign Christian Missionary Society during its long and honorable history. We shall see something of the results of the splendid endeavors of the American Christian Missionary Society in planting the Gospel in the strategic points of our own land. We shall have the opportunity of clasping the hands of the noble workers of C. W. B. M. through whose untiring energy and devotion the Gospel has been preached to those "who sit in the shadow of a great darkness." We shall see visible and tangible evidences of the devoted and willing work of the Church Extension Society that this year comes to its majority. We shall have the privilege of looking in the eyes of those who have given themselves to the work of the various benevolences of our brotherhood including the apostolic and beneficent work of the Board of Ministerial Relief.

It will be a time when we shall look forward with the greatest of delight to the work of the days that are to come. The mount of privilege to which we have come reveals to us that written in the sky of the future is the magnificent word "opportunity," and as we shall look at the graduations of color and shadings of light that form this word we shall discover back of it the heavier and more wonderful word "obligation," for opportunity always spells obligation. Opportunities accepted means obligations assumed. Privileges laid hold of means responsibilities recognized.

Our centennial mount of privilege calls for a larger and more devoted consecration of hearts and hands than we have ever given or presented

Emphasizing the Necessity of a Thorough Representation

Every church in the brotherhood should see to it that it is represented in this great convention. Every congregation should see to it that it sends its preacher, pays his way and gives him a purse large enough to provide for his entertainment while in the convention city. Every member of the local churches should esteem it a gracious privilege to contribute to this most worthy movement. The preacher who comes to the convention knowing that behind him are loving hearts who have made it possible for him to come, will receive such an inspiration that for years his work in the congregation will be better, more blessed and more in accordance with the spirit of our plea. Isolation spells stagnation. Association spells acquaintanceship. Acquaintanceship spells sympathy. Sympathy means greater enlistment of all the forces of the church for the expansion of the Kingdom of God. The church that sends its preacher will enlarge the border of its tents, take new steps in advance work and make of itself a greater power in the community in which it lives. If it should so happen that any local church is without a pastor, let that church select some well qualified and well prepared person to represent it in the convention. Let this representative have his or her expenses, including car fare all paid. Let their representative be such a person as will be able to gather and assimilate the good things of the convention and carry them back to the people who so generously sent their delegate. Every church should have a delegate and every church having a delegate will reap an ample reward in spiritual blessing that cannot be measured or estimated in this world.

A Word as to Rates

By consulting the following table one can tell approximately what the round trip car fare will be from their home to the convention city. In the Central Passenger Association the rates from—

Springfield, Ill., will be	$19.05
Indianapolis, Ind.	21.00
Grand Rapids, Mich.	12.85
Chicago, Ill., via Fort Wayne	15.75
Chicago, via Pan Handle, B. & O. or N. Y. Cen.	14.25

Cincinnati, O., via Pennsylvania	9.70
Cincinnati, O., via B. & O.	8.20
Cleveland, O.	4.75
Columbus, O.	6.10
Dayton, O.	8.20

In the territory of the Trunk Line Association the roads sell mileage like postage stamps at two cents, to be used by anyone. In addition a special rate of a fare and three fifths has been made for this convention, except in Pennsylvania, where tickets to Pittsburgh will be sold at two cents per mile.

In the Southwestern Passenger Association the rates will be from—

Birmingham, Ala.	$23.35
Mobile, Ala.	28.05
Roanoke, Va.	24.85
Washington, D. C.	12.00
Jacksonville, Fla.	33.70

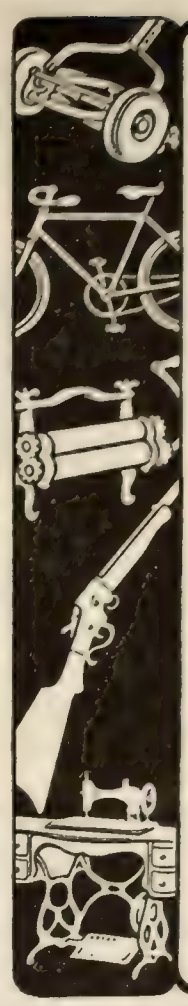
Convention Points

Visitors from southern points should be sure to bring wraps with them as the evenings may be cold. October weather in Pittsburgh as a rule is delightful. The record of the past 17 years shows that during the time appointed for the convention the weather has been extremely delightful.

Finally, don't forget to pray for the convention, the workers and all who shall come. Pray that this may be in spirit and in truth a time when our spiritual strength shall be revived for the great work that is before us.



Sincerely yours,
JOHN ANDERSON JAYNE.
Chairman Publicity Committee.

Books You Need

We offer some of the most timely and vital books now appearing among the Disciples of Christ. You need every one of this splendid list.

OUR CENTENNIAL BOOK.

"Historical Documents Advocating Christian Union."—Edited by C. A. Young.

This book is the classic for this our Centennial year. It contains Thomas Campbell's "Declaration and Address"; Alexander Campbell's "Sermon on the Law"; Barton W. Stone's "Last Will and Testament of the Springfield Presbytery"; Isaac Errett's "Our Position"; J. H. Garrison's "The World's Need of Our Plea." Beautifully illustrated. Retail price, $1.00. No one should allow the Centennial to pass without possessing this book.

Z. T. Sweeney, Columbus, Ind., a preacher of national reputation, writes:

"I congratulate you on the happy thought of collecting and editing these documents. They ought to be in the home of every Disciple of Christ in the Land, and I believe they should have a large and increasing sale in years to come."

Basic Truths of the Christian Faith, by Herbert L. Willett, author of The Ruling Quality, Teaching of the Books, Prophets of Israel, etc., etc. Post 8vo., cloth, 127 pages. Front cover stamped in gold, gilt top, illustrated, 75 cents, paper 25 cents.

A powerful and masterful presentation of the great truths for the attainment of the life of the spirit. Written in a charming and scholarly style. It holds the reader's fascinated attention so closely that it is a disappointment if the book has to be laid aside before it is finished.

J. E. Chase writes:

"It is the voice of a soul in touch with the Divine life, and breathes throughout its pages the high ideals and noblest conception of truer life, possible only to him who has tarried prayerfully, studiously at the feet of the world's greatest teachers."

Our Plea for Union and the Present Crisis, by Herbert L. Willett, author of "The Life and Teachings of Jesus," etc., etc. 12mo., cloth, 140 pages, gold stamped, postpaid 50 cents.

Written in the belief that the Disciples of Christ are passing through an important, and in many respects, transitional period.

The author says:

"It is with the hope that * * * present forces and opportunities may be wisely estimated by us; that doors now open may be entered; that hopes only partially real now may come to fruition that these chapters are given their present form."

Every Disciple of Christ will be interested in getting from his own pen the teachings of Professor Willett. No fair man will consent to judge him on the basis of newspaper reports. These books should be in every one's possession just now.

ERRETT GATES' ILLUMINATING WORK.

"The Early Relation and Separation of Baptists and Disciples."

This is the theme of the hour. Dr. Gates has put into our hand the historic facts with a grace and charm that makes them read like a novel. In cloth, 75c. Paper binding, 25c.

"We owe a debt of gratitude to the writer of this book, and could only wish that it might be read not only by our people all over the land, but scattered among the Baptists. It is a most meritorious and splendid contribution to our literature."—THE CHRISTIAN WORKER, PITTSBURG, PA.

"The dominant personality of Alexander Campbell is so brought out as to give to what might be regarded as the dry details of ecclesiastical history and controversy almost the interest of a story. A valuable contribution to the history of the American churches."—THE CONGREGATIONALIST, BOSTON, MASS.

The Plea of the Disciples of Christ, by W. T. Moore. Small 16mo., cloth, 140 pages, net postpaid, thirty-five cents, won immediate success.

George Hamilton Combs, pastor of the Independence Boulevard Christian Church, Kansas City, Mo., one of the great churches of the brotherhood, writes:

"I cannot thank Dr. W. T. Moore enough for having written his little book on "Our Plea." It is more than a statement; it is a philosophy. Irenic, catholic, steel-tone, it is just the handbook I shall like to put into the hands of the thinking man on the outside. In all of his useful and honored life Mr. Moore has rendered no greater service to a great cause."

JUDGE SCOFIELD'S FASCINATING TALE.

"Altar Stairs."

The Confirmation of Faith

Modern Science and Christianity Not Enemies But Allies of Our Christianity

It is perhaps little understood what service is being rendered our Christian faith by the careful and quiet work of investigators and teachers in the class-rooms of colleges and universities. There as in no other place the young men of our generation are facing the problems of biblical literature and Christian history. It is sometimes assumed that the only causes of the doubt and hesitance which manifest themselves in the attitude of young men toward the church are found in the failure of the latter to emphasize the old dogmatic teachings of the theology held a generation ago. There are preachers and writers who cease not to lament the loss of faith which, as they imagine and assert, is due to rationalism and unbelief in the seats of learning. Higher Criticism and modern views in general are charged with most of the present-day dissent from the orthodoxy of an earlier day.

The present generation of thoughtful young men finds itself in a world greatly altered from that of a half century ago. Many beliefs and opinions regarding religion, and especially Christianity, have been modified to such an extent that they no longer square at many points with the traditions handed down from the past. This is due to several causes. The careful study of the Bible has shown that some of the theories regarding it, such as verbal inspiration and infallibility in matters of history and science, will not stand the test of scrutiny, and that the claims made for the Book in these directions impose upon it a burden of inerrance which it neither asserts for itself nor is able to bear; and which, moreover, if thrust upon it would rob it of its essential human features, while in no degree exalting those which are divine.

Again, modern physical science, studied in every class-room from the primary grades of the public school to the graduate courses of the university, reveals a world little known either to the writers of Holy Scripture or the makers of much of the theology so recently held. By this science the world is brought into vital relations with a universe lying about it, and becomes in the process both larger and smaller—larger, because it has been more fully explored and its features described; smaller, because it is seen to be but a minute part of the universe, in all of which God is working out his plans.

These are but two of many lines of investigation which have thrown light upon the religious life. Many others, such as psychology, human origins and social science, might be named. Now the facts of these sciences are the commonplaces of the schools. Whether we accept them or reject them in our private confessions of faith, they are passing current in educational work. Whether or not what are known as the modern views of the Bible and of the universe are to be the final ones, no thoughtful person wishes to stop and debate. New facts are emerging every day, and it is enough to say that the critical view of the Scriptures and the evolutionary view of the world are those which best account for all the phenomena. What changes may come in the future, by reason of wider knowledge, we do not know. It is perfectly certain, however, that we shall not go back to the outgrown definitions of the past. We may give up the Copernican theory of astronomy for something more in harmony with the facts. We shall never go back to the Ptolemaic theory. We may find some better explanation of the literary history of the Bible than criticism, lower or higher, has given us. We shall never go back to the uncritical attitude of a generation ago.

In the meantime a host of young men are facing the problems raised by scientific study in our day, and many of them are seriously troubled to know how their childhood faith is to adjust itself to the views which are current all about them. They are dealing with text books on science which seem to be at variance with the views of the origin and nature of the world contained in the Bible. They are taught to raise the questions of criticism in reference to all the classic literature which is put in their hands. Is the Bible alone exempt from this process, and if so, why? Is there danger in the frank investigation of its claims? What is the strength of that Christian faith which trembles when criticism is applied to the Scriptures?

The problem of such young men is made more acute by the unwise methods of ill-informed ministers, whose attacks upon all that does not fall within the range of their own approval, tend to disquiet, discourage or disgust minds that are impressed with the lack of harmony between the preacher's message and the facts of the world in which he lives.

It is a satisfaction to know that this sort of ministry declines in number and effectiveness with each year. For the most part the men who are doing the work of the pulpit are making earnest efforts to meet the demands of their high calling by such acquaintances with the facts of Biblical literature and science as shall save them from leading their hearers either into false views of the situation, or unnecessary perplexity. There is no occasion for any man posing as a champion of either criticism or evolution. To do this would be as foolish as to attack them. What is needed is the saving knowledge that shall enable a minister of the Word to interpret the Gospel in terms which men can understand, and not to cloud his utterance with doubt or fear or malice. There never was a more admirable opportunity than the present time affords for a clear, ringing message regarding the essentials of our holy faith, the great "first principles of the Gospel of Christ," which modern criticism and science have not only left unimpeached, but immensely strengthened.

It is this work of mediating between Christian faith and modern education which is being accomplished by scores of earnest, faithful teachers, both in colleges and universities throughout the country. In their class-rooms the young men appear. weighing in their hearts the question, "Can the old faith live with the new?" and prepared, though not without regrets, to throw the old faith away and follow the leadings of the modern scientific world. Blessed is he who as a teacher realizes his opportunity to bring reconciliation and comfort. It is a satisfaction to know that so many men thus strategically placed are making full proof of their ministry as faithful servants of Jesus Christ. Not by denial and evasion, but by frank recognition of all the just demands of science and of criticism are they meeting the intellects of the young men of our day, and leading them to a firmer faith in God, in Our Saviour and in the Holy Scriptures.

Many a young man has come out of the class-room, having been helped to think the problem through, and confident that without having been "born again," intellectually, he could never have seen the kingdom of God. In this way the faith of many in our generation is being confirmed, even in institutions which are charged with the sin of iconoclasm and heresy. What is true of our own American colleges is equally true of many abroad. Principal Fairbairn, the leading representative of English Protestantism, in an address at Oxford on "Experience," gave an interesting bit of his own biography which is in point, "As a young man he began to feel the doubts which every honest young Christian man must have. But the doubts were stifled, for to express them would have been considered sin. When he entered the ministry and began to reflect on his future teaching, he found his faith shattered. At last he was compelled to give up the ministry and henceforth, he thought with sorrow, his only calling would be journalism, his only pulpit the daily Press. But a way was opened. He fled to that refuge of eager minds and perplexed souls, a German University. There he found the brisk American, full of honest doubt; the plump, well-groomed Englishman, with happy, comfortable faith; many of his own Scotch countrymen, full of doubts they dared not express; the vivacious Frenchman, the industrious German and the lively Swiss. There he gained a new faith, there he learned that God is necessary to man and man to God, and that Christ was the highest humanity and divinity combined; learned, too, to proclaim faithfully what he felt within him, a practice from which he has never since departed.

The confirmation of faith is not to be found in denying doubt, or seeking to stifle it, but in an honest effort to find the truth which meets all the facts. Happy is the preacher or the teacher who assists the young men of our day to this larger faith.

The Trend of Events

By Alva W. Taylor

THE RAILROAD HONOR ROLL

It has been noted in these columns that the Pennsylvania and Burlington roads report no passengers killed for one year past. Now the Rock Island, Sante Fe, and Northwestern render like reports. This is an honor roll. It is much better to save lives than to increase speed. Safety devices will do both. Here is demonstrated the salutary benefits of governmental demand for safety devices. Business exists for the sake of dividends. Government exists for the sake of protecting human life and morals. Corporations are inclined to do what individuals would not do. Thus government needs to oversee the protection of life and morals where dividends would be interfered with by the cost of their protection.

But what are the reports of the railroads on the safety of life and limb to employes, Within three days of the time the Northwestern reported no passengers killed during the past twelve months, it was found that five employes had been killed at one switch crossing in Chicago within two months. The latest reports available are for 1905 and they are confessedly incomplete. Yet they show that for that year one employe out of every 411 was killed and of the train operators one out of every 133 were martyrs to their calling, while one out of every nine was injured. In Germany only one operator out of every 180 is injured and one out of every 500 killed, i. e., German roads are twenty times more safe than Amerieau.

The five roads on the Honor Roll carried perhaps 100,000,000 passengers during the year. It is a remarkable record.

PELLAGRA

Both at Dunning, the Chicago Insane Asylum, and the state asylum at Bartonville, Ill., there has recently been several cases of Pellagra. Reports of its detection come from other places also. That it has existed before is not doubted, but it has been largely an unknown disease in this country. Its early symptoms are somewhat like eczema, but later it takes on something of the appearance of leprosy. It is not peculiar to insane persons, but leads to insanity and thus its discovery in the asylums. It has been known for a long time among the peasantry of Italy, Spain, the Alps, and other places in Southern Europe and is called Italian Leprosy, Alpine Scurvy, and other local names. The flesh becomes black and the sufferer falls into melancholy. It has commonly been believed to be caused by a fungus growth on mouldy corn or a ptomaine resulting from the decay of that widely used and nourishing cereal in lands of the peasantry. On the other hand it is pointed out that it is not common among the corn using peons of Mexico or the negroes of the South, who are great corn eaters and neither they nor the Mexicans are noted for carefulness in using fresh and hygienic meal. The southern cases reported so far in this country appear to all be whites, but that may argue little. In any disease there must be conditions as well as initial causes and the solution of seeming contradictions may be found in varying conditions and the stale corn theory justified. It is a dreadful disease, but the nervous and apprehensive need have no terrors if they continue to eat clean corn meal and live hygienically.

THE HOUSE OF THE GRAFTER A HOUSE OF CARDS

The conviction of Inspector McCann has proven a bombshell in the camp of the grafter in the western metropolis. Many are now anxious to "tell all they know" and it is believed that Chicago is on the eve of a vast uncovering of the corruption that every one knows to exist. McCann will take an appeal, so it is not yet legally settled that he is guilty. The twelve men who heard the case had little difficulty in reaching their verdict, however. The only man who voted against conviction says he did it, not because he believed the Inspector innocent, but because he thought the character of the witnesses against him justified the giving of the doubt to him. The other jurors say that it was not the testimony of the Franks, the keepers of the vicious resorts who testified that they both collected and paid bribes, but the corroborative testimony and the failure of the defence's witnesses to clear up vital points. The public has no doubt about there being "men higher up." But to catch them is quite another thing. Ex-Chief of Police Shippy is in Germany "for his health." He resigned at the early stages of State's Attorney Wayman's administration and when things were warming up went to Germany. Naturally the coincidences create suspicion and McCann is being urged to tell all he knows and many interpret certain actions of the State's Attorney to indicate that he hopes the convicted Inspector will do it.

The house of the corrupt and the grafter is a house of cards. Guilty men will seek to save their own when suspicion points an accusing finger. They have connived together but none will risk overmuch for the sake of standing by his fellows in crime. The same conscience that enabled them to bribe will enable them to "peach." After all, there is not so much honor among thieves. What there is may be traced to the belief that they must protect one another to save self.

If the State's Attorney has pulled the card that will bring the whole house down upon the guilty heads, he will be able to clean the Augean stables of some of their mire. But they will never be clean while the saloon is an open outlaw by the express consent of the officers of the law nor while partizan politics makes pawns of good citizenship. It is a truism that the city will be no cleaner than the citizens desire it to be. But the majority do really desire it to be cleaner and they could have it cleaner if they would devote themselves to the obnoxious task of cleaning it. They have made it too much "what is everybody's business is nobody's business" and are all too much inclined to sneer at the "professional reformer." The decent men of Chicago could "clean up" the city if they would devote themselves to the task as assiduously as does the grafter devote himself to his job.

THE SECRET OF CHOLERA FOUND

The quiet erudition of German scientists probes to the secret of remote causes. Nothing seems hidden to their microscopes and chemical analysis but the secret of life itself. Prof. Emmerich asserts that he has found the secret of cholera. The layman to science understands that bacilli perform a chemical action in the human system and free certain elements that act for the weal or woe of the body. Prof. Emmerich discovers that the cholera bacilli transforms the nitrates of food into nitrites and releases free nitrous acid in the intestinal tract. He contends that cholera can be absolutely prevented by refusing to eat nitrogenous vegetables and meats cured with saltpeter and the drinking of water infected with nitrogenous matter, and that abstainence from these things even after infection will save many lives.

THE LIGHT OF LIFE IN THE DARK CONTINENT

Winston Churchill, the rising young English statesman, calls Uganda the "most beautiful and peaceful land he knows of" and says it is the only country he ever visited where everybody seems to go to church. Last November the Kings of Toro, Bunyoro, and Ankale went with the King of Uganda in royal procession to the Cathedral at Mengo to worship. Within the memory of living men their wars knew no truce and a generation ago Uganda's king made great slave raiding forays on these other tribes. Today there are at least 400,000 Christians among them and the masses are lifted immeasurably by the civilization that Christianity brings. In all Africa today there are nearly a million adherents to the Christian religion among the natives. There are 2,500 missionaries, 13,000 native workers and 4,000 schools.

TEMPERANCE NOTES

The Mayor of Atlanta declared at the recent convention of the League of American Municipalities that his city not only had not suffered from the prohibition of liquor but had profited by it.

Two big Idaho counties are "dry"—the only two yet allowed to vote under their new local option law—one of them by 60 per cent and the other by 75 per cent majority. They give a "dry" area as large as several New England states and best of all have large mining populations.

Indiana has but one county left that is all "black." Vanderburg has that humiliation and Evansville is its metropolis. Sixty-eight are all "white" and most of the others have only "black" spots left on them.

A National W. C. T. U. has been organized in Mexico. The National Department of Education extended many courtesies and showed much interest.

The Nickelodeon is pronounced a foe of the saloon. The barkeepers always oppose its establishment near them, says Chicago's Building Inspector. They take the nickels that beer would otherwise have gotten.

"Dramshop indemnity" is now extended to an insurance of saloon keepers against damages assessed by the courts for death caused by liquor.

The National Anti-Saloon League has dedicated its new printing plant at Westville, O., near Columbus. It has a capacity of 600,000,000 pages annually. They will "sow the country knee deep with literature."

Dr. O. C. Wilhite, General Superintendent of Cook County Institution, told the Illinois Conference of Charities that of the insane men at Dunning 44 per cent had used alcohol to excess and 51 per cent moderately. In other words, 95 per cent used strong liquor. This was true of 59 per cent of the female inmates. Of the tubercular cases the men showed 94 per cent were users of the alcholic drug.

In Vienna 32 per cent of the school children drink beer. Teachers testify that it blunts the mental powers of the pupil. In England and Wales 2,000,000 liquor fed children add a holocaust to infant mortality.

Sir Thos. Whittaker M. P. says it costs the people of Britain $820,000,000 annually to get the state $190,000,000 revenue.

Out of every 100,000 men of 30 years who practice total abstinence 55,000 will reach the age of 70, while of the same number who drink, but 44,000 will reach the three score and ten.

The English workingman who drinks spends on an average $75 per year for his toddy out of an average wage of $350 to $400.

England and Wales have lost 3,919 public bars in the last two years, but there has been an increase of 980 clubs where the members can get liquor. There is yet a public bar for every thirty-four of the population.

There are thirteen state capitals in the "dry" column. They are Augusta, Me.; Bismarcy, N. D.; Topeka, Kas.; Atlanta, Ga.; Jackson, Miss.; Nashville, Tenn.; Raleigh, N. C.; Montgomery, Ala.; Oklahoma City, Okla.; Concord, N. H.; Montpelier, Vt.; Lincoln, Neb., and the last to join the column, Charleston, W. Va.

In 1908, 15,000 saloons were put out of business in the United States and 325,000 square miles, with 4,300,000 population, was added to "dry" territory.

THE PROCESSION OF THE "DRYS"

Perhaps the most remarkable spectacular demonstration ever made on behalf of temperance was the procession that marched through the streets of Chicago on September 25. There were thousands of men, women, and children on foot, in automobiles and floats, with flying banners and inscriptions in the parade that marched down Michigan avenue and back through State street. It required two hours and a quarter to pass one point and had all those who rode in the great floats been on foot it would have been a much longer column. Hundreds of ministers marched four deep at the head of the procession led by Gen. Frederick Grant, U. S. A.

A list of the devices would be very interesting, but perhaps the most telling was one designed by Arthur Burrage Farwell of the Law and Order League. Behind a hearse there marched fifty-seven ghosts—men draped in ghostly white with masks and each carrying a banner on which was inscribed the name of a murder victim of the Chicago Sunday saloon within the past few years. Another was a wagon with thirty of the seediest old bums that could be hired to ride under the inscription "Whisky Made Us." The most pathetic was a widowed mother and her five little children who came and begged to be allowed to ride under words that told how whisky had killed the father and husband. Men rode water wagons, little children sang songs, women arranged telling floats, bands played, many of the old veterans of the G. A. R. marched to show their colors, men's clubs kept step as they will to the polls, and thousands thus made a more telling address against the saloon than platforms ever can and to an audience that numbered hundreds of thousands.

TO "REFORM" (?) THE SALOON

The Illinois Liquor Dealers resolved that the saloon should be reformed. In their meeting at Springfield on September 22 they adopted their code for "cleaning up" and making the saloon such "a place of business that neighbors will feel it a necessity instead of a hindrance" by "respecting the wishes of the neighbors in every possible way." They would prohibit serving any drinks to women at the bar; allow no gambling on the premises; stop the 5c growler; discontinue promiscuous giving of Christmas presents; exclude all indecent pictures and cards either in the saloon or as advertising for it. And after they have done it all, they will awake to cry with Lady Macbeth "Out damned spot," for the business carries a guilt that will not out so long as it exists.

CAN UNCLE SAM BREAK THE STATE LAWS?

Governor Haskell is putting a straight case up to the federal government. In a letter to President Taft he asks if the national government will aid and abet the violation of Oklahoma's laws by continuing to grant federal licenses to sell the liquor that the state says shall not be sold and to protect interstate shipment of that into the state which the state makes an outlaw when it crosses the borders. He points out that both by enactment of congress and of the people of the state the sale of liquor is prohibited but that by federal license 1,200 men are empowered to break those enactments and that through interstate commerce protection carload lots of liquor are shipped into the state and sold despite the state's effort to prohibit such sales. By the payment of a fee to Uncle Sam anyone may get his protection in breaking the laws of the state. Further, they obtain license to nullify acts of the federal government itself for it was by an enabling act of congress that the state was established and adopted the constitution that prohibits the sale of liquor and by special congressional enactment that the Indians are given protection from its sale for the next twenty-one years. The Governor makes out a case that will require ingenuity to evade and one that will prove a powerful document in the renewed efforts to prevent the granting of federal licenses in prohibition territory.

Editorial

THE Standard (Baptist) of this city in its issue of September 25 presented a series of most interesting and valuable contributions on the financial problem in the churches. It is perhaps the first time in the history of religious journalism that almost an entire number of any journal has been devoted to questions growing out of the financial side of church work.

PRESIDENT F. E. Clark and Secretary William Shaw will sail From New York to attend the Fourth World Christian Endeavor Convention, to be held at Agara, India, November 20-23, 1909. There they will see something of the work that has been done not only by the different churches in mission fields but as well by Christian Endeavorers through the direct agency of the United Society.

THE Gipsy Smith campaign of evangelism is under way in Chicago at the 7th Regiment Armory at the corner of Thirty-fourth street and Wentworth avenue. Two years ago the same evangelist conducted a notably successful mission in the city. He came nearer to the goal of a united and really effective piece of evangelistic work than any other man who has been in Chicago. His preaching was earnest and convincing. A similar effort is being made at present, especially under the leadership of the Laymen's Evangelistic Committee. A large body of churches is earnestly assisting in the work. The Christian Century will present to its readers a characterization and estimate of the work of Gipsy Smith after the Pittsburg convention.

THE campaign which State's Attorney Wayman is conducting in pursuit of the grafters and other evil-doers in the city of Chicago is encouraging to every believer in the victory of law and order. Two weeks ago he secured the conviction of Inspector McCann, one of the leading members of the police force, who was accused of accepting bribes from the owners of notorious evil places on the west side. Mr. Wayman is also investigating the system of selecting grand juries, which he claims has been manipulated in the interest of law breakers for years. It is not too much to say that the corrupt political forces of Chicago are thoroughly alarmed at the aggressive and fearless manner in which Mr. Wayman is proceeding with his task of investigation. It begins to look as if it were possible for even the most deeply intrenched corruption to be unearthed and punished. A State's Attorney of this character is a rare possession. It was feared at the time of Mr. Wayman's election that the forces that secured his promotion in opposition to the other candidates were going to dictate his policy. But his actions thus far have been a gratifying disproof of this charge. If he keeps to his career of fearless prosecution of evil he has before him one of the most brilliant careers a public officer ever enjoyed.

THE studies issued by the American Institute of Social Service, under the general title of "The Gospel of the Kingdom" last year, and used extensively by churches is to be followed this season by another course on similar lines. The lessons of last year were divided by months into such topics as "Child Labor," "Woman in Industry," "Wealth and Capital," the "Organization of Labor," "Housing," "Civic Corruption," "Public Utilities," "Socialism," "Immigration," "Foreign Relations," "The Race Question," "Labor Conditions," "Prison Reform," "Intemperance," and "Marriage." These ran from October, 1908, to December, 1909, and proved themselves very suggestive and helpful as topics for church classes, prayer meeting groups, and others. This season it is the plan of the editor, Dr. Josiah Strong, to coördinate these lessons on "The Gospel of the Kingdom" with the International Sunday-school lessons for 1910. The preliminary outline of these studies is now issued. They run through the Gospel of Matthew, and each lesson presents some phase of the social question. Among the general topics are the following: January, "What the Kingdom Is"; February, "The Law of the Kingdom"; March, "Work in the Kingdom"; April, "Government and the Kingdom"; May, "The City and the Kingdom," etc. These studies are admirably adapted for prayer meeting topics or any other form of class work that may be desired.

PROFESSOR George Adam Smith, as was noted in the Christian Century at the time, was one of the instructors and lecturers at the University of Chicago during the summer. He appeared at Chautauqua and in various other places in this part of the country, after which he went to the Pacific Coast for several engagements. He writes to one of the editors of the Biblical World a letter from which the following excerpt will prove of interest:

"I wrote you from the Grand Canyon. After that I went through the Mojaveh Desert to Los Angeles. In the Desert our train was sidetracked—at a place called Scam!!—for fourteen hours. There by a curious coincidence I read in a Los Angeles paper the headline 'Scotch Critic Sidetracked.' This referred to the fact that after the Federation of Los Angeles Churches had asked me to lecture to them and fixed the lecture for Immanuel Presbyterian Church, the elders of this church (in the absence of the minister on holiday) discovered that I was a Higher Critic and refused to grant the church for such a pestilent heretic. Was it not curious that I should read this paragraph with such a heading when I was actually physically sidetracked? But the best is to come. The Disciples being in convention at Los Angeles asked me to lecture or preach to them instead. I nearly took the text, 'Now these (of Berea) were more noble than those of Thessalonica in that they heard the Word gladly.' Prof. Willett will be interested to hear of the hospitality to a critic shown by his brethren."

THE revolutionary action of the Chicago School Board in appointing a woman, Mrs. Ella Flagg Young, to the superintendency of schools startled the educational world and gave rise to many grave expressions of misgiving regarding the results. The best informed observers, however, are confident that the choice is in every way to be commended and that Mrs. Young's regime will mark a new order of things in the school system of this city. It is difficult adequately to conceive the magnitude of the problems falling to the administrative oversight of the superintendent and board of instruction. Chicago has 290 public school buildings, with 5,548 school rooms and sittings for 272,634 pupils. The total number of school pupils is something more than 300,000. The number of teachers is 6,300, the average daily attendance of pupils is 245,000. Some of these children are defectives of one class or another. 100 are blind; 250 are cripples; 300 are deaf. For these children special arrangements have to be made. The total value of public school property in Chicago is more than $50,000,000. The annual appropriation for the schools is about $18,000,000. The attendance in the largest of the schools is 2,500 daily. One of the schools, the Oliver Goldsmith, is said to have the most cosmopolitan attendance of any in the city, more than twenty nationalities being included in its list of pupils. During the past ten years the increase in school attendance has been about 60,000, and the number of new teachers required about 1,000. It is easy to see that a school system of this magnitude requires the oversight of the most experienced and vigilant character. Mrs. Young begins her administration with the hearty good will not only of those interested officially in school work, but of the entire citizenship of Chicago. Her long experience in educational work in the public schools, in the University of Chicago, and as the head of the Cook County Normal School, have entitled her to this confidence. Her work, of whose success few have doubts, will be another proof of woman's ability to attack and master the most difficult problems of our modern age.

The Preacher and the Modern World

AN EXAMPLE of the evil that well-intentioned Christians may do is found in the attacks which ministers often make upon what they regard as pernicious doctrines which have, none the less, won acceptance in the world of science and experience. It is not infrequently the case that ministers rush thoughtlessly into attacks upon evolution and higher criticism, denouncing both and insisting that both have been disproved, whereas many of their hearers are perfectly aware that the minister is either misinformed or is willfully perverting the facts.

A case in point is a recent utterance by Dr. A. C. Dixon of this city, a Baptist minister who is, nevertheless, the pastor of the Moody Church on the north side. Dr. Dixon is one of the old school type of men. Everything relating to modern study is to him obnoxious and hostile to the Christian faith. He recently preached a sermon which he published as an advertisement in the columns of one of the Chicago daily papers on "The Passing of Evolution." In this sermon he gathered up utterances from more or less eminent scholars, running over the past twenty years, in order to prove that the scientific world is giving up the doctrine of evolution and returning to the older views of a static universe.

It is not easy to conceive how a man of intelligence can make such statements and keep honesty with himself. The doctrine of evolution has passed through many phases since it was first promulgated by Darwin in the "Origin of Species." The doctrines of natural selection, the survival of the fittest, the influence of the power of heredity, and various other phases of the theme have been searchingly investigated and, in a variety of ways, modified and changed with the passing of time. The field has widened on every side. Inquiries that had not begun in Darwin's day are now being pushed with enthusiasm by a multitude of scholars. Theories that were accepted in the earlier period are now seen to be incapable of explaining all the facts.

But the fundamental principle of evolution has not only triumphed in every direction but is the only working theory that any scientist of repute accepts at the present time. To denounce evolution from the pulpit, the lecture platform, or the newspaper column is as childish a pursuit as it was for the monks of Pisa to deride the astronomical views of Galileo. The business of the Christian preacher and teacher is not to throw himself against the current of facts nor to throw dust in the air by denying the manifest and established truths of science, but rather to discover in those truths the values which Christianity may derive from them.

This is the task of the newer Christian scholarship. The early fear that evolution was about to drive God out of the universe has ceased to have place in the minds of informed men. And any collection of utterances from the leading scientists of the time, attempting to deny the validity of the general principles of evolution or of criticism, only reveals the ignorance and prejudice of those who resort to these methods. Variety of opinion, controversy, and criticism of variant opinions there will be among scholars both in biblical and scientific studies to the end of the day. Only so can the facts be tested and errant theories suppressed. But the great established principles both of evolutionary and critical study are the commonplaces of all informed men in our generation.

Mighty of heart, mighty of mind, magnanimous—to be this is indeed to be great in life; to become this increasingly is indeed "to advance in life"—in life itself, not in the trappings of it. An education of soul is possible which in itself is advancement in life—any other may perhaps be advancement in death. He only is advancing in life whose heart is growing softer, whose blood warmer, whose brain quicker, whose spirit is entering into living peace. And they who have this life in them are the true lords of the earth—they and they only.—From John Ruskin, in Sesame and Lilies.

A True Priest of God

A Visit with Rev. Charles S. Medbury and an Interpretation of His Personality and Work

By Charles Clayton Morrison

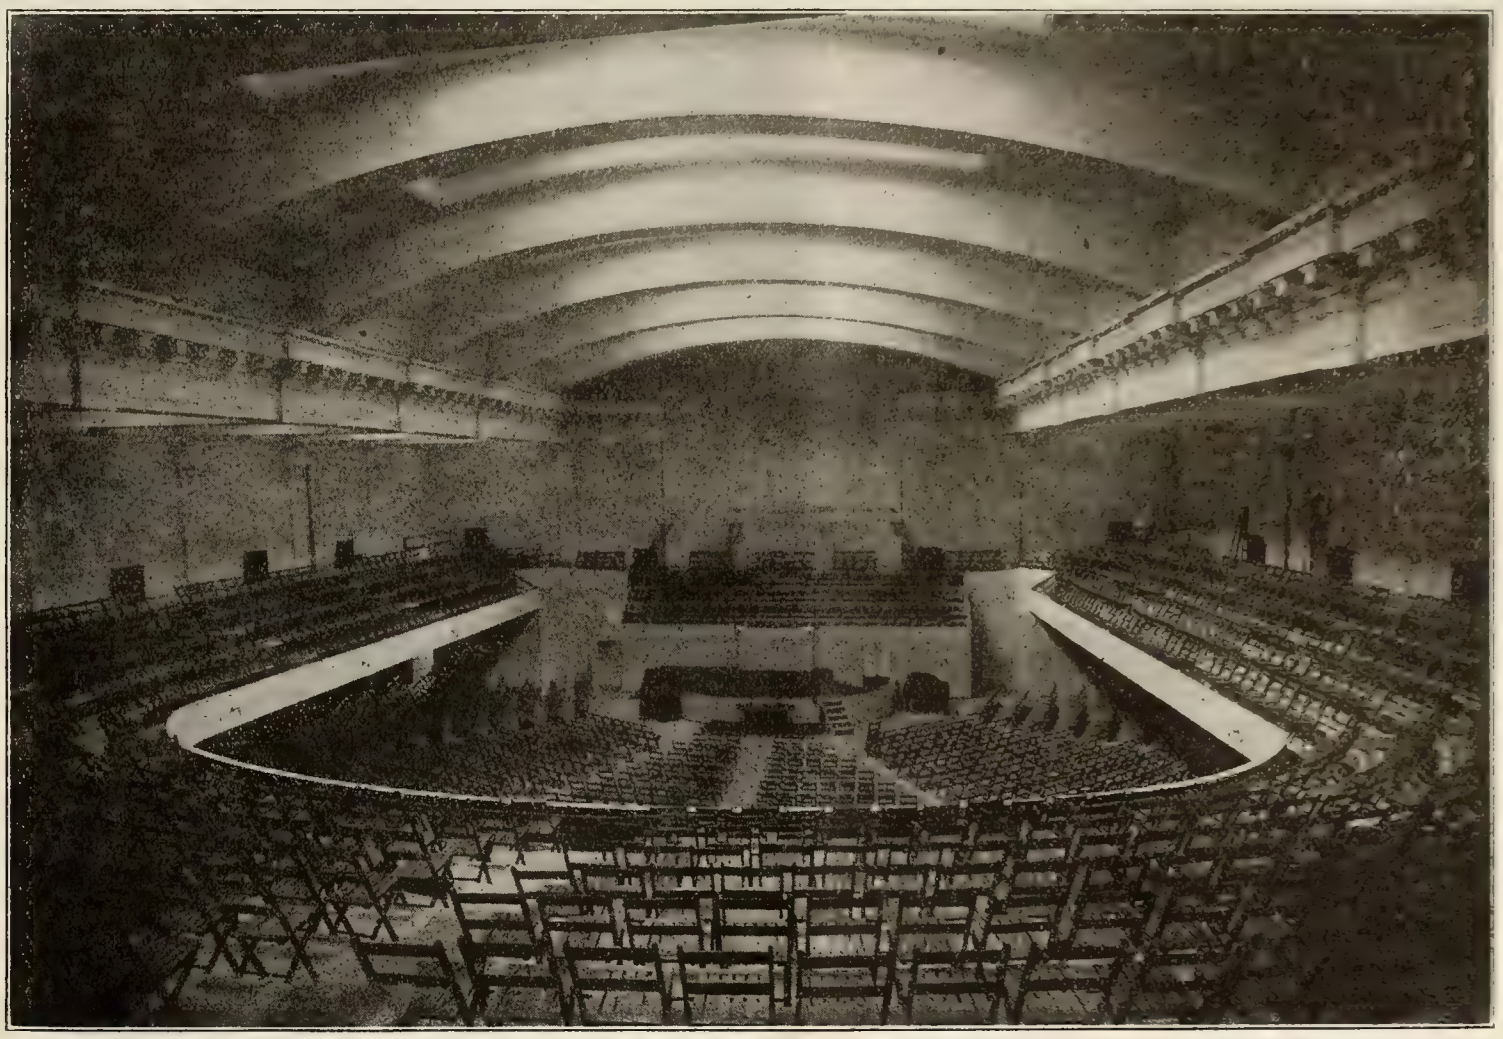
"We feel that there is a power in his life that we need and do not have, and we must let him teach us that we too may possess what he has"—this is the way a young woman of University Place, Des Moines, described her attitude toward her pastor, Rev. Charles S. Medbury.

And when I reduced to their essential meaning the varying words in which scores of others characterized him I found that everybody felt the same way—that he had found the inner secret of life and was making it his business to communicate it to the great flock God had given him.

It was his spiritual leadership of which everybody spoke. It was not difficult to get people to talk of him. I seemed to find them already talking of him when I approached. He is a perennial theme of conversation in University Place. Nobody says he is a great executive. He is not a manipulator of men and of situations. But he has a way of getting others with organizing talent to take responsibilities which many other ministers take upon themselves. As a result this great congregation of nearly three thousand souls is organized with marvelous adequacy.

Nobody says he is an orator. I do not hear of his going out much as a popular lecturer on the platform. There is no sign of artifice in his speaking. You never in the world would call him clever in public address—that is to say, you never would think of him as clever.

Neither does any one call him a scholar. His preaching and his conversation do not disclose erudition. He doesn't gain your admiration by overwhelming you with his superior learning.



No, these are not the things the people of University Place say of their pastor.

They say Charles S. Medbury is a wonderful man.

They believe in him. He seems to them absolutely genuine. The spirit that shines in his face, in his tone and his speech is the holy spirit, they feel. They told me that he was always the same, that there were no hills and valleys in his life. (I wanted to ask his wife about that, and will some time.) They feel that his comfort is heartful, that his monitions are prompted by sincere human interest, that the ideals he urges upon others are the warp of his own experience, that his enthusiasm is non-professional, natural, that his faith is utterly unfeigned. In a word, his people feel that he knows where God may be found and that he yearns earnestly to show others the way thither.

I have never seen a pastor more universally revered. In the past six years so many of his parishioners have spoken such extravagant words in my hearing that I confess a bit of cynicism lurked in the background of my mind when I went out to Des Moines to visit with him. But two hours after I reached the city I was convinced that the parish of my Alma Mater is presided over by a true priest of God.

It was my good fortune to attend the opening chapel exercise for the new year at Drake University. I arrived a few minutes late and tried to get into the auditorium by the main entrance, but was told by the usher that every seat on the main floor was taken and that I would have to go to the balcony. Upstairs I found every seat occupied, but the usher kindly gave me his and stood himself. Fifteen hundred young men and women packing that auditorium was the sight I looked down upon.

Interior of the New Mammoth Auditorium at University Place.

Mr. Medbury, the chaplain of the university, was talking when I entered, evidently finishing an invitation to the new students to attend services at his church on Sundays. Following his own invitation he spoke on behalf of other churches of various denominations in the neighborhood, urging those who had denominational predelections to attend their own churches. Any Catholic students that might be in the university he urged not to loosen their hold upon religion, but to make their presence known to the priest of the nearby parish.

The chaplain addresses the students one morning each week. This being the first chapel service of the new school year he was given more time than usual. He spoke on "The Kind of Men the Times Demand." The outline of his talk was very simple. The world of today demands informed men, trained men, men faithful in little things, chivalrous men with a fine reverence for women, clean men without swagger, and men who fear God.

I am very fond of a good outline, and I confess I do not regard that much of an outline. Almost any student preacher in the Drake Bible College could have made as good a one.

But not many preachers in the American pulpit could have made the address Chaplain Medbury made that morning. It was the note my soul always responds to. I believe every life will respond to it. Those fifteen hundred young people riveted their attention on his every word. His message was one of uncompromising idealism. He spoke for the fine things, the rich values of the inner life. His word was effective even to the dividing asunder of joints and marrow. He seemed to have entrance to the soul of every one that heard him, and with persuasion and subtlest delicacy touched dull consciences into life.

I would not write this way if I had not myself been helped by his word. There was not one ragged sentence in his speech. He thought his statements through to the last word. No sign of shiftless preparation was apparent. Yet his discourse was not committed to memory. It was as if our souls were communing together and he was answering the inarticulate questions of our hearts.

What was the effect of his address? Two effects, at least: First, the ideals that flit and fade in our souls were given clear outlines of light. No young man could escape the sharp condemnation of his own soul for his coarse habits. No young woman could be content with the "second best," but must strive for the best possible. The chaplain made the good beautiful and opened our eyes to see and desire it.

And the other effect of the address was to make you want to have a heart to heart talk with the man himself, to tell him your problems, and perhaps your moral secrets, to get not only his counsel for your specific problems or temptations, but to gain his secret, the power by which his own life is lived. For you felt as you listened to him that he was trying through the coarse medium of words to transmit something of priceless value to you—not a formula, not a dogma, not a creed, but a spirit, a holy spirit, which he could have received nowhere save from God.

I am sure many felt that way, for as I walked out upon the campus in company with Mr. Medbury I cannot say how many young people, especially young men, in greeting him said, "I want to have a talk with you whenever you will let me." He had to put them all off for that afternoon for he had given himself to me. But after we had finished our three hour's talk together in a place where we could be free from interruption and had returned to his offices I found his rooms well filled with young people who wished "a little of his time."

This is why I say of Charles S. Medbury that he is a priest.

I know that word will mislead the superficial reader who does not know him, the reader who will not try to understand the reasons that I give for applying that word to him. But I use it just the same. Of course it is not that Mr. Medbury looks like a priest. If he did I should certainly not call him one. Nobody would think of calling him "Father." Everybody calls him "Brother Medbury." But that is just a reason why he is a priest. Was not the great Priest the Elder Brother? Nor does he wear the clothes of a priest or adopt any of the insignia of priestly dignity. If he did I should not call him a real priest of God. His priesthood is not official, but human. He lives very near his people's lives. All his thoughts are of them. When he travels in Colorado and California he sends them a sweet message for each Sunday. He is accessible to them always. They bring their burdens to him and he bears them. He suffers with them. Aye, and he bears their sin in his own body and fills up that which is lacking of the sufferings of Christ on their behalf.

Isn't that being a priest? Isn't it being a priest just to be a good pastor and bishop of souls? That is what makes Charles S. Medbury the great spiritual force he is in Des Moines. And what I felt as I heard him speak in the chapel and what I inferred from the characterizations of others was confirmed to me in my heart to heart visit with him that afternoon.

He showed me through the beautiful new auditorium that was dedicated last spring. It is one of the largest Protestant church buildings in America. There is none in Chicago so large. The old church, still standing hard by and connected by a hallway with the new, was supposed to be an admirable thing before the pastor proposed the new. But that night at prayer-meeting the lower floor of this old building was comfortably full. There were nigh 500 people present! On Sundays Mr. Medbury preaches to nigh 3,000 people in the auditorium, both morning and evening. They are going to remodel the old church into modern Sunday-school quarters shortly.

The new auditorium is a tasteful, dignified building suggesting worship as soon as you enter. We sat down, the pastor and I, on the comfortable chairs in the pulpit and talked together about the great things of the Kingdom of God that lie close to the hearts of both of us. He told me about his work in his own church, about the estimate he placed upon the service of worship. He believes in quietness and order and thoughtfulness in worship. He likes the good hymns and wishes he could train his people out of the use of the cruder sort of popular church music which present day publishers are dumping so fast upon the churches. The music in his church is led by a large chorus choir conducted by Mr. Holmes Cowper, the tenor soloist of nationwide reputation.

Mr. Medbury loves to preach. And he believes preaching does good! We discussed the innovation adopted by a number of churches of late, that of combining the Sunday-school and morning worship into a single service by making an exposition of the Scripture lesson take the place of the sermon. This Mr. Medbury said would not fully meet the needs of the people. In this busy, rushing, flippant time there needs to be one service at least into which people can come and composedly meditate upon the issues of life. In that service he believes the sermon by a true man of God is indispensable.

The Christian Endeavor society he admitted is something of a problem even in a church so palpitant with young life as his. Among the younger young people it appears to flourish more than among the older—perhaps because the older ones have in a university community so many varieties of social and serviceful diversions.

In the matter of manning the church Mr. Medbury was profoundly appreciative of his men. The strong men of the community are on the official board. They take responsibility. They do not ask him to do what they can do. They set him free to do his own work—what they cannot do.

A Campus Scene on Commencement Day at Drake.

We talked of the new century upon which the Disciples of Christ were entering. I was much interested here. The Centennial President of the American Missionary Society believes profoundly in th mission of the Disciples in their second century. He regards the the mission of the Disciples in their second century. He regards the desirable among us if we are adequately to meet our new opportunity. One of these reforms concerns our evangelism. Mr. Medbury fears (he spoke cautiously but with great clearness) that our evangelism is growing too mechanical, lacking in genuine spirituality, controlled in a dangerous degree by the hypnotic principle. I have never heard a more incisive analysis of revivalistic method than I heard in that visit. "Many of the obvious results of a revival are so indisputably good," he said, "that it is most difficult to make the average person discern and take account of the evils that lie below the surface."

He does not like to feel that we are so dependent upon periodic revivals as we seem to be. Mr. Medbury believes in a constant evangelism, an evangelism that is carried on by a pastor and a church who conceive themselves as entrusted with a real evangel, an evangelism that knits itself into the processes of normal religious culture. To this end he expressed the hope that our next century might exhibit to the world an "impassioned ministry." Something like this sentiment, I imagine, will enter into his presidential address at Pittsburg.

Of course we could not talk together long without getting to the theological subject. I asked him half-facetiously if our plea was broad enough to fellowship both conservatives and progressives, so-called. He smiled and answered with facetious equivocation that probably certain individuals of both schools would be lost to the brotherhood. I discreetly refrained from asking him to be more particular!

And then we talked about Jonah and the whale and Willett and Sweeney, and while we could agree pretty well on which swallowed which in the first case, we were both hopelessly at sea as to which did the swallowing in the second. Our talk at this point was not all playful, however. There was deep seriousness about it on both sides. Mr. Medbury's beliefs were very simple, he said; he accepted the meaning that lies "on the very face of the Scriptures," and that was in the main the prevailing popular belief. I suggested that the orthodox and customary view seemed to "lie on the face of the Scriptures" only because from childhood we have been trained to regard the Bible in a certain way, and that if from childhood we had been trained to think of the Bible in a way appropriate to the "modern" view we would find the "old" view not only impossible to hold but most difficult to grasp at all. Mr. Medbury would not assent to this, quite, but there was no contentiousness in his manner.

This priest-hearted pastor, sharing as he does the inner life of these students, is brought face to face daily with faiths that have become unsteady by contact with the newer learning. His eyes filled with tears as he meditatively recalled the many instances of those who had been, as he said, "lost to the cause" through higher criticism and modern science. Surely this pastor of college students is in a strategic position. On the one hand strong, well-trained collegiate instructors, thoroughly modern, ingraining a scientific attitude in the minds of the students. On the other hand, equally strong theological instructors maintaining views and a point of view thoroughly discredited among scholars. Between these two stands the pastor to give guidance to those young souls who have thought seriously enough into their studies to feel a strain between their religious ideas and the ideas that have become commonplace among scholars.

It is a position any preacher might at once covet and dread. Mr. Medbury and I do not agree as to a method of procedure in such a position. He would call the student back to the beliefs that are being shaken. I would call him forward to the larger faith made possible by his new beliefs. I doubt if the full function of priesthood can be exercised for college students by one who has not himself experienced profoundly the force and revelation of the newer learning that is today the very atmosphere of scholarly institutions. Mr. Medbury turned interviewer while our conversation dwelt upon this theme and asked for my way of dealing with doubt. I quite forgot my editorial purposes in conducting the interview and spoke rather earnestly of my own experience in guiding distressed souls into the faith of which my own heart is so sure. All the while as I spoke there was lying in the background of my mind the memory of my own personal experience in Drake University while I was yet a sophomore. I had read a book which had greatly upset my hitherto perfectly conventional religious ideas. I came in my distress to dear Dean Robert Mathews, the most helpful teacher I ever had. Shortly after in a class he began a paragraph by saking, "Young men, I am a stout Darwinian." My confusion was worse confounded. I supposed no one could be a "Darwinian" and a Christian. I went to Dr. Mathews again and asked him to help me. Many talks and a precious friendship grew out of this beginning, and by the time I graduated I was firmly in the possession of a faith entirely freed from the conventional dogmas of orthodoxy.

Another Bit of Drake Campus.

I shall ever be deeply grateful to this other priest of God for his intercession in behalf of my faith when I stood between the beliefs that were dead and the new beliefs that were filling and firing my soul.

The conversation with Mr. Medbury was very intimate and tender on this theme. It seemed to be very much alive in the heart of this pastor of students. Of one thing I am sure, whether his theology is right or wrong, Charles S. Medbury has but one desire and that is to know the truth. He seeks but one end and that is the spiritual and moral good of those who come to him for counsel.

I attended his prayer-meeting at night. It almost scared me! The great room of the old church building was so nearly full that I had to sit on the second pew from the front. Think of a prayer-meeting like that! Mr. Medbury was leader. The subject seemed to be Bible Study, looking forward to the "Declaration Sunday" following when they expected to have 3,000 in their school. The people talked fast. The leader had a hard time closing the talk. There was enthusiasm for big things in the school the next Sunday.

Mr. Medbury made it a sort of a family meeting. He read to the people certain letters sent him by the missionary secretaries. A young Japanese girl about to return to her own country after three years in Drake was asked to speak, and afterward a gift was presented her by the young people's society. The pastor mentioned a number of people who were ill or in other distress and urged the members to have fellowship in ministering to them.

There were two things that impressed me in the prayer-meeting. There seemed to be a disproportionate emphasis on the size of the school for which they were striving the next Sunday, to the exclusion of the character of the training which the pupils would receive. I heard no word that indicated that the University Sunday-school had been touched vitally by the great new ideals that are passing into the best schools. I do not offer this as a severe criticism. One must not expect all the virtues in one place. But as I heard the plans for a "rousing" school, a "record breaker" in class and in total attendance, I could not help thinking what vast significance this school with its scores of trained workers already at hand might have if it were organized on a thorough, out-and-out pedagogical basis.

The other thing that impressed me was the responsiveness of strong men to the leadership of this preacher. If I were a pure outsider looking at the situation coldly I would have found a cynical humor in the attentiveness, the reverence, the obedience of big, burly business men of the world to the every word and suggestion of this lad-like appearing leader. The prayer-meeting was filled with virile men, and before them stood a pale, gentle, modest pastor. He had found the way to their hearts. He needed no trick of diplomacy to get them to do what he wished. He affected no official dignity. He kept nothing up his sleeve. Everybody could see clear through him. His purpose was simple, single—to open their lives toward God, to aid them in meeting the otherwise resistless current of sordid materialism, to burn away the dross from their hearts and to make the good seem lovely and duty seem a joy.

This is the genius of Charles S. Medbury—that by instinct and without art he cares for the souls Christ has given him and they, needful as their lives are of spiritual power, turn to him and follow him to the heights of spiritual vision which his soul has so well explored.

May our Great High Priest stand beside him as he ministers at the altar of our Centennial convention.

The Hidden Sources of Power

"In quietness and in confidence shall be your strength."—Isaiah

By W. T. Moore, L.L.D.

Strength universally challenges admiration. The athlete who performs prodigies of strength receives the public applause. Even the pugilist depends upon his strength for victory. Napoleon may not have been entirely right when he said that "God is always on the side of the strongest battalions," but in military tactics the strongest counts for much.

But if this be true with respect to physical strength, it is certainly equally true with respect to moral and intellectual strength. The man who has strength of character, all other things being equal, will always command the public applause rather than the moral or intellectual weakling. The great men of all ages have been characterized by strength of character, and character is simply the concrete of qualities that make for strength.

But, while all this is true, and will generally be conceded, it is equally true that we often miss the true sources of strength, and consequently we become weaklings when we ought to become strong and robust in character. We are largely influenced by spectacular manifestations. We follow the crowd. We are under the influence of the purely sensuous. We hear only the loud reports; and yet there is nothing clearer in the teaching of the scriptures, as well as in our own experiences, than that power resides in silent courses, and not in the rattle of wheels, the roar of busy life, or the thundering of the storm cloud. These loud reports are usually the manifestations of power which lie back in the Unseen, or the silent courses of nature and grace. Even the lightning is the flash of the electrical life in death, while the thunder's deep portentous roar is the dying groan of the electricity which sleeps in the storm clouds. The sunlight, that comes down through the bright hours, giving life and beauty to all created things, makes no noise—and yet this sunlight is the source of infinite strength to all physical things. The most powerful factor in the moral world is love, and this makes no noise as it flows through every channel which makes for the world's uplift, vivifying, refreshing and energizing every department of true living. "Love vaunteth not itself; is not puffed up," but in quietness it does its work. This is true of the other two great graces. The things that abide and that are worth while, are, after all, the things that are unseen, that are wholly unobtrusive, that are never on parade, are never announcing their alms to the multitude or saying prayers on the corners of the street, or wearing phylacteries on their shoulders, "to be seen of men."

In view of these facts it is not remarkable that Israel was reproved for seeking strength in horses and in swift and noisy flight, while at the same time they were told that "in quietness and confidence should be their strength." We are all more or less like Elijah, after his contest with the prophets of Baal. By the power of God he obtained a great victory; but this victory was attended by spectacular manifestations. Elijah was misled by his estimate of the sources of power. He afterwards, while resting under a Juniper tree heard the noise of Jezebel's chariot wheels, and imagined himself in great danger. He was afraid of noise, but God led him to Horeb and taught him a great lesson. Standing upon the mountain before the Lord, a great and strong wind rent the mountain and broke in pieces the rocks thereof; but the Lord was not in the wind; after the wind an earthquake shook the mountain; but the Lord was not in the earthquake; after the earthquake there was a fire; but the Lord was not in the fire. Now, after these noisy manifestations, the true source of strength was revealed to Elijah. A Still Small Voice came along, and the Lord was in this; and so Elijah was taught to trust not in spectacular manifestations but in quietness where all true power resides.

We are captivated by bigness. The eye, as well as the ear, is under the influence of what is misleading. We look through the telescope for the things that are powerful, forgetting that it is the microscopic view that reveals the most powerful things in the universe. We are beginning to understand this power, but it will probably take many years yet of experience to teach the world that spectacular manifestations have no real power in them.

If we carry our subject into the home circle, we shall find that it will give us ample testimony of the truth of our contention. Genuine culture is never loud. A loud voice is a sign of intellectual or moral weakness. The mother or wife who speaks the loud accents at once surrenders her claim to high culture, and certainly to a dominating influence in the home circle. There is no power like quietness in the family, and there is no influence which will pervade every part of the family circle with the strength of refinement and culture more effectively than "a meek and quiet spirit, which in the sight of God is of great price."

The same is true in the church. Our church life is too boisterous, and therefore too sensuous. The spiritual moves in silent courses. Where God is, there ought to be silence. The Psalmist is right when he says "The Lord is in His holy temple; let all the earth keep silence." Our loud songs may stir somewhat the sensuous, but they do not speak effectively to the spiritual. Vociferous bawling in the pulpit is a poor substitute for that culture which uses the most sacred things in the delicate accents of tremulous and unostentatious emotion. The strength of a sermon is not in its thundering tones, but in its quiet, peaceful reaching after the secret springs of spiritual life. The Reverend Dr. Bodens, in Dr. Parker's Ad Clearem, made a great deal of noise and sweat copiously under his exertions in the pulpit, but he had little power except in gastronomical exercises, in which he was a post graduate.

Our great protracted meetings are, as regards both their spectacular manifestations to the eye and their noisy proceedings to the ear, not altogether conducive to a true spiritual development. They doubtless do some good; for some people must be saved "so as by fire" if they are saved at all; but it must be conceded that such meetings cannot take the place of that quiet, earnest, spiritual culture, which should come through the unpretentious services of the faithful pastor as he breaks the bread of life from week to week.

Chicago

A Description and Interpretation of the Great Temperance Parade

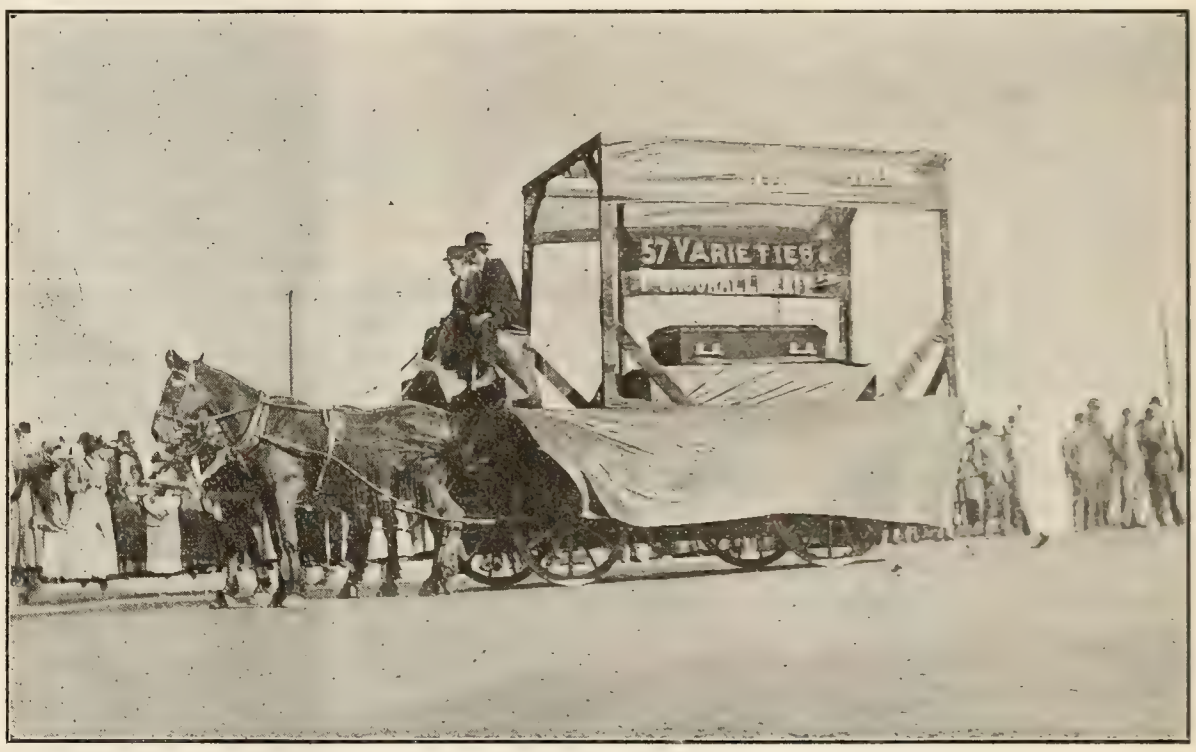
By Orvis F. Jordan

There were those who hooted at the idea of having a temperance parade last year, but the success of the enterprise took away the sneer. This year great crowds gathered in the business district in anticipation of the event. The liquor people were no longer in a mood to ridicule but had already marshalled their forces to hold a Sunday parade of the liquor elements following the demonstration of strength on the part of the drys.

Long before one o'clock the floats, wagons and carriages began passing down Michigan avenue to get their place in the line-up before two-thirty. Promptly on the hour they started up Michigan avenue to Washington street. From here they turned off to State street and went south to Jackson avenue, dispersing at the river. Sixteen thousand were in line. It required two hours and a quarter for them to pass a given corner and in order to do that, the parade marched in two defiles down the street at the rear end of the procession.

Strange Comrades.

They were a strange lot of comrades. There was one Catholic organization represented. Prohibitions were not far from enthusiasts for the Anti-Saloon League. The Germans and the Swedes were there. Methodists were accompanied by Baptists and Presbyterians. A number of the churches of the Disciples were lined up and along with them marched our "anti" brethren from Kendall street with one of the best delegations there.



The parade originated with the W. C. T. U. Naturally they headed the parade with many wagon loads of the members of that body. If some of the plans of this organization have seemed quixotic, they have certainly won the respect of the entire temperance army by their leadership in getting up the parade. The temperance orders were there, such as the Good Templars. The latter society had one of the most imposing exhibits in the parade.

Some churches were conspicuous by their absence. We saw no Lutheran church represented and no Episcopalian church, though Bishop Fallows headed the ministers of the city and represented the Reformed Episcopal church.

Signs and Floats.

The signs and floats had a most decided educational effect. The makers of signs seem to have been particularly irritated by the advertisements of a certain brand of beer. A picture of the devil in purgatory surrounded by lost souls bore the suggestive title, "Budweiser is a friend of mine." Two men dressed up as bums and bearing on their noses the painted imitation of the tipplers' badge, bore a similar sign. A group of young women were doing a washing on one wagon and the sign said, "Our husbands are at the saloon." One organization presented a picture of the drunkard's home with living actors on one wagon and on the following wagon the same home after the pledge was signed. Many bore signs suggesting that law-breakers were anarchists. The friends of the Sunday saloon were given much to meditate upon. Perhaps the most telling rebuke of this evil was that given by the Law and Order League. They constructed a hearse with a coffin upon it to drive through the streets. Behind the hearse came fifty men in winding sheets representing the dead. Each corpse bore a banner with his name and the place where he had been killed in a Sunday saloon. Newspaper men were especially anxious to get the pictures of this gruesome procession and no argument could meet the patent fact that all of these crimes had been committed in Chicago in the Sunday saloon and that these men might walk the streets in their own living bodies but for this curse. Along with this procession walked our old friend, Mr. Mulvihill, and we more than half believe that this telling blow at the law-breakers was the work of his fertile brain.

The churches had their choirs, who in some instances sang. Others brought their small boys and they yelled. Others brought their girls dressed up in different ways, the goddess of liberty being a favorite role. Some organizations furnished bands. A lady band from Joliet, Illinois, was given the most notice.

One of the Floats in the Great Parade.

What the Crowd Said.

We soon finished using up all our plates on things that would appeal to the camera fiends and went to mingle with the crowd and hear what they had to say. Some of the saloon-patrons were very angry. One German who bore around with him a sign board for Milwaukee's chief industry, declared he would vote for seven more Dunnings in which to incarcerate all these crazy people. He excitedly exclaimed over and over to his friend, "Viskey vas alvays trunk, and alvays vill pe." Others appreciated the size and strength of the demonstration, but questioned its utility. "What is to be gained by women making a scene of themselves through the streets." Others asked their neighbors in awe-stricken whispers, "Will they ever be able to do it?" There were the

The Gift of Life

BY EMMA A. LENCE

There stretched a pathway, flower-sweet;
And, poised on eager, restless feet,
A maiden fair as dreams might be,
Gazed down the distance longingly:—
"O, life, how gladly would I stay,
And tread each step of thy strange way;
Dear Life, I would not give thee up,
Till I have drained thy deepest cup."

Far down where path and river meet,
A woman stood with faltering feet:
Oh, hard and rough had been the way
That leagues and leagues behind her lay;
Comrades had gone; the sun was dim
And nearing the horizon's rim:—
"O, Life, I'd gladly give thee up,
For bitter is thy deepest cup!"

The Alaska Mail Dogs

Some dogs are better trail followers than others, as some are better leaders. In a blizzard the best of them lose the trail, but invariably find it.

When on the trail they eat but once a day, then at the end of the journey. After feeding, like weary children, they fall asleep and are never quarrelsome. It takes on an average of twenty pounds of food a day for a team of eleven dogs on a hard route.

The dogs of the mail teams consumed last year three tons of bacon and one of rice. The rice and bacon are cooked together with frozen fish and eaten hot. The dogs are permitted to eat all they want.

When too hot they let it cool in the snow. If near the sea or a river they will cunningly pull the vessel out on the ice and test the temperature of the contents with their long tongues until the mess can be eaten without burning the mouth. Frozen fish is the staple food of all native dogs.

Once a week the dogs are fed on fresh meat bones.

In severest weather the dogs are unprotected save by the thick coats of hair that nature provides. In April and May the mail dogs wear moccasins of moose or deerskin, for the thaw of the spring sunshine freezes at night and the ice cuts their feet. When a roadhouse is reached, they often share its shelter with the carrier, but not infrequently they burrow into the snowdrift and, curled up in their warmth, wait until bidden to move on.

Once on the trail, the dogs are unmindful of every discomfort, every danger. Their one playing truant from the line of duty is chasing the snowbirds that flit across the trail. So enticing is this sport that often the driver is at the mercy of the team, which quit the trail and in eagerness to catch the flying coquettes of Arctic winged life, roll the sledge over and over snowbanks until the birds are theirs.

Nome is the mail distributing depot for Seward Peninsula—the gateway to Northwestern Alaska. Mail from the states comes from Seattle by steamer to Valdez—four days' journey. From Valdez to Nome is an overland route of more than fifteen hundred miles. This distance is covered by four-dog team relays, each let by the government to a separate contractor. The government pays $40,000 a year for carrying the mail from Unalaklik to Nome. Out of this sum the contractor pays carriers and all expenses.—Our Dumb Animals.

Prince and Princess Rabbit

BY EMMA C. DOWD.

Norma had come to spend the summer, and Lyndon was showing her all about the yard and garden.

He stopped in a sunny corner back of the house.

Here is where I was going to have my rabbit pen," he said, "and then Jamie Jordon's rabbits got over into Mr. Wilcox's garden and dug up his onion bed, and of course he didn't like it, and Jamie couldn't help their burrowing out, and so he had to give 'em away, and Papa wouldn't let me have any after that—wasn't it too bad?"

Norma's face had been growing more and more eager. "O," she burst out, "he didn't know how to fix it! Mine couldn't burrow out! I helped Papa make the pen!"

"Have you got some rabbits?" asked Lyndon.

"Guess I have! O, they're lovely! Prince is black all over, and Princess is white as snow. Bertha Cowles, that lives across the street, is taking care of them until Papa and Mamma and I get home again."

"Are you sure you can fix a pen so they can't get out? 'Cause that's all the reason I couldn't have some."

"Why, yes! All you want is a big box, and you dig a place just right to set it down into, and then you fill it with earth. Then you put another box over that for them to live in, and if you have a yard you have to sink a box under that. Then when they burrow in the ground they come right against the side of the box, and they can't possibly get out."

"I'm going to have some!" cried Lyndon.

"And I'll help you make the pen!" exclaimed Norma. "O, I wonder if I couldn't send for Prince and Princess!"

The matter was talked over with Lyndon's father and mother, and Mr Aubrey said he thought Norma's plan was a good one, and he agreed to send home some boxes that very afternoon.

The children began digging at once, so as to have the place ready for the boxes when they came. By dark the rabbit pen was nearly half done. Some strong wire netting came with the boxes, to be stretched around the little yard. Norma and Lyndon wanted to put off bed-time, and work by lantern-light, they were so eager to have the little home finished. But Mrs. Aubrey told them that Prince and Princess could not get there within three days at least, and there would be plenty of time. So reluctantly they left off hammering and sawing, and said good-night.

When the rabbits arrived by express, Lyndon admired them as much as Norma had hoped he would. They were certainly beauties, and they seemed to enjoy their fresh, comfortable home. Once or twice a day the children let them out on the lawn for a nibble and a run, keeping close watch that they should do no damage to growing plants. As they were always handled gently, they were very tame, and easily caught.

On a hot July morning Lyndon was astonished and overjoyed to find five baby rabbits in the pen, and he rushed back to the house to tell Norma the delightful news.

When Norma's father and mother returned from England, and Lyndon had to bid goodby to Norma and her Prince and Princess, three of the little ones remained behind to keep his rabbit pen cheery.

Home Life in Hawaii

BY MARY H. FOWLER.

Chinese servants are much preferred to Japanese, and there was great lamentation amongst housekeepers when the exclusion act went into effect with annexation. The Chinese are believed to be much more faithful than the other nationality, and it is the rare exception if they are not deeply grateful for every kindness, and loyal to the interests of their employers, with whom they frequently remain for many years, asking few favors or indulgences. They expect no days off—the one annual holiday season being the two weeks of the Chinese New Year, which occurs in February. Even then, but a few days, or at most a week, is asked for, and prior to his departure, Ah Lum prepares a supply of food that will keep, ham and tongue, cake, bread and preserved fruits, to lighten the difficulties of his mistress in his absence, as much as possible. He does not then hurry away as if he were anxious to leave his cares behind him, but with neatly braided queue and in clean clothing presents himself before his mistress with a pretty gift of lily bulbs, preserved ginger, a fan or a piece of porcelain, to bid her a respectful good-bye.

Early hours are favored; breakfast is usually served at half-past seven, luncheon at half-past twelve, and on ordinary occasions, dinner at half-past six. Amongst the American residents "home cooking" is preferred—the English and Germans also adhering to their customs, but with all there is a generous supply of Hawaiian dishes which many foreigners—not all—learn to like. Amongst these are the taro, a succulent tuber which is cut into pieces and boiled; the bread fruit which is delicious, boiled and then baked, brought to the table hot and broken into pieces to be eaten with butter like sweet potatoes. The fish are delicious—the large rose-colored uu, boiled or baked, wrapped in ti leaves and thus served, or the small, delicate mullet, broiled and served with sauce tartare.

In the homes of the descendents of American missionaries or merchants, the breakfast is much the same as one would have in the middle western states, with the exception of the many kinds of delicious tropical fruits—porridge, bacon and eggs, potatoes and a variety of cakes, or muffins. Luncheon is also quite conventional, with cold meats or fish, salads, cakes and preserved fruits. At this meal poi—the staple food of the native—is often served, a sticky, greyish porridge eaten with salt fish as a relish. As throughout the far East a great deal of rice and curry is eaten, usually at luncheon, but often at dinner as well. Soup, ripe olives, fish, a joint, fowls or game—when it is to be had—
